EXTRA-TERRITORIAL LEGISLATION IN CANADA.

			1920
16	The Governor-General	92	February 16 (Rec. March 1)	Transmits copies of an approved Privy Council minute, recommending an amendment to the British North America Act to provide that an enactment of the Parliament of Canada, otherwise intra vires , shall operate as if enacted by the Imperial Parliament.	38
17	To the Acting Governor-General	Telegram	May 6	Enquiries with reference to No. 16; what points the proposed amendment is intended to cover beyond the extension of jurisdiction to aircraft registered in Canada or personnel licensed in Canada.	43
18	To Foreign Office, Home Office, War Office, Admiralty, Air Ministry and Board of Trade	—	May 27	Transmits for observations copy of No. 16 and letter to Law Officers respecting the amendment of the British North America Act desired by Canadian Government.	44
19	Foreign Office	—	June 10	Considers that obligations imposed by membership of the League of Nations and the acceptance of the Mandates in respect of the ex-German Colonies render it necessary to confer a right on the Dominions to legislate with effect outside their own borders on matters within their competence. The position of Canada in connection with the Aerial Navigation Convention needs no such wide extension of powers, but might be dealt with as suggested.	47

20	Air Ministry	—	June 23	Considers that Dominions must be empowered to pass legislation applying extra-territorially to aircraft, and calls attention to Clause 13 (1) of the Air Navigation Bill.	48
21	Canadian House of Commons	—	June 24	Debate on a resolution, moved by Mr. Doherty (Minister of Justice), to present an Address to His Majesty praying for an amendment of the British North America Act, by the addition of a provision empowering the Canadian Parliament to legislate extra-territorially.	49
22	Canadian Senate	—	June 26	Debate on the proposed Address to His Majesty praying for an amendment of the British North America Act to secure to the Canadian Parliament power to legislate extra-territorially.	51
23	Board of Trade	—	June 28	Encloses Memorandum setting out the bearing upon merchant shipping law of proposed extension to Canada of powers of extra-territorial legislation; considers that any such question should be discussed by representatives of Dominions and H.M. Government in conference.	52
24	War Office	—	July 20	States in reply to No. 18, that there is no objection from a War Office point of view to the proposed legislation as Canadian Government already has such powers under the Army Act, and can apply to Canadian Forces either Army or separate code.	55
25	Home Office	—	August 6	Transmits with reference to No. 18, copy of a Memorandum, reviewing the question with particular reference to the treatment of aliens and naturalisation.	56
26	To Foreign Office	—	August 13	Enquires whether it is correct to infer from No. 19 that Lord Curzon sees no objection to the proposed amendment of the British North America Act, granting to Canada powers of extra-territorial legislation, and, if so, whether this applies in the case of China; encloses copy of Law Officers' Report, expressing the opinion that assent to the amendment should be withheld.	58
27	Admiralty	—	August 19	Conveys the view of the Judge Advocate of the Fleet, that although in the present circumstances there is no overwhelming objection to conferring general powers of extra-territorial legislation on the Canadian Parliament, difficulties may arise in connection with the Naval Discipline Acts, particularly if similar powers are demanded by the other Dominions.	60
28	Foreign Office	—	August 20	States in reply to No. 26 that Lord Milner's interpretation of No. 19 is correct. As regards China, does not consider that Crown right to legislate for all British subjects there will be prejudiced.	61

29	The Governor-General	Secret	September 1 (Rec. Sept. 14)	Transmits copy of a letter from the Department of External Affairs setting forth the views of the Minister of Justice on the subject of the proposed amendment of the British North America Act.	61
30	The Deputy Governor General	569	September 8 (Rec. Sept. 21)	Forwards an Address to the King from the Senate and House of Commons, praying that steps may be taken to amend the British North America Act, 1867.	63
31	India Office ...	—	October 11	States, with reference to No. 20, that it would appear to be necessary to obtain further power from Parliament to enable legislation to be undertaken in India with the required extra-territorial effect; enquires whether the Dominion Parliaments are able thus to legislate under their existing powers, and if not, whether it is proposed to introduce Imperial legislation to enlarge their powers.	63
32	To India Office ...	—	October 28	States that matter referred to in No. 31 is being considered in consultation with the Law Officers of the Crown.	64
33	To Admiralty, Home Office, War Office, Board of Trade, and Air Ministry	—	November 2	Transmits copies of enclosure in No. 26 and of Nos. 19-30 and No. 35.	64
34	To Foreign Office ...	—	November 2	Transmits copy of Nos. 20-25, 27, 29, 30, and 35.	65
35	To Law Officers, and Law Officers' Report	—	November 2 November 10	Reference requesting further observations on the proposed amendment of the British North America Act and Report adhering to view expressed in report of 13 July, 1920 (enclosure in No. 26).	65
36	Ditto ...	—	December 20 December 24	Reference as to (1) whether Law Officers consider powers conferred by Section 132 of the British North America Act are sufficient to enable Canadian Parliament to deal with offences against the Air Convention committed outside Canada; and (2) whether apart from treaty obligations, powers for dealing with offences committed outside Canada against Canadian aviation laws could be secured by a Canadian law prohibiting Canadian offenders from re-entry into Canada. Report replying affirmatively to both questions	66
37	To India Office ...	—	January 21	Communicates opinion of Law Officers on points raised in No. 31.	67
38	To the Governor-General	47	January 21	States that the Address forwarded in No. 30 has been laid before the King and a further communication will be made respecting the measure proposed.	67

39	To the Governor-General	Secret	January 21	Communicates with reference to No. 29 purport of No. 38.	68
40	Ditto ...	Separate	January 27	States that there is no objection to Nos. 17 and 39 being treated as non-secret if Ministers so desire.	68
41	India Office...	—	February 2	Enquires whether the Parliaments of the Dominions, other than Canada, possess the powers necessary to carry out their obligations under the Convention, and whether it is proposed to introduce any Imperial legislation extending the powers of the Dominion legislatures. In the latter event the question of introducing simultaneous legislation in Parliament to confer similar powers on the Indian legislature will be considered.	69
42	To India Office ...	—	February 11	States in reply to No. 41, that it is not proposed to introduce into the Imperial Parliament any legislation on the subject, as it would appear from the ruling of the Law Officers that such legislation is not required.	69
43	The Governor-General	Secret	March 2 (Rec. March 16)	Transmits copy of letter from the External Affairs Department setting forth the views of the Governor-General's responsible advisers on the suggestions conveyed in No. 39.	69
44	To Law Officers, and Law Officers' Report	—	May 5 May 31	Reference requesting that another formula be suggested to take the place of that originally proposed, or that objections to the latter be stated. Report expressing the opinion that no other formula can be suggested that would satisfy the Canadian Government and be free from constitutional objection.	71
45	India Office...	—	July 16	Transmits copy of letter to the Air Ministry stating that it is not proposed at present to introduce legislation in the Imperial Parliament to enlarge the powers of the Indian Legislature to legislate with extra-territorial effect.	72
46	To Law Officers, and Law Officers' Report	—	July 22 August 5	Reference enquiring whether the original formula goes beyond the expressed intentions of the Canadian Government; if this is the case, and should the Law Officers still find it impossible to suggest another formula, requests assistance in drawing up a detailed statement for submission to the Canadian Government. Report expressing the opinion that an Act of the Imperial Parliament might be passed on lines indicated which would give effect to the intentions of the Canadian Government without being open to objection on constitutional grounds.	73
47	To the Governor-General	Secret	August 18	Sends with reference to No. 43 an alternative suggestion submitted by the Law Officers for the amendment of the British North America Act respecting extra-territorial legislation.	74

VIII. CANADIAN NATIONALS ACT, 1921.

1921
48	To Foreign Office and Home Office	—	May 12	Transmits print of Bill to define Canadian Nationals and House of Commons debates thereon, together with copy of the Canadian Immigration Act; invites attention of Foreign Office to the remarks of the Minister of Justice on the International Court of Justice, and on the position of the British Empire as a member of the League of Nations; also to the bearing of the Bill on the position of British subjects under commercial treaties, and as regards Canadian representation at Washington.	75
49	Ditto ...	—	May 21	Transmits revise of print enclosed in No. 48.	75
50	Foreign Office ...	—	June 6	Remarks, in reply to No. 48, upon the statement of the Canadian Minister of Justice regarding the position of the British Empire as a member of the League of Nations, and upon the effect of the Bill as regards the position of Canada under the Air Convention.	112
51	Home Office ...	—	June 22	Has no objection to Clause 1 of the Bill; criticizes Clause 2 as being inconsistent with the establishment of Imperial nationality, and considers every effort should be made to avoid the dangerous consequences of the clause.	112
52	Foreign Office ...	—	June 23	Transmits for concurrence draft circular to H.M. Consular Officers abroad, explaining that the Act does not affect the treatment of Canadian Nationals as British subjects with regard to the questions of British nationality, protection abroad, or the issue of passports.	113
53	To Foreign Office ...	—	September 15	Replies to points raised in No. 50.	114
54	To Home Office ...	—	September 15	Explains, in reply to No. 51, that it is considered undesirable to make representations to the Canadian Government regarding Section 2 until it has been decided whether the Act gives rise to difficulties in other respects, especially as regards the definition of Canadian Nationals in Section 1; encloses copy of Nos. 48, 50, 52, and 53, and Press cuttings, showing that the Union of South Africa contemplate introducing similar legislation.	114
55	Home Office ...	—	October 18	Considers that while points referred to in No. 54 should not be lost sight of, the basis of criticism of the Act should be the considerations set forth in No. 51; discusses Section 2, and suggests that it be pointed out in any representations to the Canadian Government that the matter is one for discussion at an Imperial Conference.	116

56	To Foreign Office ...	—	October 31	Transmits copy of Nos. 55 and 57, and of the Canadian Nationals Act; and concurs in the draft circular enclosed in No. 52.	116
57	To Home Office ...	—	October 31	Transmits copy of the Canadian Nationals Definition Act, and of No. 56; corrects Home Office statement that Section 2 of the Bill was introduced as an afterthought.	117

Dominions No. 320.)

[MY LORD DUKE.] [MY LORD.] [SIR.] Downing Street, 28th May, 1917.

I HAVE the honour to transmit to [Your Excellency.] [you,] for the information of your Ministers, copies of the official report* of the proceedings in the House of Commons on Thursday, 17th May, 1917, in columns 1786-7 of which will be found the Prime Minister's statement with reference to the holding of an annual Imperial Cabinet to discuss foreign affairs and other aspects of Imperial policy.

I have, &c.
WALTER H. LONG.

Enclosure in No. 1.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, THURSDAY, 17TH MAY, 1917.

THE PRIME MINISTER (MR. LLOYD GEORGE): I think that I ought to report to the House a very important decision that was arrived at as a sequel to the recent meetings of the Imperial War Cabinet. It is desirable that Parliament should be officially and formally acquainted with an event that will constitute a memorable landmark in the constitutional history of the British Empire. The House will remember that in December last His Majesty's Government invited the Prime Ministers or leading statesmen of the Overseas Dominions and of India to attend the sittings both of the Cabinet and of an Imperial War Conference to be held in this country. It is to the former body, which assembled in March, and held fourteen sittings before separating, that I desire to refer. The British Cabinet became for the time being an Imperial War Cabinet. While it was in session its Overseas Members had access to all the information which was at the disposal of His Majesty's Government, and occupied a status of absolute equality with that of the members of the British War Cabinet. It had prolonged discussions on all the most vital aspects of Imperial policy, and came to important decisions in regard to them—decisions which will enable us to prosecute the War with increased unity and vigour, and which will be of the greatest value when it comes to the negotiation of peace. I should like to add, on behalf of the Government, that the fresh minds and new points of view which our colleagues from over the seas have brought to bear upon the problems with which we have been so long engrossed has been an immense help to us all. So far as we are concerned we can say with confidence that the experiment has been a complete success.

The conclusions of the Imperial War Cabinet are of necessity secret, but there is one aspect of them which we feel ought to be communicated to the House without delay. The Imperial War Cabinet was unanimous that the new procedure had been of such service, not only to all its members, but to the Empire, that it ought not to be allowed to fall into desuetude. Accordingly, at the last session, I proposed formally, on behalf of the British Government, that meetings of an Imperial

* Hansard, Volume 93, No. 60.

Cabinet should be held annually or at any intermediate time when matters of urgent Imperial concern require to be settled, and that the Imperial Cabinet should consist of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and such of his colleagues as deal specially with Imperial affairs, of the Prime Minister of each of the Dominions or some specially accredited alternate possessed of equal authority, and of a representative of the Indian people to be appointed by the Government of India. This proposal met with the cordial approval of the overseas representatives, and we hope that the holding of an annual Imperial Cabinet to discuss foreign affairs and other aspects of Imperial policy will become an accepted convention of the British Constitution.

I ought to add that the institution in its present form is extremely elastic. It grew not by design, but out of the necessities of the War. The essence of it is that the responsible heads of the Governments of the Empire with those Ministers who are specially entrusted with the conduct of Imperial policy should meet together at regular intervals to confer about foreign policy and matters connected therewith, and come to decisions in regard to them, which, subject to the control of their own Parliaments, they will then severally execute. By this means they will be able to obtain full information about all aspects of Imperial affairs and to determine by consultation together the policy of the Empire in its most vital aspects, without infringing in any degree the autonomy which its parts at present enjoy. To what constitutional developments this may lead we did not attempt to settle. The whole question of perfecting the mechanism for "continuous consultation" about Imperial and foreign affairs between the "autonomous nations of an Imperial Commonwealth" will be reserved for the consideration of that special Conference which will be summoned as soon as possible after the War to readjust the constitutional relations of the Empire.* We felt, however, that the experiment of constituting an Imperial Cabinet, in which India was represented, had been so fruitful in better understanding and in unity of purpose and action that it ought to be perpetuated, and we believe that this proposal will commend itself to the judgment of all the nations of the Empire.

EXTRACTS FROM THE DEBATES OF THE CANADIAN HOUSE OF COMMONS, FRIDAY, 18TH MAY, 1917.

RIGHT HONOURABLE SIR ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as honourable members of this House are aware, on the 20th December last the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom summoned the Prime Ministers of the Overseas Dominions to meet in London with the members of the British Cabinet in conference. The proposed gathering was designated the Imperial War Conference. The purposes of the conference, as detailed in the telegram which was received, were to take counsel with each other:

First, as to matters connected with the prosecution of the War;

Second, as to the terms upon which peace might be made;

Third, as to the problems which would arise immediately after the conclusion of peace.

Parliament was summoned at an earlier date than was at first intended in order that the representatives of Canada might arrive in Great Britain at the time designated. It was at first proposed that the first meeting of the Imperial War Cabinet should be held during the last week of February. We left Ottawa on the 12th day of February and arrived in London on the 23rd day of that month. Unfortunately, through delay in the arrival of the representatives of India and of South Africa, the formal proceedings of the Imperial War Cabinet did not commence until a somewhat later date. We left Canada at a very interesting time. Germany had announced, just two weeks before, the commencement of an unprecedented and ruthless submarine campaign, and we had the experience in crossing the Atlantic of driving through fog at full speed without lights and without the sound of any fog-horn, a course which, in time of peace, would be regarded as madness itself, if not absolutely criminal. I mention this to indicate to honourable gentlemen in this House the conditions under which ocean travel must now be undertaken, and as an object lesson in the perils to British and Allied shipping through the waging of this campaign, of which I shall have something more to say at a subsequent stage of my remarks.

We all greatly regretted the fact that Australia could not be represented in the Imperial War Cabinet or in the Imperial War Conference. For some time after our arrival it was expected that the representatives of Australia would arrive before the proceedings had been concluded, and it was proposed that the consideration of all important matters in which Australia was especially interested should be delayed until their arrival. However, as it turned out, the representatives of Australia were not able to attend, and under the circumstances the best that could be done was to inform the Australian Ministry from day to day of the proceedings of the Imperial War Cabinet and the Imperial War Conference, and especially with the nature of any resolutions or proposals in which the Commonwealth of Australia might be especially interested.

Although there was some delay, the Canadian representatives did not find the time hanging heavily on their hands. There were certain meetings of the British Cabinet which we attended before the formal meetings commenced on the 20th March; and in the meantime we utilized every opportunity to visit Canadian camps and hospitals, to visit the troops in France, and to take up very many matters of importance, and some of them of urgency, in connexion with the prosecution of the War.

The first meeting of the Imperial War Cabinet was held on Tuesday, the 20th March, and the first meeting of the Imperial War Conference was held on Wednesday, the 21st March. Six meetings were held in each week, three of the Imperial War Cabinet and three of the Imperial War Conference, and except for a short recess at Easter this continued until our visit was concluded. I am not confident that it was originally intended to hold an Imperial War Conference as well as an Imperial War Cabinet; but after the proposal for holding an Imperial War Cabinet had been launched, it became obvious that there were certain matters more or less connected with the War which might, with advantage, be discussed in conference between the Dominions and India.

The genesis of the Imperial War Cabinet is to be found in the events of this War. Everyone has realized the somewhat anomalous position of the self-governing nations of the Empire in respect of questions which concern foreign policy and foreign relations. It is abundantly clear that the Self-governing Dominions are vitally interested in those questions which involve the issues of peace and war. In the event of a great war, threatening in any way the existence of our Empire or its status, the Self-governing Dominions being at war when the Mother Country is at war must inevitably take their part; and thus they are directly concerned with the causes out of which war may arise. If we take an example from the events which have been transpiring during the past two years, we observe that some at least of the causes out of which this War sprang arose before this Dominion had an existence. We observe, further, that some at least of the causes for which our Empire took up arms were concerned with treaties and understandings in which the Overseas Dominions of this Empire had no voice and no part; but Canada and the other Dominions took up arms because they realized that the issues involved transcend all others within our experience, and concern the future of every Dominion, the future of the United Kingdom, the future of the Empire as a whole, and, indeed, the future of the world.

And so, without any hesitation whatever, every Self-governing Dominion took up arms, and India as well, and their participation has been whole-hearted. Two years ago, in London, I said that the Overseas Dominions of the Empire had sent to fight for the cause of justice and of liberty in this war not less than 250,000 men. I said with equal truth in London, not more than a month ago, that those Dominions have called to arms in the present struggle not less than 1,000,000 men. So, under those conditions, and having regard to the part which the Overseas Dominions of the Empire have taken, it was obviously necessary that the pledge given by the British Government in the early months of the War to consult as to the terms of peace must be fulfilled in substantial measure. And as that question was to come under consideration, so also it was thought desirable and proper that questions of co-operation in the prosecution of the War and problems which will arise on its conclusion should also come under consideration by the British Cabinet and the representatives of the Dominions assembled in the first Imperial Cabinet ever held. The flexibility of the British Constitution permitted this to be done. We all realize that that Constitution is based on usage developed slowly and gradually into convention. The Cabinet is not known to the formal enactments of the law, neither is the office of Prime Minister; and yet all of us realize how important, how supreme a place the Cabinet of Great Britain or of any of the Dominions has in the Government of the country. And so with the office of Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. To it is attached a power and an importance which, in events such as those through which we are passing, permit him to exercise that power and that influence for great purposes made necessary by great events. And so the Prime Minister of Great Britain and Ireland called together the Prime Ministers of the Overseas Dominions to sit in Council with the five members of the British Cabinet. In taking that course he absolutely disregarded precedent. As he himself said most eloquently in his address at the Guildhall: "This is not a time in which one could justify too rigid an adherence to precedent, or even to tradition." It is a remarkable fact in our history that constitutional development has seemed to depend more upon events than upon men. The events of this War make it absolutely necessary that the Overseas Dominions should have the voice to which I have alluded, and, having that voice, it was natural, and more than that, necessary, that they should be assembled in an Imperial War Cabinet.

It was a remarkable body that was gathered together. First there were the members of the Cabinet of the United Kingdom, the five men who constitute that Cabinet, but who call into counsel with them other members of the British Government whenever necessary. These five men, with representatives of India and of the Dominions, met for the purpose of dealing with matters of common concern touching the whole Empire. While we were in London and in the very early days of the sessions of the War Cabinet, a further remarkable development took place. It also arose out of the necessity imposed by events, and I am thoroughly confident that it was not premeditated or designed when the Imperial War Cabinet was first summoned. The Crown acts in the United Kingdom and in all the Self-governing Dominions of the Empire; it acts in the United Kingdom upon the advice of the Ministers of the United Kingdom; it acts in each of the Dominions upon the advice of the appropriate Ministers; in Federal affairs upon the advice of Federal Ministers; in Provincial and State affairs, upon the advice of Provincial and State Ministers. It is the same Crown throughout, acting upon the advice of different Ministers. That tie of allegiance to the Crown is the tie which chiefly binds together the Empire to-day so far as constitutional considerations are concerned.

We sat on alternate days in the Imperial War Cabinet and in the Imperial War Conference. On days when the Imperial War Cabinet did not sit the War did not wait; therefore it was necessary that the British Cabinet itself should sit on those days to deal with questions arising out of the War. This result, therefore, very early obtained: that the Imperial War Cabinet was differentiated from the British War Cabinet; that the Imperial War Cabinet sat for the purpose of dealing with matters of common concern to the whole Empire, and the British War Cabinet sat for the purpose of dealing with those matters which chiefly concerned the United Kingdom.

There was for the first time in London an Imperial War Cabinet. But there was more than that. There were two Cabinets advising the Crown, one an Imperial War Cabinet advising the Crown in respect of matters of common Empire concern, and the other a British War Cabinet advising the Crown in respect of matters which chiefly concerned the affairs of the United Kingdom. I do not mean to suggest that this differentiation was absolute; it was carried out as best it could be carried out. I ventured to bring the subject to the attention of the statesmen of the United Kingdom and the people of the Empire in an address which I delivered in London before the Empire Parliamentary Association in the early weeks of my arrival there. The idea has so impressed itself upon the people of the United Kingdom, and upon their statesmen, that at the very last meeting of the Imperial War Cabinet a definite offer was made to the Overseas Dominions; that this experiment should be continued in the future; that it should develop into a usage and into a convention; and that annually at least, and, if necessity should arise, oftener, there should assemble in London an Imperial Cabinet to deal with matters of common concern to the Empire.*

* See page 1 of this volume.

It is perfectly obvious that such a proposal of that kind cannot include the large Cabinet to which Great Britain may revert after this War is over. It is idle to speculate or to conjecture as to whether the present system of a very small number of men in the Cabinet will continue; I think it likely that it will not continue. Therefore the future of this proposal will be a Cabinet of Governments rather than of Ministers; a Cabinet in which the Government of the United Kingdom, the Governments of the Dominions, and the Government of India will be represented. Having regard to the declarations of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and his colleagues, the proposal will carry with it much of advantage to the Overseas Dominions. I say that for this reason: it is not proposed that the Government of the United Kingdom shall, in foreign affairs, act first and consult us afterwards. The principle has been definitely and finally laid down that in these matters the Dominions shall be consulted before the Empire is committed to any policy which might involve the issues of peace or war. The language in which the Prime Minister of Great Britain conveyed his proposal to the Ministers from the Dominions made that abundantly clear. So, as I understand the proposal—and I think I understand it correctly—the British Cabinet shall continue to discharge its functions in respect to all matters relating to the United Kingdom, but there shall be also an Imperial Cabinet, in which not only the United Kingdom, but all the Overseas Dominions shall be represented by their Governments.

The representatives of the United Kingdom will consist of the Prime Minister, the Foreign Secretary, the Secretary of State for India, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and very probably the Secretary of State for War, and the First Lord of the Admiralty. The representatives of the Overseas Dominions shall be their Prime Ministers, and if the Prime Minister is unable to attend some Minister of first rank must attend in his place, who, for the time being, shall possess the authority and exercise the functions of the Prime Minister for that purpose. It is idle to have an Imperial Cabinet unless those who assemble around the council board are possessed of the authority for the time being to carry out the proposals which may be agreed to. It may be said, in criticism of this proposal, that what the Prime Minister of one of the Dominions might there agree to, he could not afterwards carry out, because the assent of Parliament might be withheld. That criticism, however, is equally applicable to any policy that a Government might bring down, and, therefore, it does not seem to constitute a grave objection to the proposal which has been outlined by Mr. Lloyd George.

We all know that the future constitutional relations of the Empire have been a matter of much discussion in Parliaments, in the Press, and by constitutional writers and others. We also know that men who have given thoughtful and careful study to the subject have been much perplexed as to what those future relations may be. We have, on the one hand, self-government enjoyed by each of the Overseas Dominions; we have that autonomy of which they are rightly jealous. We have, on the other hand, the necessity of consultation and co-operation; and how to reconcile the aspirations of the Overseas Dominions on the one side or on the other, to bring about unity and concentration of purpose in great matters of public concern and at the same time to safeguard the rights of self-government which the Overseas Dominions at present enjoy, has been a matter involved in much difficulty and complexity. It seems to me that many of the difficulties are likely to be cleared away by the proposal of Mr. Lloyd George. I do not pretend to prophesy that this will be the ultimate form in which necessary consultation and co-operation will be brought about. It would be idle to pass any conjecture on that subject; so many prophecies have failed of fulfilment that one is naturally unwilling to commit himself to any prophecy on the subject. But this at least may be said of Mr. Lloyd George's proposal: it does not sacrifice in the slightest degree the autonomy or the power of self-government which is possessed by each of the Dominions. The Ministers from overseas go there as the heads of their Governments. They are responsible to their own Parliaments; as the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom goes there responsible to his Parliament.

They go there as the representatives of independent Governments, each responsible to independent Parliaments. They meet there for the purpose of consultation, co-operation, and united action, but that action can be taken only with the sanction and authority of the representatives of the various nations of the Empire assembled in their own Parliaments. Therefore, there is no sacrifice of any existing power of self-government. There is, on the other hand, opportunity for consultation, co-operation, and united action, which I venture to think will prove of great advantage to the Empire as a whole.

The deliberations of the Imperial War Cabinet were necessarily secret. They covered almost every conceivable subject connected with the prosecution of the War, the terms of peace, and the problems to arise after the conclusion of the War. I was greatly impressed with the enormous variety and vast complexity of the problems that have to be taken into consideration by the British Government from day to day. I made it my business, when I first went to London, to go to the offices of the British War Cabinet for the purpose of examining the correspondence just for a single day. Before we arrived in London, all precedents had been cast aside in the methods of the British War Cabinet. When, in 1912, I sat for the first time in that Cabinet, it was an unwritten law that no record should be made of its proceedings, and that no member of the Cabinet should make any note of the conclusions arrived at. In Great Britain administration is not carried on in the same way as here. Our Cabinet is a cabinet of the Privy Council. Matters are dealt with in recorded form. We pass Orders-in-Council, sitting as a Cabinet, sitting [as] a Committee of the Privy Council. The meetings of the Privy Council in Great Britain are formal affairs, and the meetings of the Cabinet are absolutely apart and distinct from the formal meetings of the Privy Council, in which no debate takes place, and in which the proposals placed before the Privy Council are accepted as a matter of course. The British War Cabinet, as constituted when we arrived in Great Britain, kept a complete record of its proceedings; it had half a dozen secretaries at least, several of whom attended each meeting; resolutions were passed and conclusions were recorded in writing. All precedents of the past had been put to one side, and entirely new methods had been adopted. Voluminous records are kept in the offices of the War Cabinet. The day I examined the correspondence of the War Cabinet I suppose there were at least two hundred telegrams dealing with every conceivable subject, with matters arising in almost every country, neutral, Allied, or enemy, in the world. There were questions arising in all parts of the world—from every country in the world there pours in from day to day correspondence regarding matters requiring the attention, not only of the Foreign Office, but of almost every department of the British Government. I am bound to confess that my visit to London gave me a wider and clearer view than I could otherwise possibly have obtained of the tremendous duties and responsibilities imposed upon the British Government in this War.

So far as the deliberations of the War Cabinet are concerned, I can speak of them only generally; they will be alluded to in my subsequent remarks. I might, however, be permitted to read to the House a letter which I addressed to Mr. Lloyd George on the 30th of April, shortly before my departure from England, and the reply which I received from him. My letter reads:—

DEAR MR. LLOYD GEORGE,

As we are about returning to Canada I desire to express the thanks of the Canadian Ministers for the courtesy and consideration extended to us on all occasions and for the opportunities afforded to make ourselves fully acquainted with the highly important subjects which have come under consideration in the Imperial War Cabinet. The deliberations in which we have taken part have made us realize more fully the vastness and complexity of the problems involved in the successful prosecution of the War and in the determination of the conditions on which peace might be made.

While our absence from Canada has been greater than we anticipated or desired, we realize that the purpose for which we crossed the Atlantic could not have been accomplished within a shorter period.

The step which you have taken in summoning the Imperial War Cabinet is a notable advance in the development of constitutional relations, and I am confident that the usage thus initiated will gradually but surely develop into a recognized convention.

I pray that the united effort of our Imperial Commonwealth may speedily be rewarded with such decisive victory as will assure an abiding peace.

Believe me,

Yours faithfully,

R. L. BORDEN.

To which Mr. Lloyd George replied on the 2nd of May:—

MY DEAR SIR ROBERT,

I AM very much obliged to you for your kind letter of 30th April.

I should like to say how much we have appreciated the promptitude with which you accepted our invitation to attend the meetings of the Imperial War Cabinet under circumstances which involved a grave measure of risk for yourself and your colleagues, and our request that you should delay your departure until all the important business which had to come before us had been concluded. I feel, however, that you will agree with me in thinking that the work which the Imperial War Cabinet has done has amply justified the requests which we have made of you. I cordially agree with what you say about the importance of its meetings. If they have been of value to you, we have found them of not less value to ourselves.

It has been of immense advantage to bring to bear upon the vital problems of war and peace fresh minds and fresh angles of vision from the Overseas Dominions. I believe that this new experiment will prove, as you suggest, a permanent convention of our Constitution, for its recent meetings have unquestionably contributed not only to unity of purpose among the peoples of the Empire, but to the vigour with which we hope to prosecute the War and the clear-sightedness with which we shall enter upon the negotiations for peace.

Yours sincerely,

D. LLOYD GEORGE.

SIR SAM HUGHES: I do not understand from my right honourable friend's remarks the duties or the functions of the present British Cabinet. As I understand it, there is an Imperial War Cabinet, a British War Cabinet, and a British Cabinet. What are the functions of the British War Cabinet as distinct from those of the British Cabinet and the Imperial War Cabinet?

SIR ROBERT BORDEN: The Imperial War Cabinet advise the Crown in respect to all matters connected with the prosecution of the War. The British War Cabinet advise the Crown more especially in matters concerning the work of the United Kingdom in the War.

SIR SAM HUGHES: That is not the British War Cabinet.

SIR ROBERT BORDEN: We call it the British War Cabinet. The "British War Cabinet" and the "British Cabinet" are interchangeable terms. In Great Britain it is called the War Cabinet. I alluded to it as the British War Cabinet for that reason.

SIR SAM HUGHES: I understand that Ministers who are not members of the British War Cabinet are nevertheless members of a general British Cabinet.

SIR ROBERT BORDEN: My honourable friend overlooks the fact that in Great Britain all the members of the Government are not members of the Cabinet.

SIR SAM HUGHES: I know that.

SIR ROBERT BORDEN: The Cabinet has been made a very small one of only five members, two of whom have no portfolios.

SIR SAM HUGHES: That is the point I want to make clear.

SIR ROBERT BORDEN: The other members of the British Government are not members of the British Cabinet, but they are called into consultation in the British Cabinet whenever matters especially concerning their departments come up for consideration. In future, however, when the British Cabinet will probably be larger than it is to-day, the Imperial Cabinet will consist not of the whole British Cabinet, but of certain selected Ministers, that is to say: the Prime Minister, the Foreign Secretary, the Secretary of State for War, the First Lord of the Admiralty, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and the Secretary of State for India. They will represent the British Cabinet in the Imperial War Cabinet, and the Overseas Dominions will be represented in that Cabinet by their Prime Ministers.

As to the Imperial War Conference. Some of its deliberations and resolutions are for the present confidential, and will not be published at once, but the greater portion have been made public. A Blue-book is now in preparation, and as soon as it is received it will of course be placed upon the table of the House and printed for the use of members. The subjects under consideration included the Constitution of the Empire, the development and control of natural resources, Imperial preference, co-ordination of military equipment and stores, production of naval and military munitions and supplies, naval defence, care of soldiers' graves, naturalization, representation of India at future Imperial Conferences, the position of Indians in the Self-governing Dominions, removal of temptations to which overseas troops are now exposed, trade commissioners' service, patents, and other subjects.

The question of constitutional readjustment naturally came up for consideration. I think it is advisable that I should speak of that in the first instance, although it was not the first resolution passed. I shall not speak in detail of all the resolutions that were passed, but will only allude to the more important ones, and if any discussion is required as to the others, it can more conveniently be had after we have the full record of the proceedings of the Conference before us, so far as it can be made public. I called into informal consultation the Ministers from the other Dominions, and we discussed the question of constitutional readjustment pretty fully and carefully among ourselves. In the end we found that we were not very far apart in our views, and in the net result I had the honour of moving in the Conference this resolution. I should say at this point that all the proposals which have been put forward by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom with regard to an Imperial Cabinet are subject to the conclusions which may eventually be reached by the Conference mentioned in the following resolution:—

The Imperial War Conference are of opinion that the readjustment of the constitutional relations of the component parts of the Empire is too important and intricate a subject to be dealt with during the War, and that it should form the subject of a special Imperial Conference to be summoned as soon as possible after the cessation of hostilities. They deem it their duty, however, to place on record their view that any such readjustment, while thoroughly preserving all existing powers of self-government and complete control of domestic affairs, should be based upon a full recognition of the Dominions as autonomous nations of an Imperial Commonwealth, and of India as an important portion of the same, should recognize the right of the Dominions and of India to an adequate voice in foreign policy and in foreign relations, and should provide effective arrangements for continuous consultation in all important matters of common Imperial concern, and for such necessary concerted action, founded on consultation, as the several Governments may determine.

Now, I am aware that some criticism from a certain standpoint may be made of that proposal, because it may be said that it does not lead to a sufficiently close organization of the Empire. There have been proposals put forward for an Imperial Parliament which should have taxing powers for certain purposes over all the Dominions as well as over the United Kingdom. As far as I am concerned, and I think the other members of the Conference thoroughly concurred in this view, I regard that proposal neither feasible nor wise.

SOME HONOURABLE MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

SIR ROBERT BORDEN: I venture to think that the Dominions have done more for the common cause that we all have at heart in this War than could have been accomplished by any Imperial Parliament possessing the powers to which I have alluded.

SOME HONOURABLE MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

SIR ROBERT BORDEN: And I think that the best guarantee of what the Dominions are prepared to do for a great common purpose in the future is the record of what they have done during the past three years. I should say this, however, in justice to those who have been advocating different views with great ability and with great earnestness, that I do think all the Parliaments and peoples of the Empire are greatly indebted to the groups of young men in the Mother Country and throughout the Empire who have taken up this subject and studied it and issued many able publications with regard to it. Their work has been most earnest, unselfish, and devoted, and it has had this good effect; it has concentrated the opinion of the great mass of the people upon these problems of great common concern. So while I am unable to accept some of the conclusions which they have reached, I nevertheless feel that the Empire lies under a debt of gratitude for the work which they have done in that regard. This resolution was accepted unanimously by the Conference. I am happy to say that from first to last in all the proceedings of the Conference there was not one dissenting voice from any conclusion which the Conference reached. Every conclusion was absolutely unanimous, and I think this was perhaps due to the fact that certain subjects which did involve difficulty were first taken up informally in private discussion, and a conclusion was thus reached.

I should say this, further: a special Imperial Conference is to be summoned immediately after the War for the purpose of considering constitutional readjustment. I raised the question, and so did others, as to the constitution of that conference. As far as I am concerned I entertained the view, and I know that it was shared by others, that such a conference should include representatives of the recognized political parties in all the Dominions of the Empire. This is too great a question to be made a matter of party controversy, and if I should have anything to do with the selection of the representatives of Canada at that special conference, I desire now to say, without any qualification, that I should ask the leaders of the opposite party to go with me to that conference, and to take counsel with each other and with the other members of the conference as to these vital questions.

RIGHT HONOURABLE SIR WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, when, in the month of December last, the official news came from the other side that the Government of Canada had been invited to a Conference, to take place at an early date in London, upon questions connected with the War, although at that time Parliament had been summoned to meet early in January, we on this side of the House at once decided that we would offer no objection whatever to the absence of the Ministers who would go to London. We did not see that there was any special urgency for the Conference, such as would interfere with the business of Parliament. Notwithstanding, we determined that we would not offer any objection, but that, on the contrary, we would, in so far as it lay in our power, facilitate the business of the House in order to permit of the absence of the Ministers. Although we did not see the immediate object of the Conference, although it would have seemed that there was no urgency, we thought that there might be questions of the organization of the armies, of the construction of ships, of the production of foods, of the supplying of munitions, which were of such consequence as to make it necessary or advisable for the Government of the Mother Country to confer with the Governments of the Overseas Dominions. Therefore, we at once assented to the proposal that Parliament should adjourn to enable the Prime Minister and the colleagues by whom he was to be accompanied to attend the Conference.

Now, we have the result of that Conference, and my right honourable friend will agree with me, as I am sure that every member of this House will agree, that the result of the Conference, in so far as any practical action that has been taken, amounts to very little. My right honourable friend has told us that the only concrete thing which has come out of this Conference is that we are to have an Imperial War Council. That seems to be a very ambitious designation for the assemblage of gentlemen, or the body, which is to be known by the name of the Imperial War Council.

It seems to me to be rather a misnomer, calculated to lead men to indulge in fancies and dreams, rather than to impress itself on the judgment of serious men. You have an Imperial War Cabinet composed of five members of the Imperial Cabinet, of one member of the Cabinet of each of the different Overseas Dominions, and of representatives of India. My right honourable friend stated that the duty of the Imperial War Cabinet is to advise the Crown upon all matters of Imperial concern; matters which concern the whole British Empire. This Cabinet is to advise the Crown. What Crown? The Crown in Great Britain, the Crown in Canada, the Crown in Australia, the Crown in New Zealand, the Crown in South Africa, the Crown in Newfoundland, and the Crown in India—because under our present system of Government the Crown is represented by Ministers who advise it in all these different countries. The Imperial War Cabinet can conclude nothing. We are familiar with the declaration made some weeks ago by Mr. Bonar Law to the effect that the Imperial Cabinet was at once executive and consultative. With all respect to the opinion of Mr. Bonar Law, this is a statement which cannot be accepted as it was uttered. The Imperial War Cabinet has no executive power; it can report, it can pass judgment, it can come to conclusions upon any subject; but its conclusions achieve nothing; they are simply reported to the Crown in Parliament in Great Britain; in the different countries overseas, and in India. And when such a report has been made it may be accepted by one Parliament and rejected by the other. We have already had such a case. In 1911, the last Imperial Conference of that year decided to adopt a system of naval zones to be patrolled by the navies of the different Dominions having navies. A navy was ascribed to Canada on the Atlantic coast, and a navy was ascribed to Canada and Australia on the Pacific Ocean. This plan was adopted by the Mother Country, but it was rejected by the Canadian Government and by the Canadian people, and therefore this body is nothing more than a consultative body. I do not object to it as a consultative body. But I do object to terms being used which, in their very nature, cannot accord with the rules of parliamentary government as it exists to-day in the British Empire, in the Motherland, and in the Dominions overseas. But if I am told that there is to be a body which is to be known by the name of the Imperial Council, I am not disposed to quarrel with the name. I do not object to their being consultations, quite the contrary. My right honourable friend has stated that this body—so named, and misnamed—is to meet once every year. As to this, I have no objection whatever. This body can do nothing except discuss, come to certain conclusions, and report them to the different peoples whom its members represent, by them to be accepted or rejected. Well, sir, for my part, I am very much of the opinion that a great deal of advantage is to be derived by frequent consultations between people and people. Ignorance has been, all through the ages, the cause of many discords, indeed, and very many wars also; and when peoples are living under the same allegiance and are part of the same Empire, undoubtedly nothing but advantage can come from frequent consultation. To that I have no objection.

My honourable friend has alluded to the fact that there were enthusiasts in Great Britain and in Canada also who had hoped that the British Empire would be reconstituted; in fact, it was stated in the Press, when the Conference was summoned, that its chief object would be to reorganize the British Empire. Well, everybody who has had the slightest experience in public affairs must have known that such a hope was a delusion, that it could not be realized. As it has turned out, all hopes of reorganizing the British Empire have been adjourned to a Conference to be summoned immediately after the War is over. I attach very much importance to the belief, and I agree altogether with the view expressed by my honourable friend a moment ago, that no reorganization of the British Empire can bring about greater or better results than those which have been demonstrated by the present conditions. I cannot imagine that under present circumstances, so long as there is the disparity of population between the United Kingdom and the dependencies, any system can be organized or planned which will work more satisfactorily than the plan which we now have and upon which the Empire has grown up to its present solidity—I use the word “solidity” advisedly. But still, if there is to be a conference, as it is understood there is to be a conference, one thing at all events has been gained and one thing to which I at once tender my complete adherence: it is a fact that any conference, any reorganization, which may be contemplated will be based upon the principle of local autonomy and will not involve an impairment of the powers now vested in the Dominions beyond the seas. I understand that in the new Constitution which is to be discussed when the conference takes place the principle of monarchy is to be adopted. I have read a statement made by Mr. Long, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, in which I find:—

The resolution with regard to the Constitution of the Empire was made the occasion for striking expressions by the various speakers of attachment to the monarchical institutions of the Empire, and their value for the preservation of Imperial unity. In the words of one of the speakers, the monarchy is the keystone of the Imperial arch.

It seems to me that these phrases were altogether unnecessary. There has been a revolution in Russia. Revolutions have been threatened in many other places; but in the British Empire we are satisfied with monarchical institutions. There may be liberty and freedom under a monarchy, and there may be despotism in a republic. For my part I may say this, and I think that in this opinion everybody will agree, as a matter of abstract opinion it matters not what is the form of government, provided the people are free in their institutions and have the right of representation and petition. Under the British institutions we have been accustomed—and this is the reason why I read with some surprise such words as these—we have been accustomed to look upon, and we do look upon, the Crown as a basis of union among the different parts of the British Empire, and as a guarantee of that union I am pretty sure that the British people to-day would not tolerate a monarchy such as existed in England at the end of the eighteenth century or the beginning of the nineteenth century; but so long as the British monarchy is maintained in the traditions which were inaugurated by Queen Victoria every British subject the world over will be quite satisfied to remain under monarchical institutions.

EXTRACTS FROM DEBATES IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. 3RD JULY, 1917.

RIGHT HONOURABLE MR. MASSEY: Referring to the organization of the Empire itself, I may explain that the Conference did not attempt to deal with it in the ordinary way. We had it up for discussion, and, while we were unanimously of opinion that a great deal was necessary in the way of reorganization, we felt that during the War period was the wrong time to undertake it with any possibility of doing it justice. However, a motion was moved, and agreed to unanimously, that a special conference should be convened when the War comes to an end, representative of every country of the Empire, to consider what it was necessary to do in the way of reorganization. I do not think it is necessary to read the motion, which was moved by Sir Robert Borden and agreed to unanimously, but while the motion was under discussion I expressed the opinion that a conference such as it was proposed to hold should be made much more representative than anything that had been attempted up to the present. What I had in my mind was this: that such things are apt to develop into party matters, and I felt that a great Imperial question such as this should be kept free from party. What I should like to see—and I am not now thinking of New Zealand particularly—is the constitutional Opposition of every country of the Empire represented at the conference when it is convened. The Dominions are all practically under the same system—there is always a Government and an Opposition; and I should like to see the leaders of the Opposition present at that conference along with the representatives of the Government, so as to give them a certain amount of responsibility, and so avoid to a great extent raising the party issue. The conference will be held in due course, and I think it will have good results. As to when it will be held, I am not able to say. I have, however, to deal with another branch of this subject, and it is this: We never know what development may take place in the future. We have had gentlemen here from other parts of the Empire discussing them for our benefit. Although I am unable to agree with them in certain particulars, they deserve all possible credit, if only because they have directed public attention to the subject. Well, as I say, we do not know what development may take place in the future, but I do hope that nothing will be done to affect the autonomy of what are known as the oversea Dominions. I hope that the time will never come when any of our existing rights or privileges will be interfered with or given away. I am speaking quite as much as a citizen of the Empire as I am of this Dominion. I am strongly of this opinion. I say that any interference with the Dominions, or with our rights or privileges, would tend more to disintegration than to the cementing and strengthening of our Empire. I think it was a great countryman of mine—and there have been some great Irish statesmen—speaking about a hundred years ago, deploring the loss of the American colonies, as they were then called, and with a prophetic eye foreseeing the possibilities of the future in respect to the Empire, said, referring to the ties that will keep the Empire together, that they must be “ties which, though light as air, are as strong as links of iron.” Burke was right. Those are the ties which I hope statesmen in the different parts of the Empire will be able to arrange. We are a young Dominion to-day, and the Dominions are all young, but the greatness of their several futures is almost beyond our conception. There are some of the Dominions of the Empire to-day that will support in the future a population at least equal to that of the United Kingdom, and even greater. Preparation must be made for such a growth. I think it was Tennyson, who was a statesman as well as a poet, who said that the British Constitution had broadened down from precedent to precedent. It is elastic. It will go on broadening and expanding to meet the circumstances and conditions of the Empire as they arise. For example, the Imperial Cabinet, to which I have referred, was a long step forward. I am glad to say that, while there was very little thought of the representation of the Dominions prior to the War, their representation is in the mind of every British statesman to-day; and, indeed, in the minds of the great majority of the British people, who are impressed with the position the Dominions have taken up. They appreciate what has been done by the Dominions. They say that they are perfectly willing that the Dominions should have their fair share in the government of the Empire—that they should be able to have a say in foreign policy, in Imperial affairs, and when a great crisis arises their representatives should sit round the council board in association with the statesmen of the United Kingdom. Having been associated in different ways with the greater part of the members of the Government of the United Kingdom, I can say of them that they are agreed that the time has arrived when something should be done to give us the representation we are entitled to. In that connexion I have no hesitation in saying that we have more to fear from the rashness and impetuosity of some of the men who have been giving a great deal of attention to this subject, and who are genuinely anxious to see us having our just rights in connexion with the management of Imperial affairs—more to fear, I repeat, from their rashness and impetuosity than from any desire on the part of the British people to bar the door against us. There is no doubt about that in my mind. We have to go slowly. We have to look ahead and be very careful about every step we take in connexion with this building-up of the Empire, and especially with regard to Imperial representation. Any false step, any serious mistake made now, would perhaps delay the movement for many years—perhaps destroy it for ever. While I am willing to admit that every individual is entitled to the opinions he holds, I am entitled to make my position clear: that I am utterly opposed to any alteration which would allow our finances to be dealt with by a Parliament sitting outside of this country. Money will be required. Money is required from time to time for Imperial purposes, and there is no doubt in my mind but that each country will find its share when money is required. But in order to avoid such mistakes as have been made—such as that to which Edmund Burke referred—the final say must rest with the country and the Parliament of the country by which the money is being voted. I think I have made that point clear. I have given a certain amount of thought to the matter. I met a number of men in England who have probably given more thought to it than I have, and I have not always agreed with them. It is an important question for us, and it is one which each individual in the country should consider for himself. The time will come, I believe, when there will be an institution representative of the whole of the Empire. I am not able to say exactly at the present time what form it will take, but an important advance has already been made, and I have no doubt an institution will be evolved which will be satisfactory to the great bulk of the people of the Empire.

RIGHT HONOURABLE SIR J. G. WARD: Just let me say here that what was done in regard to the future constitution of the Empire may be gathered from the resolution that was unanimously agreed to by the Imperial War Conference on the motion of Sir Robert Borden. It reads as follows:—

"That the Imperial War Conference are of opinion that the readjustment of the constitutional relations of the component parts of the Empire is too important and intricate a subject to be dealt with during the War, and that it should form the subject of a special Imperial Conference to be summoned as soon as possible after the cessation of hostilities. They deem it their duty, however, to place on record their view that any such readjustment, while thoroughly preserving all existing powers of self-government and complete control of domestic affairs, should be based upon a full recognition of the Dominions as autonomous nations of an Imperial Commonwealth, and of India as an important portion of the same, should recognize the right of the Dominions and of India to an adequate voice in foreign policy and in foreign relations, and should provide effective arrangements for continuous consultation in all important matters of common Imperial concern, and for such necessary concerted action founded on consultation as the several Governments may determine."

No one in the Old Land can have the least doubt as to our view of any future development in regard to the preservation of our rights as an autonomous country. In alluding to this very important matter I have never lost an opportunity of stating that nothing any one can say in the Old Land would ever induce any responsible men in this country to give them the right directly or indirectly, to in any way control our finance or our taxation or autonomy. As a matter of fact, they cannot affect any change regarding any of them unless we do it ourselves. They cannot, as far as New Zealand is concerned, alter the Constitution in any respect in the future unless we—that is, the Parliament of this country—agree to it; and the people of this country would never assent, even if Parliament were so foolish—and I am quite certain no Parliament would ever be so foolish—as to approve of a proposal to take away the rights of the people over their own governmental powers.

THE HONOURABLE SIR J. G. FINDLAY: The British Parliament can do it to-day—can alter our Constitution.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE SIR J. G. WARD: Yes, it is true that they could alter our Constitution; but they know there is no possibility, without the concurrence of the Parliament or the people of this country, for them to do so, and if they attempted it they would be doing it at the risk of the people of this country saying "Good-bye."

THE HONOURABLE SIR J. G. FINDLAY: Why should we be in that position?

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE SIR J. G. WARD: I think we should not remain in that position, and an alteration may be necessary technically; but no power on earth—neither the British Government nor any other power—can alter effectively, or even at all, the rights of the people, as represented by their members in Parliament, in the matter of local autonomy, taxation, and finance, unless the Parliament of this country itself did it or assented to it; and in building up any Empire constitution that may come in the future we will never concede these rights to any external power, even though it be a friendly one within the shores of the Old Country.

WORKING OF PARLIAMENTARY INSTITUTIONS WITHIN THE EMPIRE.

Correspondence with the Governor-General of the Commonwealth of Australia.

No. 4.

THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL to THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

(Received 26th August, 1919.)

[Answered by No. 5.]

("Secret 'P.'")

MY LORD,

Governor-General, Sydney, 1st July, 1919.

IN these days of constitutional and administrative change it seems to me that an authoritative statement is needed, giving a comparison of the actual working of the various Parliamentary institutions and departmental systems within the Empire.

There are, no doubt, text books like Professor Berriedale Keith's which contain some information, but I can hear of no really comprehensive publication of this kind. Nor could it be prepared in one place nor by any one writer unless he were possessed of long and intimate local knowledge acquired upon the spot in each Dominion. Nothing short of actual experience and close study would enable a man to faithfully depict the Parliamentary customs and procedure and the methods of administration in any Dominion. Moreover, recent developments at Home in constitutional practice, the establishment of a Prime Minister's secretariat, the changes effected in Departments and channels of communications have now to be described and should figure in such a compilation.

The following are the examples of the differences in Parliamentary practices to be noted:—

(1.) At Home Parliament invariably opens with the King's speech. In Australia the House is continually adjourned and King's speeches are almost unknown; in my six years of office I shall, so far as I can foresee, only have opened Parliament twice. In lieu of a King's speech the Prime Minister delivers a policy speech on the first or second day of the session, and I am inclined to think that this practice will endure as being more "democratic" and tend to lay the emphasis of the ceremonial on the Prime Minister instead of His Majesty's Representative.

(2.) The party caucus plays a much more direct and recognized part in Government here than it does at Home. In Australia it has almost secured a footing amongst constitutional institutions, and in the case of the Labour Caucus it is so powerful that though acting in secret it nominates candidates, controls public policy and selects the Cabinet. It follows from this innovation that responsibility is shifting from Ministers and Parliament to a powerful extra-constitutional body.

As regards administration, the Civil Service here is recruited at so early an age as almost to preclude fully educated and University men joining it; consequently there is a dearth of suitable Civil Servants able to fill properly the higher positions. This want has been so much felt during the War that it has led to the creation of business boards or advisory councils of business men attached to the various Departments, a method which, within limits, is no doubt of great public advantage, but is also apt to depress the status and ambitions of the members of the Civil Service.

A comparative statement, therefore, of conditions of entry into the public Departments of the Empire, the organization and methods of those Departments, the nature of the supervision exercised over them by Parliamentary Committees, et cetera, et cetera, would be of great practical assistance, and would enable all His Majesty's Governments to judge of administrative conditions throughout the Empire.

I imagine that if a report could be obtained from each Dominion setting forth, in reply to definite queries, Parliamentary customs and administrative methods, this information could be tabulated by an authority on such subjects at Home, who could also deal with the British section of the statement. I cannot help thinking that the diffusion of such knowledge would have a good effect and tend to equalize standards, by showing clearly wherein this or that Dominion departs from one common model of constitutional practice, and in how far administrative methods and standards of efficiency vary within the Empire.

I have, etc.,

R. M. FERGUSON.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE TO THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL.

(Secret.)

SIR,

Downing Street, 10th October, 1919.

I HAVE the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Excellency's Secret despatch 'P' of the 1st of July* in which you suggest the compilation of an authoritative statement giving a comparison of the actual working of the various Parliamentary institutions and departmental systems within the Empire.

2. I have considered your proposal carefully but fear that it would not be possible to carry it out. It would be difficult to collect the information in a satisfactory form, and it would require to be co-ordinated with great skill and knowledge, nor is it certain that the information even if carefully collected and well edited would really be satisfactory. Text books of this nature are apt to give an impression of rigidity, which does not exist, and often is not desirable, in the working of actual institutions.

I have, etc.,

MILNER.

APPOINTMENT OF GOVERNORS-GENERAL.

(a) Memorandum by the Prime Minister of the Commonwealth of Australia.

No. 6.

(Confidential.)

THE stage of development which Dominion self-government and Imperial relations have reached calls for a corresponding development in the procedure for the selection of the Dominion Governor-General—a selection which is always a matter of great moment to the Dominion as well as to the Empire. An injudicious appointment to this office may at any time do grave and incalculable harm.

Speaking for Australia, I wish to emphasize the fact that the time has passed when the Commonwealth can be satisfied with a mere notification from the Colonial Office of the appointment made or proposed to be made.

The overseas Dominions, which are not only fully responsible for their own self-government, but also co-partners in Imperial policy and co-defenders of the very existence of the Empire, are clearly entitled to claim not merely to be consulted in the appointment but to have a real and effective voice in the selection of the King's representative.

It is, of course, recognized that the actual appointment of the King's representative should be made by the King, who is to-day the one real constitutional link for the whole Empire, and who is outside and above party divisions and territorial divisions. The question is only as to the source and the course of the advice on which the King should act in making the appointment.

It is plain that the Dominion Government, in order to have a real and effective voice in the appointment, should have—to borrow a phrase from legislative language—an "initiative" as well as a "veto." That is to say, it should have the right, not merely to express its views on a name submitted to it, but also to submit names itself. The exercise of this right presents no difficulties. The Government of the United Kingdom might invite the Government of the Dominion concerned to suggest a name if it should think fit to do so, and might itself, if it wished, suggest a name for consideration. The essential thing is that the Dominion Government should have the same right as the British Government to submit a name.

And it is hardly necessary to add that the field of selection should not exclude citizens of the Dominion itself.

During the last few years we have become familiar with the working of what, for want of a better word, is known as the Imperial Cabinet. Whether in the form it has assumed it will continue in normal times remains to be seen. But the principle is now well established that Dominion Ministers representing and responsible to their respective Governments, and sitting in Council with the King's Ministers in London, may advise His Majesty on affairs of Empire. And it has also been definitely settled that, apart from any such formal meeting, the Prime Minister of a Dominion has at all times the right, on affairs of Empire, to communicate direct with the British Prime Minister. The methods of procedure indicated above for the selection of a Governor-General are fully in accord with the form and spirit of what are termed Imperial institutions as they exist to-day. Here is an appointment which concerns directly both the United Kingdom and the Dominion interested, but which concerns the Dominion more closely and more personally. The choice of the occupant of the highest office in the Dominion should have the official approval of not only the United Kingdom but also of the Dominion Government, and the voice of the Dominion should in the nature of things be given the greater weight. The matter is, therefore, one which ought to be dealt with by direct co-operation and agreement between the British and Dominion Prime Ministers, and by a joint recommendation to the Crown based on that agreement.

THE OFFICE OF GOVERNOR-GENERAL.

Inquiry.

HON. MR. BOSTOCK inquired of the Government:—

1. Have any communications or messages of any kind passed between the Canadian Government, or any member of it, with the British Government, or any person on behalf of the British Government, with reference to the appointment of a successor to His Excellency the Governor-General?

2. If so, what is the purport of these communications?

3. Have the names of any persons been submitted to the Canadian Government with a view to ascertaining whether or not these persons would be acceptable to the Canadian authorities?

HON. SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: I am not in a position to bring down any papers or to answer the question. If any communications or messages on this subject passed between the two Governments mentioned, this Government would regard the matter as being confidential and not one as to which the papers should be laid upon the Table of the House. The office is one peculiarly within the authority of the Imperial Government, and, while every courtesy would doubtless be shown to Canada as to any appointment to be made, yet it would not be desirable that this Government should suggest any particular appointee for the office; nor is it, in the judgment of this Government, desirable that under present conditions the Imperial Government should in any sense relinquish or divide its responsibility in any appointment so to be made.

SPEECHES BY LORD MILNER ON THE CONSTITUTION OF THE EMPIRE.

A BRITISH LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

LORD MILNER'S IDEAL OF A SUPER-STATE.

FUTURE IMPERIAL POLICY.

LORD MILNER, Secretary for the Colonies, spoke in Manchester yesterday on our relations with the self-governing Dominions and on Imperial development after the War. The first speech was delivered at a luncheon, at which the Lord Mayor presided, of the Manchester branch of the Royal Colonial Institute.

At the luncheon Lord Milner said we were at long last waking up, not only to the great present importance of the Empire, but to its almost boundless potentialities of future growth. The thought of this unrivalled heritage filled him with something like awe. The relations of the self-governing Dominions with the Mother Country had for years past been undergoing a great transformation, which was now almost complete. They were no longer colonies, but nations intensely conscious of their nationhood. They had played in this war as big a part as any but the greatest Powers. They were certainly entitled to look forward to a future in which they would themselves be Great Powers. Yet they all desired—and this was our unparalleled good fortune—to remain within the Empire. If that desire was fulfilled the world would see for the first time a permanent association of a number of Great Powers under a single head. It would be, and in fact it was already, a League of Nations, whether or not it was embraced in a greater league, and it possessed a moral unity which that greater league, if it came into existence, had still to acquire. For the ties which bound together the members of the British League of Nations were no work of artifice; they were a natural growth, the work of time.

The Imperial War Cabinet.

This was the position in fact, but, as often happened in our history, the realities of the case were somewhat obscured by antiquated forms. The Department of the British Government which normally dealt with the Dominions was the Colonial Office, but the Dominions were in no sense under the Colonial Office. The Colonial Office was simply the channel through which the real parties, who were the Governments of the Dominions and the Government of the United Kingdom, transacted their business. Under ordinary circumstances that arrangement worked very well, but it was certainly anomalous that a Department which really governed Nigeria and Hong Kong should concern itself with the Dominions which we did not pretend to govern at all. When the time came, as it must come very soon, for the relations of our Government Departments to be overhauled and their work rearranged on some logical principle, this and many other anachronisms would disappear.

In the meantime one great and far-reaching change had taken place in the unwritten Constitution of the Empire. He referred to the presence of the Dominion Prime Ministers in the Imperial War Cabinet. The War Cabinet would come to an end with the end of the War, but he sincerely hoped that the practice of Dominion Ministers sitting side by side with British Ministers to deal with all matters which were of common concern to the United Kingdom and the Dominions would never come to an end. (Cheers.) The present arrangement, though created to meet an emergency, had been an unqualified success. It was based upon a true principle and corresponded to the actual realities of the case. The complaint of the Dominions that they had no share in the conduct of the policy of the Empire was justified. The Imperial War Cabinet was a device to meet that complaint and it served its purpose. The share which the Dominion Ministers had taken in the direction of our war policy had been a real share, and everyone who wished to see the continuance of the British League of Nations must desire that the Dominions should continue to have a real share in peace in the conduct of matters which affected them as much as ourselves, such as foreign policy, defence, inter-imperial trade, and communications.

No amount of affection and good will between the several States would enable the British Empire to exercise its proper influence in the world—and it was a beneficent and a pacific influence—unless we maintained the means of planning and of acting together as one Power. On the other hand, it was equally true that no machinery whatsoever, no Cabinet, nor Council, nor Conference could avail unless we preserved the moral unity of the Empire. We must cultivate what he had ventured to call the wider patriotism, the sense of our common citizenship in this super-State, by every means in our power. We must strive to strengthen and to multiply those invisible but all-powerful bonds.

Importance of Preference.

In that respect the progress of science and of invention came greatly to our assistance. How much, for instance, were the airship and the aeroplane likely to do to pull the Empire together? It was from this point of view that, speaking for himself, he attached so much importance to the principle of Imperial Preference. The word Preference awakened the memory of old political controversies which, in the course of time, grew exceedingly tiresome. He wished we could bury those old controversies and look at the question from a wider point of view.

"It has been too much discussed," Lord Milner proceeded, "as if it was merely a question of tariffs. It is common ground that every part of the Empire should decide for itself to have as much or as little tariff as it pleases, but in my opinion it is only right and natural that your tariff should fall more lightly upon Empire goods than upon foreign goods. (Cheers.) That is the view taken by the Dominions, and that is the view taken by every country in the world which has oversea possessions, including more specially the United States. But if there were no such thing as a tariff the principle of preference would still hold good, for the idea at the root of it is that we are a family, a family of nations, and that in all our policy and dealings the interest of a family should come first. A man is not a less good citizen because he devotes himself to the legitimate interests of his own family. I maintain that it is not necessary that because an Englishman believes, as I myself believe, from the bottom of my heart in fair dealing between nations and in the essential solidarity of all human interests, he should therefore go in for a washy internationalism and pretend to care as much about the welfare of Paraguay and Bolivia as he cares about the welfare of Canada, South Africa, Australia, and New Zealand.

"It may be very wicked of me, but I do not care as much. (Cheers.) I want to see the resources of every part of the Empire, in so far as they are not needed for the development of that part, devoted not exclusively, but first and foremost, to build up the strength and prosperity of all the other parts. I feel that about emigration, the investment of capital, and a score of other questions with which I have daily to deal, and for these reasons I take so deep an interest in the work of the Royal Colonial Institute." (Cheers.)

THE IMPERIAL WAR CABINET.

THE IMPERIAL CONFERENCE AND THE PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCE.

EXTRACT FROM HOUSE OF LORDS DEBATES ON 17TH JUNE, 1920.

LORD CHARNWOOD had the following notice on the paper:—

"To call attention to the statement made by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons on the 17th May, 1917,* in regard to 'the whole question of perfecting the mechanism for "continuous consultation" about Imperial and Foreign Affairs between the "autonomous nations of an Imperial Commonwealth"' (together with India), and to the resolution passed by the Imperial War Cabinet on the 30th July, 1918, in regard to the same matter; and to ask His Majesty's Government whether they can assure the House that the object in question will continue to engage their full and earnest consideration, and be pursued by every active step upon their part which may from time to time seem appropriate."

The Secretary of State for the Colonies (Viscount Milner): My Lords, I hope that the degree of interest felt by members of your Lordships' House in the important question on the paper may not be measured by the numbers present at this moment. I would rather hope that the paucity of the attendance is due to the fact that the majority of your Lordships agree with the mover in thinking—and I thank him for the expression of the thought—that His Majesty's Government is not indifferent to the importance of the question he raises, and that it can be relied upon to do all that is possible for the time being to promote the objects which he has in view. I think I may fairly say that is the case.

In an early part of his speech the noble Lord seemed to harbour the fear that it might still be possible for the people of the Dominions to feel a certain nervousness lest, in any proposals made in this country to bring about more harmonious co-operation between the different Governments of the Empire, there might be some idea of bringing the Dominions into a new form of subjection. I really think that the time is now long past when any impression of that kind can reasonably be entertained by even the most nervous of Dominion statesmen or Dominion citizens. It is now common ground I take it—I have said it so often that I am almost ashamed to repeat it—that we gladly accept the position, and look upon it as a step in the progress of the Empire and of humanity, that we are all equal under the King and under the Crown, and there is no kind of authority which, in practice, whatever may be the theory of the Constitution, the Parliament and people of the United Kingdom claim any longer to exercise over the Parliaments and peoples of the self-governing Dominions. We frankly accept the position that we are partner-nations of equal status, though obviously the oldest, still by far the wealthiest, of all these States and the one with the most world-wide possessions, relations and interests has, by common consent—it is merely by consent—a certain position of leadership as head of the family. That is the ground on which we frankly take our stand.

That being admitted, some very important consequences follow. I entirely agree with the noble Lord—I suppose we all do—that it is a matter of supreme importance for the Empire and for the world that the self-governing Dominions of the Crown and the United Kingdom should continue to pursue a common policy. I will not say on every matter, but on all great international questions, and that, as Mr. Watt said the other day, in the councils of the world the Empire should speak with a single voice. If that is to be accomplished under present constitutional conditions, it can only be because the self-governing nations are agreed upon a particular policy. There is no power, as I think, in the Constitution as it exists to-day to impose the will of the majority upon one dissentient or recalcitrant member. If they are not agreed common action is not possible.

Fortunately, in the one great test in the experience of recent years—I mean the War—we were all continuously agreed about the policy as a whole and every main chapter of it. But, of course, it would be too sanguine to presume, because that fortunate result occurred in one particular important instance, that we can always count upon equally good fortune. We cannot always count upon it. We must frankly accept the position, and freely recognize that circumstances may arise in the future in which, even in a great international crisis, the action of the Empire may be paralysed or greatly weakened owing to the fact that there may not be agreement between all its self-governing parts, and that consequently, either nothing will be done or very much less effective action will be taken than would have been possible if all the partner nations of the Empire had been agreed. That would be a disaster. But it is a disaster which, in my opinion, is only likely to occur, if we lose during peace that close touch with one another which we, fortunately, managed to establish during the War.

I do not believe that on any great world question different views will be taken by the different parts of the British Empire, so long as they remain in intimate touch with one another and are able to consult steadily before any crisis arises. What I dread is the possibility of a clash because action had been taken by one member of the family—it most probably would be the United Kingdom—or because some course had been pursued in foreign policy by our Foreign Office over, perhaps, a number of years—quite possibly a right course, but one of which the Dominions were not aware—which course brought us face to face with a difficulty, a critical position, in which we should not find ourselves supported by other members of the family, simply because they did not know enough of the previous circumstances. Therefore, what seems of vital importance in this matter is to keep up continuous knowledge, on the part of all the self-governing members of the Empire, of the course which any one of them is pursuing (and in the main that means which the United Kingdom is pursuing) in matters of foreign policy.

What provision actually exists at present for common consultation, for exchange of views, and for framing, by deliberations with one another, a common policy of the Empire? I think what exists and what is being done in that direction is the main point of the question of my noble friend. At the risk of being rather tedious I should like to explain what the present system actually is, because there is a good deal of misunderstanding about it. On the one hand, we have had now for some time past meeting at intervals of several years an institution which was known in the first instance as the Colonial Conference but now as the Imperial Conference—a meeting of representatives from all parts of the Empire and from India, presided over generally by the Secretary of State for the Colonies but sometimes by the Prime Minister, at which broad questions of what you might call permanent Imperial interest are discussed and resolutions arrived at, which are merely in the nature of recommendations to the several Governments.

This Imperial Conference is frankly a Conference which has no authority to impose its decisions upon any one, but at the same time it is a gathering of very great influence. The leading statesmen of the Empire have generally been present at it, the deliberations have been very serious and important, and the resolutions of a body of that kind could not but have a considerable effect upon the conduct of affairs in the different countries there represented. As a matter of fact, a good deal of very useful work in pulling the Empire together has been the result of the meetings of this body.

We must look upon this Conference—the Imperial Conference proper—as a regular and permanent organ of our Empire Constitution. It has a Secretariat, a branch of the Colonial Office, which exists in order to pursue, in the intervals between the meetings of the Conference, the various questions which have been discussed at the Conference, to collect the material for future Conferences, and, so far as possible by addressing the various Governments, to see that the resolutions of past Conferences are carried out. The Conference is thus a permanent, an important, and very valuable instrument, and one which I believe will have growing effect. But an institution of that kind, meeting at long intervals, even if it is to some extent kept alive by the existence of the Secretariat I have described, is very far from being able to ensure the influence of the Empire being continuously brought to bear upon the direction of the affairs of the world in the way in which the influence of any unified Government can be exercised.

I mean to say that the Government of France, for instance, the Government of the United States, the Government of the United Kingdom, through their Foreign Offices and their representatives abroad, can exercise from day to day a continuous influence upon the course of world affairs. They are units continuously active. But the Empire—using that word to include all the self-governing Dominions as well as the United Kingdom—has no means of exercising such a continuous influence except in so far as the United Kingdom Government may exercise it. No Ambassador anywhere represents the Empire as a whole. Therefore, the question arises whether it is not up to us to devise some means of making the influence of the Empire as a whole—as distinct from the United Kingdom; something greater than the United Kingdom—continuously effective in the councils of the world.

Temporarily this has been achieved. A body was in existence which was known during the War as the Imperial War Cabinet, and during the Peace negotiations at Paris as the British Empire Delegation, which did exactly this thing. This body did bring the whole force of the Empire to bear from day to day upon the course of world events. It was a body entirely distinct from the Imperial Conference, totally different in its nature—a powerful executive engine of government. But of course it was only temporary in its constitution. It was a development of our own War Cabinet, itself a temporary institution, a body of five persons. The War Cabinet invited the Prime Ministers of the self-governing Dominions and the Secretary of State for India, as representing India, to take part in its councils, practically to become members of it. The body so constituted directed the War and was continuously active. It represented the whole force of the Empire; because not only was what is commonly described as the Imperial Government constantly represented on it by its principal members, but there were the heads of all the self-governing States of the Empire there; and it was as complete an Executive of the Empire as a whole as it is possible to conceive.

But, as I have said, it was by its nature a temporary institution. It was created for war purposes; and for various reasons it was bound—I will not say to come to an end, but at any rate to fall into abeyance at the end of the War. For one thing, the Prime Ministers of the self-governing Dominions could not continually be here; they had to go back to their own countries. Then, again, the British Cabinet changed its character and ceased to consist only of five people. It now consists of twenty or thereabouts, and the conditions which permitted of the introduction of the Prime Ministers of the Dominions into the heart and centre of the British Executive no longer exist to the same extent. And so the question arises, how we can reconstitute something like a genuine Imperial Executive in any future emergency. For though it is, of course, nothing like so important in times of peace as it was during the crisis of the War to make sure of being able to concentrate the whole power of the Empire and of having an Empire engine to direct it, yet it is still very important, even in times of peace, that it should be possible, perhaps not continuously but at any rate occasionally, to have an instrument of government not only able to discuss and talk about Imperial affairs but able to take action as representing the whole Empire.

This, I think, is generally recognized, and I cannot conceal from your Lordships that my own experience during the short time I have been at the Colonial Office has absolutely convinced me that something more is necessary than we have got in the Constitution of the Empire, something which does not exist at present, if the splendid harmony which prevailed between all parts of it in the War is not to be frittered away in peace, and if we are not to separate from one another and go different roads even without knowing it.

I am convinced that we shall be able to hold together on all matters of world importance only if we keep touch more closely than it is possible to do merely by means of Imperial Conferences held every four or five years. I am sure that something which brings the people in the different self-governing States of the Empire, who are actually responsible at the moment for the conduct of their affairs, into constant and close touch with one another is essential if the Empire is to play the great role it ought to play in the world.

Something of this kind must be done, and something of this kind is in the minds of statesmen not only here but in all the self-governing countries under the Crown. They are alive to the necessity of some more perfect organization to keep the Empire on the same lines of policy and, if necessary, to ensure its whole strength being thrown into the right scale at a critical moment. I quite agree with the noble Lord that the success of the League of Nations depends, above all, on the British nations (a League already by nature) being able to speak with one voice. I believe, if they do, that they will hardly ever differ on matters of supreme importance with the United States, and the two great Anglo-Saxon Powers could make the League a success and secure the peace of the world.

I have been perhaps diverted from my main point. The point I want to make is this. There is a general recognition in the self-governing Dominions of the Empire, as in this country, of the necessity for more complete and constant touch in order to ensure common influence and common action. That the necessity is felt in the Dominions is proved by the fact that the Imperial Government has been pressed strongly by all of them to hold a meeting as soon as possible, in order that the constitutional question may be discussed in all its details with a view to seeing how harmonious co-operation can be secured in the future. It was at one time hoped that this meeting would take place this year. As a matter of fact we are all now agreed that it must be put off until next year. The Governments of every part of the Empire have their hands so full at this moment with domestic questions, the aftermath of the War, that their leading men cannot be spared to meet at one spot during the present year, and, unless the leading men are there, it is of no use.

This meeting, if it is to be a success and put the future constitutional relations of the Empire on a good footing, must be practically a meeting of Prime Ministers. I do not mean to say that it should consist exclusively of Prime Ministers, but they would necessarily be the leading members of it, and their presence would be essential to its success. And this meeting, which has been described as a Constitutional Conference because it will be a conference to decide on the future constitutional relations of the different parts of the Empire, must not be confused with the periodical Imperial Conference which, as I have said, is already a regular and permanent institution. It may take the place of the Imperial Conference for a particular year, but it is, in its nature, distinct from

it. It will rather have the character of a Constituent Assembly trying to arrive at the basis upon which our relations with the Dominions are in future to be conducted.

This Constitutional Conference is contemplated for next year. It will be a meeting of extraordinary importance, but, pending its assembly, I do not know that it would be desirable or wise to put forward any particular schemes—certainly I do not feel disposed myself to put forward any particular scheme—for bringing about that harmonious action of the different parts of the Empire which, as I have pointed out, it is the object of the Conference itself to devise means to ensure. All I can say about it—and it is the only answer I can give to-day to the question of the noble Lord—is that, unless I have been wholly unsuccessful in explaining myself to your Lordships, the House will appreciate both the bigness and the difficulty of the problem and the fact that every aspect of it is, as I believe, constantly present to the minds of statesmen in the self-governing Dominions as well as to those of statesmen in this country.

I have tried to point out what already exists in the way of Imperial organization; what temporarily existed for a short time in the past and has now disappeared; and what is required to take its place, and the object at which we have to aim. But I think it would not be possible, neither would it be prudent, for me (I might defeat my own object) to lay down that this or that sort of body is to be created, or this or that kind of arrangement is to be made, in order to ensure the object which we all have at heart. I look forward with intense interest and with great hope to the meeting of the Constitutional Conference next year, and I trust it will not separate without having provided the British Empire with some organ of Government, based upon the recognition of the complete independence and equality of its different parts, which will nevertheless enable them to act promptly and effectively when they are all agreed, and to exercise in peace, at least to some extent, the beneficent, harmonious co-operation which was so brilliantly illustrated in the War.

STATEMENTS BY GENERAL BOTHA AND GENERAL SMUTS AS TO THE POSITION OF THE UNION OF SOUTH AFRICA.

No. 10.

EXTRACTS FROM PRESS CUTTINGS ENCLOSED IN THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL'S DESPATCH No. 675, OF 20TH AUGUST, 1919, RECEIVED 10TH SEPTEMBER, 1919.

"CAPE TIMES" (25th July, 1919).

(Extract.)

GENERAL BOTHA: We have been successful in obtaining for South Africa a higher independent position, and this is the first time in the history of this country that she has been recognized by the nations of the world as an independent nation. (Applause.) We have been placed upon the same footing, and are being treated in the same way as Belgium, Greece, and other smaller nations. That is to us a matter of the utmost importance.

A Signal Distinction.

We have now taken a worthy place amongst the nations, a richly deserved place, in consequence of what we have done in this War. (Cheers.) We may place this recognition of our status next to the establishment of the Union, as one of the milestones in our history, and as a natural result of that policy of union which was begun in 1910. But, more important still, not only have the nations recognized our status, but they have such confidence in us that they have entrusted to us the administration of the late territory of German South West Africa. (Cheers.) We therefore begin under theegis of the League of Nations with a large measure of confidence from the League, and I trust that the people of South Africa will show their appreciation of this confidence and build upon it. (Cheers.) We are no longer a child; we are now regarded as a man who can take the part of a man amongst the other nations. (Cheers.) Naturally, this measure of confidence carries with it a large measure of responsibility, but I have every confidence in South Africa. I am sure she will never forget her duty. (Hear, hear.)

GENERAL SMUTS: When he went to England some two-and-a-half years ago there was a suspicion among the people in South Africa that he was going in some mysterious way to prejudice South Africa. He was an Imperialist, perhaps a Jingo. While he was in England he had occasion to speak on many a platform, and the gospel he had preached uniformly on all these occasions was that the British Empire could only continue as a league of free, equal, independent States. That was the only basis on which it could endure. The old principles of federation were unworkable, and would lead to the break up of the Empire. The Empire had a great future as a league of free nations, bound by closer ties of common defence, etc. He thought his labours in this direction were not in vain. He certainly knew that the ideas of federation and a federal Constitution had disappeared like the morning mists, and to-day the accepted idea was this idea of a League of Nations which he had preached during the last two-and-a-half years. (Applause.) One of his speeches had been printed and had achieved a circulation of a million and a quarter copies. As the fruit of that policy South Africa was to-day the equal of other nations in the world in the greatest conference in the history of the world. (Applause.) British statesmen had accepted this new view of the Empire, and thus it was that the most important document in the War had been signed by their representatives as equals, not only of the other parts of the Empire, but of the great Powers of the world. (Applause.)

The Might of the Right.

GENERAL SMUTS: Before the War, and in days gone by, I and my friends felt the might of the British Empire; and we had a very considerable respect for that organization. (Laughter.) But you had to be at the Peace Conference at Paris, where all the great and all the small Powers of the world were gathered, to see what part the British Empire played in the counsels of the world, and you had to see the preponderance, not only of its enormous physical and political power, but its moral preponderance! (Applause.)

I came away from Paris, and, amongst others, one of my chief impressions was that, to-day, whatever the past may have been, and whatever the future may have in store for us, we have in the British Empire the most potent instrument, either for good or for evil, that has existed in the world. We have learnt the political lessons which could guide the Conference at Paris. When we were thrashing out the constitution of the League of Nations day after day and night after night in committee, it was the history of the British Empire and the precedent set by the British Constitution which gave us the clearest clue and the best guidance as to the course which we should pursue. (Cheers.)

And it was felt all round, and generally admitted, that in the political experience of the British Empire there was collected a fund of wisdom and of sound, practical commonsense which might serve the world well through the very difficult times that are ahead of us; and so, whether you look at it from a territorial, or a material, or a political, point of view, the group in the world to which we belong stands out as one of the greatest groups in history, probably the greatest that has been seen, or that the world will ever see. (Applause.) Now that must have a very far-reaching effect on the situation with regard to our own position.

Union's Increased Power.

General Botha has just told us that the position of South Africa to-day, and in the immediate past in the War, has been better than that of small neutral countries. The position of South Africa to-day is even more powerful, as a group, in this enormously preponderant group, than any of the small neutral nations in the world.

"RAND DAILY MAIL" (9th August, 1919).

(Extract.)

GENERAL SMUTS: Of three great results which had been achieved by the Conference the first was the new status which had been laid down for the British Dominions. He had watched things very carefully, as a member of the British Cabinet, for the last few years, and it was to him very plain that on the old pre-War basis the British Empire was not going to last.

There were, the speaker added, Dominions that were making efforts far beyond any other nation except the greatest Powers. The British Dominions had been making a war effort far greater than that which England made in the Boer War, and the English effort in the Boer War was considered the greatest in history since the wars of Napoleon. After those Dominions had undertaken those great duties, they were not going to revert complacently to a position of subordination in the British Empire. It was imperatively necessary, if the British Empire was to continue in the future, that the Dominion status should be entirely revised. He preached that doctrine in season and out of season, in public, and even more so in private.

He preached the doctrine to make people realize that if they set any store by the British Empire there should be a complete revision of the relations between the Mother Country and the Dominions. That object had been entirely achieved in Paris. (Applause.) It had been achieved not only by an arrangement between Great Britain and the Dominions, because that would not be sufficient in his opinion. It had not been achieved merely by a transaction between Great Britain and the Dominions. It had been achieved by a great international instrument to which all the great Powers of the world were parties. All nations, great and small, were parties to a document in which recognition was given to the new status of the Dominions. (Applause.) That had not been done sub rosa. It had been done with open eyes. The British people knew what it meant, the British Government knew what it meant, and the Powers that signed the document knew what they were doing.

Empire a League of Nations.

It was now more than ever true to say, as General Botha had said, that the British Empire was a league of nations in itself. (Applause.) A number of independent States was held together by common ties, common interests, and common defence, and in matters of foreign policy there would be common policy that would necessitate here and there a readjustment of forms in order to give expression fully to facts which existed, and that would be done at the next Imperial Conference. Proceeding, General Smuts said they heard talk about a republic. (Laughter.) "They do not know what they are talking about. (Renewed laughter.) We have got entirely beyond that stage. (Hear, hear.) We have taken another route which has reached a point behind the position they wanted to attain, and has completely outflanked every other position." (Applause.)

In time to come, said the speaker, that result would be looked upon as one of the most important departures in the history of the world. If that had happened a hundred years ago the United States of America would still be within the Empire. (Applause.)

A Hundred Years from now.

In a hundred years' time there might be dominions in the Empire as big as the United States. (Applause.)

EXTRACTS FROM SPEECHES BY GENERAL SMUTS, PRIME MINISTER, DURING A TOUR OF THE NORTH-WEST DISTRICTS OF THE CAPE PROVINCE, SEPTEMBER, 1919.

(Enclosure in Governor-General's despatch No. 822, dated 18th October, received 13th November, 1919.)

I. (a).

AT VICTORIA WEST.

"CAPE TIMES" (23RD SEPTEMBER, 1919.)

I HAVE given a great deal of thought to this question of South Africa taking its right place in the Empire, and when I went to England I found that there was a totally wrong movement afoot—a movement to establish an Imperial Federation. An organization was aimed at by which there would be one great Parliament for the whole British Empire. South Africa would send its members there as well, and that Parliament would represent all the Parliaments of the British Empire. I felt convinced that this was an impossible system, and you have seen that in England I most strongly protested against that system. You have seen that I made it perfectly clear to the English public that the system was absolutely impossible, and that the only basis on which the British Empire would exist in future was one of absolute liberty to all its different parts. (Hear, hear.)

"CAPE TIMES" (24TH SEPTEMBER, 1919.)

Before the South African War we were very keen on getting the recognition of our international status. The first Peace Conference was held at The Hague. It was in the beginning of 1898 or 1899, and we, as the independent Republics of the Transvaal and the Free State, wanted to be represented there. We wanted recognition of our status. You know what happened. The nations would not invite us. We could not appear there, and the Conference concluded without the Free State or the Transvaal being represented. Although we called ourselves independent Republics, the nations of the world would not recognize us. Therefore it was of great importance to us to know what the attitude of the nations of the world would be at the Paris Conference, and to know whether they would recognize the British Dominions as equal and independent States. You know what happened—the Dominions were recognized. General Botha and myself, on behalf of South Africa, and other statesmen on behalf of other Dominions, were at the Conference on absolutely the same footing as the representatives of other independent States of the world. (Hear, hear.) We were recognized as equals. We spoke there voted there, and signed there, exactly as the others did—(cheers)—and I say I am thinking back of the two Conferences—the one where we lost everything, the other where we were uplifted. We can feel that, not only have we got back what we lost at Vereeniging, but we have achieved a status which is recognized internationally by all the nations of the world.

You know that in the past British statesmen have always signed international documents on our behalf. If a treaty was entered into which was binding on the British Empire, then it was signed by the British Government. But in the Peace Treaty it has now been recognized, for the first time, that we shall not be bound here in the future by the signature of British statesmen but only by the signature of our own statesmen and our own representatives. Therefore the names of General Botha and myself are on the Peace Treaty on behalf of South Africa, alongside the names of those who had signed for other countries.

In future, if anything has to be done in the world to bind South Africa, the British statesmen cannot bind us, their signatures cannot bind us, and we shall be bound only by the signatures of our own representatives and our own Government. But we were not satisfied with that by itself. We felt that, although a great step forward had been taken, we wished to safeguard the position for the future, and, therefore, we saw to it that in the great League of Nations which was to be established to maintain the peace of the world in the future our position would be absolutely safeguarded, and that our status would stand on an absolute and definite basis, and that we would be recognized as the equal of any nation in the world. (Hear, hear.) You know that the document dealing with the League of Nations has been so drafted that all the Dominions of the Empire, including the Union, shall stand on the same basis and the same footing as all other nations, and on the same basis as England itself. You will in future have your own representatives on the League, independent of the representatives of England. Your representatives will sit on the League like the representatives of any other nation.

Your representatives of South Africa will have the same vote and the same voting power as England. Therefore, I say here, standing among my own people, and before the public of South Africa, that, after the humiliation of Vereeniging, we were in Paris lifted up and recognized, and granted for the future the status of a free and independent people in the British Empire.

AT LONDON.

"RAND DAILY MAIL" (25TH SEPTEMBER, 1919.)

In dealing with the constitutional position General Smuts pointed out that the last law which the British Parliament had passed for South Africa was the Constitution, which, at the request of the Union, in order to make it all the more valid, had been passed by the British House of Parliament. That was ten years ago. As a matter of fact, the British Parliament could not make or pass laws for South Africa. But, although the Union Parliament for the last ten years had had the exclusive legislative right, where foreign relations were concerned, British Ministers had still acted for South Africa. This position had now also been changed as a result of the Peace Conference, so that South Africa would be directly represented by its own representative. (Hear, hear.)

"RAND DAILY MAIL" (25TH SEPTEMBER, 1919.)

A Conference was to be held later in regard to the position of the Dominions. There were various matters to be settled respecting the new status of the Dominions. For instance, the position of the Governor-General would have to be altered, so as to be brought in accord with what had been laid down in the League of Nations.

III.

AT CARNARVON.

"RAND DAILY MAIL" (26TH SEPTEMBER, 1919.)

We can be a free people even within the British Empire. My view is that the British Empire is an alliance of free States, of which we have one King, and that is the bond which keeps us together. The British Government is not the bond: the King is the bond. (Hear, hear.) He is the King of England, King of India, and King of South Africa, and the other parts. Under the alliance we keep together and protect each other, and help each other financially, with advice and otherwise, each according to its own light. (Hear, hear.) That is my conception of the British Empire, and that is the right conception. That is the conception which has triumphed in the counsels in Paris. We are in a great alliance, just as there are other alliances in the world. (Cheers.) You need not have a republic to be free; you are free in the British Empire. (Cheers.)

EXTRACT FROM A SPEECH OF THE PRIME MINISTER OF THE UNION OF SOUTH AFRICA (GENERAL SMUTS) IN THE HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY, 23RD JUNE, 1920.

("Cape Times," 24th June, 1920.)

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Dealing with the League of Nations, General Smuts said that Mr. Beyers had spoken with satisfaction and glee that that League was a total failure, and it seemed to the honourable member to be a joy and a pleasure. If many of them and millions of people at present were disappointed with the position of the League of Nations, it was not a matter of joy, although Mr. Beyers seemed to gloat over his announcement. He (General Smuts) was free to admit that so far, in its early days, the League of Nations had not responded to the great hopes that were entertained for it, and he said so with the greatest sorrow, because he felt that something ought to be put before the world, for there was no doubt that it was sinking under the burdens thrown upon it, and that the foundations had been undermined.

Earnest minds of all races had looked forward to some new hope, vision, and ideal which might raise the world again and on to a better foundation, and the League of Nations was the ideal that had been looked forward to by all the most earnest minds as a means that might lift the world again from the abyss into which it had sunk, and was at present sinking. Well, the League had not done so yet, but let them not on that ground rejoice over its failure. Let them, rather, in the words of Mr. Merriman, pray that it might be made a reality and a real power—(cheers)—and let them not try to cut themselves adrift from it and "out of the mess." Let them rather bend their energies, and lend their strength to make that institution a reality in the affairs of the world. (Cheers.)

There were several circumstances which had militated against the success of the League. The greatest of all, perhaps, was what he might call the defection of America, and there was no doubt that the League had been largely dependent on the strength and support of America for its initial success. America to-day was the greatest and most powerful nation on earth, and it could have brought to the League influences and resources which were absolutely needed to-day if the world was to be picked up out of the slough of despond; but it had not chosen to play the part of moral leader of the world. He hoped the time was coming when America would understand and appreciate what the position was. They ought not to condemn and express judgment.

The time would come when America would realize her great responsibility, and not allow the gravest of all issues to be a matter of party politics. America was suffering from the same disease as they in South Africa were—an excess of party spirit—which seemed to enter into all the relations of life and to poison it. It made it impossible for people to look at matters in the true spirit, and one that did not deflect their judgment into the wrong direction. But whatever the reason was, it did not become them to pass judgment on America. It might be that after the presidential election America would take up her true position and help to pull the League through these initial difficulties.

WHAT UNITED STATES OF AMERICA IS INFLUENCED BY.

America was influenced partly by the Monroe doctrine, which they thought was endangered, and also by the six votes given to the British Dominions. We had fought that out in Paris with President Wilson and the other Powers, and had made it clear that the Dominions must not enter the League unless they did so on the basis of freedom and equality with the other nations of the world. (Cheers.) They were not going to be members of the League on any basis of subordination to any other people, but that had not been appreciated in America, which still looked upon them as subordinate members of the British Empire. But as America appreciated the position she would find that there ought to be no division whatever on these votes which had been given to the free nations which composed the British Empire. (Hear, hear.)

The second difficulty about the League had been the matter referred to by Mr. Merriman—the activities of the Supreme Council alongside of the League—that Council having continued its activities in connexion with the Peace Treaty, and in its operations had been conducting practically all the foreign affairs of the world. The result was that the League had "apparently" been superseded (he did not say "actually"), and had been left with work of smaller concern or no work at all, while the real work had been done by the Supreme Council; that was, by the Great Powers. The result was that the impression had spread to which Mr. Merriman gave expression, and which he hoped was wrong, that the Supreme Council was usurping the functions of the League, and that the latter was being pushed into the background; that the League had been intended as a sop to ideals and democracy, and that, having served its purpose, it could be put aside. That was not his impression. Very powerful voices had been heard throughout the world raised against what is going on, and General Smuts said he hoped the time was not far off when the Supreme Council would recognize that it was best after all for the reconstruction and recovery of the world that the Supreme Council should not conduct its activities separately from the Council of the League of Nations, but that the two bodies should combine. If the Supreme Council did not help the League, then it would be seen what grave dangers there were before the world. Of the five great Powers, two were already disinteresting themselves to some extent. Both America and Japan were standing apart, and they were left with Great Britain, France, and Italy. Italy was struggling with an overpowering load of internal difficulties, and it was almost impossible to look to her for any great strength in the great affairs that had to be dealt with. So there were left Great Britain and France to be responsible for this state of affairs which had arisen in the world, and which had to be remedied. It was hopeless to expect that two Powers could right the situation which to-day existed in the world, and which was daily becoming worse. If the situation continued he was afraid they were running very grave risks, for other contingencies would arise. The danger was that other Powers would combine and range themselves against those two and the world would be again drawn into dissensions. On all those grounds he thought it was eminently desirable that the activities of the Supreme Council should be merged as soon as possible with the Council of the League of Nations, and in that way the League would get the support and do the work it was meant to do, and would gain a really substantial footing in the affairs of the world. That was the second great blow that had been received by the League of Nations. The third had been the Polish war, which had undoubtedly done more to make people realize the apparent impotency of the League than anything else. Whatever might be the formal aspects of the matter, in substance a great new war was starting in Europe, by a nation which was the creation of the League.

BALL SET ROLLING BY POLAND.

A ball had been set rolling by Poland, and no one could see how far it would roll. Everyone knew the history of Poland. How it had been crushed in former centuries between the upper and the nether millstones. Poland was entirely dependent for her future success on a condition of peace, yet she had embarked on this policy of foreign aggrandisement. She claimed a portion of Russia which contained twenty-six million people, mostly Russian, and wanted the Ukraine, and thus tries to get still more of Russia. It was an impossible situation. He had already given in public the strongest expression of his personal views.

MR. CRESWELL: Only your personal views?

GENERAL SMUTS: "I can only express my personal views. No man at this distance from the scene of operations can undertake to give an official opinion on such matters." It was clear, said General Smuts, that the great European statesmen dealing with this matter were perplexed and puzzled how to act, and it would be folly on his part to rush in where those great men feared to tread. He agreed that South Africa as a member of the League was entitled to express its opinions and to point out the dangers which existed. Members were quite right in expressing their opinions, and he was afraid that if instances like the invasion by Poland were allowed to pass unchallenged, the League would become hopeless and futile. It was only by focussing public opinion on these events that they would be able to right the situation. Poland was entirely dependent on public opinion for her future, and all over the world he believed public opinion was forming against the action of Poland, and it was as strong in Great Britain as in any other part of the world. Opinion was being formed which would have the result that the action of Poland might give the League its opportunity of making people realize that unless the League was forced to and did take action the future of Europe would be very dark indeed. He was afraid it was very little realized how bad the state of the world really was, and how weak the foundations for any institution intended to maintain peace and order in the world.

Mobilize Public Opinion.

The situation was such as to entirely baffle description. It was going from bad to worse, and unless something almost providential happened in the future it was difficult to see how starvation among a very large portion of Europe could be prevented. Moral and intellectual conditions were far worse than the physical conditions, and so far there were no foundations for the League to work on, and unless they could mobilize the tremendous force of public opinion all over the world, he did not see what would happen in the old world, and that was why he felt their debate might have its little influence in assisting in the formation of that public opinion which would eventually force the Great Powers to support the League, and in that way to bring about a better state of affairs. A few questions had been put to him. In the first place Mr. Creswell asked whether South Africa had representatives on the League, and in what way they communicated with the League. The League had been formed and was actually in existence. All the Powers who fought on the Allied side, with the exception of America, had joined it, and also all the neutrals. President Wilson had called the first meeting of the Council of the League, and that had been sitting in London dealing with certain important affairs of the world. The general assembly of the League had not yet been called, and had not met, and in those circumstances the Government did not feel itself called on to select representatives. On the Council of the League of Nations they had no representatives save the official British representative, but they were represented on the general League of Nations, so it had not been possible for them to take any action in regard to the activities of the League. All that had been done was to press upon the British Government the views held strongly in this country, and some time to bring those views directly to the attention of Mr. Balfour, who was the British delegate on the Council, and was President of the Council of the League of Nations, so that in a semi-official way that action had been taken. Mr. Merriman had referred to the question of the amount of the contribution to the expenses of the League. That amount was dependent on a clause which stated that members should contribute to the expenses of the secretariat on the same basis as they contributed to the International Bureau of the Postal Union. Twenty-five nations with great correspondence belonged to the first class of that Union, and South Africa happened to be among the nations of the first class in the Postal Union, and therefore paid on the same basis towards the expenses of the administration of the League as the Great Powers did. He noticed that some objection—not by South Africa—had been taken, and it was one of the matters which would be discussed at the forthcoming meeting at Brussels—the reallocation of the expenses among the members of the League. The influence of South Africa, which had been very great in the formation of the League, should give the League every chance, and he did not grudge the League one penny of the money if they knew the League was going to be a success and contribute towards the creation of a better world.

A NEW WORLD ORDER.

The British Government had an Ambassador in America who was paid a salary of £20,000, besides the expenses of running his office. Where we were asked to make a contribution of £20,000 to a body which was the recognition of our standing in the world, which was the formal means of recording our standing in the world, and which might possibly be the means of constituting a new world order in the generations to come, he thought it would be premature for us to raise any objection merely on the small ground of expense to the payment we were asked to make. (Hear, hear.) If the League were going to be an impotent and useless institution then he certainly would be one of the first to object to continuing this payment or making any payment at all. But he was hopeful that the League would get its chance. The circumstances of the world to-day were such that the League would and must take its chance, and when it did take its chance it might succeed in laying the foundation of the new world order.

If the League failed and we had to continue to settle the affairs of the world on the old basis of force and domination and wars, then he believed the outlook before the civilized races of the world was very black indeed. (Hear, hear.) He thought this ideal was powerful enough, and that it had internal strength enough to carry it through in the history of the world. It had made a very small, humble, and insignificant beginning, but he believed that it did embody a great ideal, that it embodied a great hope for mankind, and that that hope was strong enough and the circumstances of the world to-day were black enough to lead to its realization, to its growing force and to its becoming a real factor in the affairs of the world. (Hear, hear.) He could only reiterate what Mr. Merriman had said, and that was that they should not belittle the League, that they should not rejoice over its impotence and inactivity, but rather let them, as far as in them lay, not only for the sake of South Africa and the standing that the League had given us in the world, but for the sake of humanity, for the sake of those tremendous interests which were to-day in the greatest jeopardy in the world, contribute all their strength and influence in order to strengthen the position of the League.

THE EMPIRE PROBLEM.

The next point of importance which had been raised was in relation to the position of the British Empire. That was raised by Mr. Beyers, and more clearly, and he must say very fairly, by Mr. Langenhoven. Mr. Langenhoven had discussed the matter in a very clear and reasonable spirit, a spirit very different from Mr. Beyers's, who seemed to be actuated by a spirit of complete aversion to the affairs of the world, to the affairs of the British Empire, and to everything else except this Union of ours. "South Africa first and foremost" should always be our ideal here, but let it not be a selfish ideal. Let us remember that we were part of mankind, and that these calamities which overwhelmed the world in our day and generation were due to the exclusiveness, the selfishness, which nations had developed in the course of their history in modern times.

Unless we could get away from that spirit of exclusion and of selfishness we were likely to see a recurrence at some date or other of those calamities which had already come over the world. Let us feel that we were members of one another, that the human race was one and that the affairs of the world and the affairs of the Empire did concern us in the closest manner. We felt that we had concerns with the world. Our ordinary mercantile affairs brought us into touch to-day with many other countries. The subject which had been discussed here in recent months more than any other was the question of exchange. The exchange question was simply an expression of our commercial, economic and mercantile relations with other parts of the world. It had been brought home to us in the most tangible and understandable way that we were linked up economically with the rest of the world. That was a recognition of the basic fact that the nations of the world were one.

THE NEW SITUATION.

In the British Empire we had quite a peculiar situation of that character arising. The British Empire to-day consisted of a number of free nations who were under one common Sovereign and who had to conduct their affairs on a common basis, and the question was how could that be done? Mr. Langenhoven had read portions from Lord Milner's speech in which he gave his ideas as to how these affairs of the British Empire as an institution should be conducted in future. Lord Milner pointed out the difficulties which arose from the situation. The old system had departed. Under the old system of Empire, which no longer existed, there was one dominant member who could conduct affairs for the rest and could speak for the rest. When you had one mighty British Government with an undisputed supremacy in law and fact, that central Government could speak for all portions of the Empire. That situation disappeared. There was no longer one strong central Government in the Empire which wielded authority over the others and could speak for the others. An entirely new order of things had arisen, which he had tried to explain to this country in his recent speeches, which was becoming generally accepted and which was also given expression to in this speech by Lord Milner.

The problem that now arose was how were they going to conduct the affairs of this Empire upon a common basis where they had no longer one great Power speaking for the whole, but six independent, equal, free members of this great League? Lord Milner in this speech of his discussed in the first place the Imperial Conference, and pointed out the Imperial Conference did not really answer the needs of the case any longer. He pointed out what had been pointed out by him (General Smuts) and many others—that the time had come for them to clear up the situation which had arisen. The change that had come about was recent. It found its formal expression in our presence and our participation in the deliberations at Paris and in our signing the Peace Treaty. That was the formal recognition of the new position of the Dominions—that in foreign relations they were to take a part and speak for themselves, and that they would no longer be bound by the voice and signature of the British Government. Paris and the Peace Treaty was the formal recognition of the great new departure that had taken place. Nothing had happened since Paris. Paris was simply the first step, the formal recognition. We had to follow the position in all its details if we wanted to reach clearness and definiteness as regards our position in the Empire and the relations of these nations in the Empire. That was inevitable.

A CASE IN POINT.

Take, for instance, the method by which our correspondence was conducted with the British Empire. There was the Colonial Office in London. All our correspondence—with some exceptions—all our formal correspondence from this Union was conducted with the Secretary of State for the Colonies through the Colonial Office. Now it was felt that that was an anomaly. The Colonial Office, such as it was to-day, was a right and proper institution years ago when the British Empire was on the old basis, but on the new basis why should we conduct our correspondence with the Colonial Office? It was felt in England and by the British Government just as strongly as it was felt in South Africa that a change was required there. In the same way there were many other questions which had to be cleared up. There were questions of the Constitution, there were theoretical questions which had to be cleared up, and there were practical questions which ought also to be cleared up, in order that the Dominions might know exactly where they stood and where they were in this new position which they admittedly occupied in the world to-day, and not only in the world but in the British Empire.

The only way to clear up the situation was to call this constitutional conference, and he hoped that this conference, if it were called next year, would be able to go thoroughly into the whole position, and on the basis of the equality of the various parts of the British Empire frame a scheme which would make it possible for us to be free, to be equal, but, subject to the retention of our freedom and equality, to see in what way we could conduct the affairs of the Empire in which we were all interested on a common basis. Mr. Langenhoven had drawn an inference from Lord Milner's speech to which he (General Smuts) would like to draw attention. He had inferred and expressed the idea that this could only be done by the majority binding the minority, that you could only conduct the common affairs of the Empire in future by the majority binding the minority, and he had argued, and argued quite rightly, that if that were so, then this new order that was going to be built up in the Empire would mean an inroad on the local autonomy of the separate parts of the Empire.

There were other similar anomalies arising. Take the position of the Governor-General. In former days he was a representative of the Colonial Office in the old, now non-existent Colony. The position had changed, and the old self-governing Colony had become a Dominion of entirely different position and standing, and the Governor-General ought now no longer to be the representative of the British Government or the Colonial Office in the Dominions. That was admitted. Under the new system the Governor-General should be what he is called under the Constitution, the representative of the King and nothing else, whereas the Governor-General, instead of being the representative of the King and the supreme executive power in the Dominion, also represents in some undefined way the British Government and the Colonial Office. That was a second anomaly which had arisen and which ought to be cleared away.

FOREIGN RELATIONS AND AFFAIRS.

There was a third much more serious matter, and that was the matter referred to by Mr. Hees in the course of the debate, when he asked what was the position of South Africa in regard to her foreign relations and affairs. The British Government seemed to be conducting, just as heretofore, the foreign affairs and relations of the Empire. We had taken to ourselves the right of equality, but in practice we are still represented in our foreign relations by the diplomats of the Foreign Office. That was the case, and that was one of the anomalies that existed now. Although we had risen to the position such as he had described, yet, as their institutions were to-day and the conditions which existed to-day in the British Empire, they had practically nothing to say in regard to their foreign relations. Although the Dominions enjoyed the new status, yet they found no reflection of it in the administration of their foreign affairs. With regard to commercial affairs the matter was different, as the Dominions had their own trade representatives all over the world. They were represented by their officer at Lourenco Marques, and, indeed, all the Dominions were represented, but apart from commercial relations as regards diplomatic representation and foreign policy the British Government was supreme and controlled the situation.

AN HONOURABLE MEMBER: What about Canada?

THE CANADIAN PRECEDENT.

GENERAL SMUTS: Canada is the first alteration that has been made. In the case of Canada the position has become so acute that it became necessary to make a departure of most far-reaching consequences. Canada was now and in the future to be represented by her Minister Plenipotentiary with full power on behalf of Canada to conduct negotiations with the United States of America Government at Washington. That was the first indication of the great change that was coming. The matter had not gone farther. That was the first precedent, and members could see that a new situation had arisen in the new status of the Dominions, which required reconsideration of the whole matter. He had been met with arguments and questions in South Africa, on every platform throughout the country, on this subject, and he had asked that these matters should be cleared up, because unless they were and they wanted to see the Empire break up, those discrepancies would have to be removed. If there was to be closer union, they should have this conference, and doubts should be cleared away and the constitutional position as now developing should be laid down and understood, especially in the United States of America, as there was no doubt that there was a complete misunderstanding in that country about the world's position of the Dominions. The people of America showed this in the fight they made in the Senate against the representation given to the Dominions in the League of Nations. It was for this purpose that a constitutional conference was necessary. He agreed with Lord Milner and what had been said, and if this conference did its work in a proper way it would become a great landmark in the history of the British Empire and of the world. Such a conference, he hoped, would be called next year, and he hoped South Africa would take its part. With regard to the claim made by Mr. Langenhoven, he thought that in a matter of such importance the House should have an opportunity of full discussion before the South African representatives proceeded to London or wherever the conference might be held. He hoped that full opportunity would be given to the country and to Parliament to express its views on this far-reaching question.

MR. LANGENHOVEN: You hope, or you undertake?

GENERAL SMUTS: I cannot undertake, but if that should happen I hope that the representatives will make as great a fight for this country as I have made in the past. There was a consensus of opinion about the sort of questions which should be discussed at this constitutional conference, and General Smuts thought that there was a general trend of opinion all over the British Empire as to the sort of answer that ought to be given to this question. He believed that as things were developing in the British Empire—not only in Great Britain, but in the Dominions—there was practically a unanimous opinion that the British Empire could only continue to exist on the basis of complete freedom and equality. The old basis of force and subjection had passed away. A new world had arisen and a new Empire had to be moulded in consequence. That raised another point referred to—how it would be possible for the Empire to speak with one voice. It was felt that if the British Empire had to exert its real influence in the affairs of the world it could be only by complete unanimity. He asked how that could be achieved. It was inferred from Lord Milner's speech, though he did not say so—in fact, he knew better than to say so—that the only way that unanimity could be achieved would be to give the majority power to pass resolutions on behalf of the Empire, and that the majority would be in a position to bind the minority. If that were so, said General Smuts, then he agreed with Mr. Langenhoven that, however much they might talk about liberty and equality, they would be worse off, and they were not going to be coerced by the majority of the Empire in these matters. No resolutions should be taken without the unanimous consent of all the members of the Empire. Let them look to that as bedrock, and he would never agree to the voice of South Africa being smothered or the opinion of South Africa being coerced by the majority vote of the rest of the British Empire, and he was sure that the other Dominions would take up the same position. If Australia were to be coerced or an attempt made in that direction, then the Empire would not continue to exist. That was common ground, and that was the ground which should be taken not only by the Dominions, but by the British Government—that no resolution could be taken binding on any part of the Empire without its free consent. What remained? asked General Smuts. There remained only one method, which Lord Milner described as an exchange of ideas, free discussion among members trying to understand the difficulties and looking to the future. There could be no force, no coercion, no majority vote binding the minority. The only way would be the conference system, and if they could agree to take a resolution well and good; and if they could not do so, then they would have to go on without agreeing. That was the only system, and he was sure that if they brought together the important statesmen from the various parts of the British Empire and they discussed these great questions which concerned them in common—the questions of foreign relations, common defence, trade, and so on, not only in their own relations, but also in their relations with the rest of the world—he was sure that in the great majority of cases it would always be found that some solution would be arrived at, and that if it were impossible to reach a conclusion, then they would have to agree to differ on the point. That was the only basis for the future.

UNIQUE POSITION OF SOUTH AFRICA.

He felt that it was entirely in the interests, not only of the British Empire, but of the world, that there should be such a conference system where they discussed each others affairs. He was assured that it was entirely in the interests of the Dominions to have this free discussion and complete interchange on all matters affecting them in common, and if that were done they would remain the Empire of the world. He wanted South Africa to exert its influence in the world. In South Africa they took a humble view of their own position. They were a small people, and they forgot the part they had to play in the great world, and they overlooked the importance that they really played in world movement. He was struck by Mr. Lloyd George's letter to General Hertzog, in which he said that South Africa exerted a far greater influence at Paris through its representatives than had been done by more important Powers at the Peace Conference. South Africa stood with its feet in both worlds. One section of its population, unlike the other British Dominions, had one foot on the continent of Europe and the other foot on the British Isles, and very often its point of view was dominated by the continental aspect of the case. The newer population came from the British Isles, and they were more and more dominated by the English point of view. That gave South Africa a very peculiar and a very important position, and that was why they could see both sides of the case better, perhaps, than statesmen in other parts of the world. It was in their blood and training—(cheers)—and he was sure their position was such, not only on racial grounds, that it entitled them to exert great influence in the affairs of the world, only, he said, do not let them isolate themselves. Let South Africa speak and they would listen to her voice. (Cheers.) He feared nothing for the future. Mr. Langenhoven had spoken with a great deal of personal bitterness against him, and had twitted him with his past and his present, and Mr. Van Hees had done the same.

MR. LANGENHOVEN: Not an atom. (Ministerial dissent.)

GENERAL SMUTS said he would accept this denial. (Hear, hear.) Let him say, however, that he had not changed in the least. The things he stood and fought for twenty years ago he stood for to-day. (Ministerial cheers.) He was then for this country, great and free and independent, and so he was to-day, and so he hoped to be in the future. But he had changed in one respect, and let him admit it freely. In the old days he thought the only path by which their ideal could be reached was by a Republic in South Africa, and for that Republic he fought, but he had learned from the events in which he had taken part since, that there was another way for South Africa to become great, free and independent without taking the road which he thought was essential twenty years ago. It was not necessary to talk about secession or the right to secede in order to achieve the ideal they were after. He was as sure as he stood there, and speaking with the seriousness of a man who had paid a heavy price for these things, that the people of this South Africa could be free and happy and in complete control of its destinies without running all those risks and embarking on those enterprises which on the alternative road would be necessary. That was the position. It seemed to be clear that if they wanted to reach their goal, and if they wanted to remain in harmony with the British Empire and keep all the parts working in harmony together for so long as Providence should will it so, they must follow this system. It was a system of free deliberation and consent. The final decision so far as this Union was concerned rested, and would always rest, with one country and one body only, that was South Africa, the South African Parliament and Government. Let it be clearly understood that, so far as he was concerned, whatever decision was to be taken and whatever final say was to be said with regard to South African affairs, it would not be said in London, nor at any conference, but by the people, the Parliament and the Government of this country; but subject to that overruling condition. Let them talk together and discuss their affairs, and in that way keep together in the future. He was sure that was the way of affairs all over the world to-day. Nations were ceasing more and more to be isolated within their own boundaries, and it was necessary for the whole world to talk together to exchange ideas and so prevent the danger of misunderstanding. It was a position which was growing more and more. It was an international situation growing out of the difficulties of the past and the developments now with us. He hoped South Africa, without any fear, with open eyes and with faith in the future, would embark on this road, protecting her rights and continuing her status, and determined always to do the best for herself, but never in a selfish way, to co-ordinate her own interests with those of the British Empire and the world as a whole. He hoped the honourable member understood now how he took Lord Milner's statement. He took it as entirely harmless. Not only as harmless, but as entirely required by our own interests here. That conference was wanted, and South Africa's position required to be made clear to see if it were not possible to develop the system he referred to so that we might live on terms equivalent with the rest of the Empire and in peace with it.

EXTRACTS FROM QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS IN THE HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY, 8TH JUNE, 1920.

(“CAPE TIMES” 9TH JUNE, 1920.)

GENERAL SMUTS ANSWERS MR. BEYERS.

MR. BEYERS asked the Prime Minister whether he would, before Parliament was prorogued, state to the House what the intentions of Government were with regard to the Imperial Conference of 1921 for discussing our relations to the Empire?

General Smuts replied: It is probable that Parliament will meet again after the present session and before the Imperial Conference assembles. The Government therefore considers a statement such as is asked premature during this session.

Mr. Beyers next asked whether, in view of the practical equality of the Union with the United Kingdom, the Government was prepared to introduce legislation declaring that all Acts of the British Parliament, and especially the Colonial Laws

Validity Acts of 1865, in so far as they affected South Africa, were inoperative and null and void in the Union; and, if not, why not?

"No," replied General Smuts. "The situation was fully explained in the debates in this House during the last special session. No further action is contemplated."

Mr. Beyers then asked whether, in view of the practical equality of the Union with the United Kingdom, the Government will introduce legislation declaring the decisions of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of South Africa in every respect final, without any right, direct or indirect, of further appeal to the Privy Council or to the King for leave to appeal to the Privy Council?

"No," again replied General Smuts. "Appeals to the Privy Council are regulated by the South Africa Act, which we do not intend to repeal in this respect."

APPOINTMENT OF GOVERNOR-GENERAL.

Mr. Beyers had a further question, which was: Whether the Government will in future see that the appointment of the Governor-General takes place solely on the advice of the Government of the Union of South Africa, and not on the advice of the British Government as hitherto; and, if not, why not?

"No," once more General Smuts replied. "The subject affects all the Dominions equally, and it is not for South Africa to take isolated action." (Laughter.)

Mr. Beyers finally asked: Whether in view of the practical equality of the Union with the United Kingdom the Government will introduce legislation or a motion declaring that the so-called right of veto of the King with regard to the legislation of the Union will in future mean nothing more than the right of veto of the King in relation to legislation of the British Parliament; and, if not, why not?

"No," General Smuts said, amid further laughter. "The King's veto rests on the provisions of the South Africa Act, which it is not intended to repeal in this respect. No veto has been exercised by the King over Acts passed by the Union Parliament."

Mr. J. W. G. Steyn asked: Whether, in view of the practical equality of the Union with the United Kingdom, the Government is prepared to take steps for acquiring a Union flag which will in all respects supersede the British flag known as the Union Jack; and, if not, why not?

General Smuts replied: "No." The question of the flag of the Empire concerns all the Dominions, and should be discussed at the next Imperial Conference on constitutional relations."

EXTRACT FROM A SPEECH BY GENERAL SMUTS (PRIME MINISTER),
AT PRETORIA, ON 3RD DECEMBER, 1920.

"RAND DAILY MAIL" (4TH DECEMBER, 1920.)

THE BRITISH CONNEXION.

I HAVE explained the fundamental objects and standpoints of the South African Party and our attitude to South Africa's dominating racial problem. I proceed now to state our views on the Imperial connexion and on Imperial and external relations generally. What is our attitude towards the future position of the Union? Do we meet secession with a mere barren negative? Or have we a positive ideal to put in the place of the separatist republic of the Nationalist programme. To these questions our Party has definite and clear answers. (Applause.)

When the Nationalists speak of "independence," and of secession from the Empire as necessary to secure that independence, they are dominated by pre-War conceptions, and fail to take account of the fundamental change which the War and the peace have effected in the constitution of the British Empire. If by independence the Nationalists mean (as they allege) an independence which is friendly to, and in friendly association with, the British Empire, and not an independence hostile to the Empire, then I say in all sincerity and conviction that such an independence we can have in fullest measure without secession from the Empire. (Applause.) That is the great change in the status of the Dominions, to which I have often referred in my speeches.

The British Empire undoubtedly began as an Empire of the old type, the United Kingdom being invested with sovereign power over the subordinate parts (Colonies, Protectorates, and such like) spread over all the Continents. But the movement of that Empire was ever in the direction of more freedom to its subordinate parts, and from time to time free self-government was conferred on one colony after the other.

The movement went still further with the constitutions of the great Dominions which even before the War enjoyed full legislative and executive sovereignty, but only in respect of their own internal affairs. Their Parliaments had full power to pass laws, their Governments had full power to administer their affairs, but only within their territorial boundaries. Beyond their borders they had no power or authority. On questions of foreign relations with other countries, on questions of peace and war, they had no power or voice, and the United Kingdom spoke and acted for them. In other words, they had no international status.

That was the Empire which still existed on 4th August, 1914. When Peace was signed on 28th June, 1919, it had fundamentally changed; it had, in fact (as I have before said), ceased to exist. As a result of the War and the prodigious war efforts of the Dominions, and the determination of their statesmen no longer to occupy subordinate positions, the Dominions took part in the Peace Conference on an equal footing with the other Powers and States, and their representatives signed the Peace Treaty on behalf of their Dominions along with the representatives of the other Powers and States. (Applause.)

In other words, the international status of the Dominions inside the British Empire was recognized by all their co-signatory States. And in future the Dominions have in principle authority and power, not only in respect of their domestic questions, but also of their international or foreign relations, and the questions of peace or war which may affect them. If a war is to affect them they will have to declare it. If a peace is to be made in respect of them, they will have to sign it. (Applause.)

While all subordination in their status has disappeared, and their independence has been achieved, yet many of the old forms of subordination still remain, as there has not yet been time to work out the results achieved at Paris to their practical detailed conclusions. In a few years, however, this should be possible. (Applause.)

The principle of equality of national status between the United Kingdom and the Dominions will have to be worked out to its fullest conclusion. The last vestige of anything in the nature of subordinate status in that relationship will have to disappear.

STATE WITHIN THE EMPIRE.

These are not my boastful words: I quote the considered language of the present Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies. (Applause.) That is the road, the bloodless, constitutional road to independence which the South African Party proposes to take. (Applause.) We abjure secession, with its dangers and futilities. We desire to remain in the British Empire, but not in a dependent or subordinate status. (Applause.) As a free, equal, independent State in the British Commonwealth of Nations, which is taking the place of the old Empire; as a free, equal, sovereign member of the League of Nations, we wish to realize in peace and amity with the Empire and the world the destiny which Providence has in store for us. (Applause.)

We are as keen as the most ardent Nationalist to realize the future political greatness and independent status of the Union. The only difference between us is that we are travelling along a broad, well-marked, constitutional road which will assuredly bring us to our goal, while the Nationalists are bound to fail with their secession policy, just as they failed with their independence deputation to the British Government last year. (Applause.)

Surely this continual girding and gibing at the British Empire and the League of Nations is dangerous arrogance. (Applause.) This Nationalist policy of truculent isolation leads nowhere except to disappointment and trouble. (Applause.)

SOVEREIGN STATUS.

The South African Party is out for sovereign status for South Africa. (Applause.) So far from surrendering any of its rights to the League of Nations or to any Council of the Empire, it is for the fullest development and assertion of those rights. (Applause.)

But it recognizes gratefully that we are members of the British Commonwealth, and of the great body of civilization represented by the League of Nations. It recognizes also that the old order of State isolation and the rule of the strongest, which followed from it, is passing away. It sees a new world order arising, under which States will agree to peaceful co-operation and mutual protection, as do citizens in a State, and so make wars unnecessary and illegal. (Applause.)

It finds in both the new British Commonwealth and the League of Nations the beginnings of this new order of peace and justice, consultation and co-operation. (Applause.) And it wishes South Africa to be associated with her sister nations of the Commonwealth and of the League in endeavouring to make a success of this grand experiment, on which so much depends for the peace and welfare of the human race. (Applause.)

In all this there is no risk that the interests of South Africa will be sacrificed for external interests. For neither the constitution of the League nor of the Empire demands any action from us which we do not ourselves freely choose to take, either through our Parliament or our Government. No majority vote can bind us. (Applause.)

The international system now arising both in the League and the British Empire is not one of compulsion, but of free discussion, conference, and consultation among the nations, and no nation is bound to take any action without its own free consent given in accordance with its own constitution. That is the written constitution of the League of Nations, and that is and will remain the practice of the unwritten British constitution.

IMPERIAL RELATIONS.

As regards our Imperial relations especially, the South African Party favours the development of the periodic conference system between the various Governments of our Commonwealth with a view to removing possible causes of friction and misunderstanding, furthering the interests of the Commonwealth and its component States, and discussing workable ideas of common policies. We are opposed to closer union, either in the shape of Imperial Federation with legislative power, or an Imperial Council with executive power, in derogation of the status of the Dominions. (Applause.)

But, while leaving the legislative and executive rights of the Dominions intact, we favour the round table or conference system for discussion and consultation between the Governments in regard to the common interests and policies of our Commonwealth. This is our Empire policy, and it is utter nonsense to call this Imperialism. (Applause.)

CONFERENCE BETWEEN REPRESENTATIVES OF THE SOUTH AFRICAN PARTY IN THE CAPE PROVINCE, AND REPRESENTATIVES OF THE NATIONALIST PARTY IN THE CAPE PROVINCE.

No. 15.

EXTRACTS FROM ACCOUNT OF PROCEEDINGS AS GIVEN IN THE "CAPE TIMES" OF 6TH OCTOBER, 1919.

(Enclosure in Governor-General's despatch No. 822, dated 18th October, received 13th November, 1919.)

The last matter to come before the Congress was the most important—the upshot of the "hereniging" Conference with the South African Party Committee of five.

Mr. W. A. Hofmeyr, who acted as spokesman of the Nationalist "Hereniging" Committee, stated what had taken place. The South African Party Committee of five and the Nationalist Committee of five had met on Friday night, and Mr. P. van Aardt was elected Chairman. It was mentioned that the Congress of the South African Party had agreed on the principle of "hereniging," and, in conformity with the statement made by General Smuts at the Congress, which was stated to be on all fours with what he had announced in Parliament.

The South African Party members had then asked, with regard to the third clause of the "basis of hereniging" agreed to at Somerset East, whether Nationalist members understood by that that they should continue their republican propaganda, and the reply was in the affirmative. The other side thereupon said that they could not accept it.

They (the Nationalists) wanted to know whether the other twelve points of the Somerset East "basis" would be accepted, and the South African Party members said that on the whole they would.

After a long debate on the third article, and in order to accede to the request which had been made more clearly to describe what "true national principles" were, the Nationalist members had placed seven clauses before the joint meeting, which Mr. Hofmeyr read to the Congress, and the effect of which briefly was virtually the same as new clause 4 of the programme of principles of the Nationalist Party, fully referred to in Saturday's issue.

The South African Party members, on their side, gave their version, which Mr. Hofmeyr also read out. There were thus, he said, four declarations before the gathering of the Committee: (1) Somerset East basis; (2) the Prime Minister's declaration; (3) the Nationalist declaration; and (4) the South African Party declaration. The South African Party members did not agree to the "Union being placed on exactly the same basis as the United Kingdom," nor with the sentences dealing with the "ultimate ideal of sovereign independence."

Present Position Accepted.

The Nationalists accepted the British Commonwealth of Nations, but did not accept that the matter should always remain there.

Old Article 4 of the Nationalist programme of principles had led to some difference of opinion as to what its exact meaning was, said Mr. Hofmeyr, and therefore a new Article 4 had been drawn up, which more clearly stated what their intentions were, but the South African Party members would not accept that new article. He must point out that that new article had not been drawn up for the purposes of "hereniging," although it so happened that it had been adopted just at that time.

It was agreed that both sides desired the Union to develop on evolutionary lines, but it was a question of what methods were to be employed. Pertinent questions were thereupon asked the South African Party members, dealing with specific matters, and these Mr. Hofmeyr read out.

They may be summed up as follows:—

(1) Are you in favour of the Union having its own flag?—South African Party reply: Yes.

(2) Are you in favour of a free overseas market for our gold and other products?—Reply: Yes, because we have such a free market already.

(Laughter from Nationalist Congressmen.)

(3) No more contribution to Navy, and our own Union Fleet?—Yes, if it is possible.

(4) Own mint separate from that of the United Kingdom, and own Union coinage?—Yes, if it is to economic benefit of South Africa.

(5) No more titles in South Africa, cf. Canada?—We have no mandate from our Congress. In principle we are not against it, but at the present time it is not advisable to abolish them, because it may lead to friction and misunderstanding. It is a question of individual freedom to accept or reject titles.

Governor-General from Union.

(6) Do you favour a Union Governor-General, appointed by His Majesty, on the advice of his Union Ministers?—Yes.

(7) Do you agree that the Union should be neutral in case of world war?—Yes.

(8) And if England declares war or concludes peace?—Yes. It follows from the other answer. We consider ourselves free as regards all interior and foreign matters.

(The answer appeared to cause a good deal of pleased astonishment and cheers.)

(9) Do you favour our having our own Consuls and Ambassadors in other countries?—In principle, yes. If it does not cost too much. (Laughter).

(10) Do you agree that British Colonial Laws Validity Act should be repealed?—We do not like to give an opinion, as we are not acquainted with that Act, but if it is as you say, we answer, yes.

(11) Do you favour abolition of King's right of veto, or rather, if he exercises his veto, that it should be on the advice of his Union Ministers and not on that of his British Ministers?—Yes.

(12) Do you agree to British garrison being sent to Union without our consent?—We prefer our own defence system, and to look after defence of Union ourselves.

One Radical Difference.

"In all these practical matters," continued Mr. Hofmeyr, "you see that, with a few exceptions, they are in agreement with us. (Cheers.) Well, it is said that there is a radical difference between us. They object to our republican propaganda. We, on our part, do not desire to use violent methods, but desire to go to work on constitutional lines, and we cannot give up the ideal of ultimate independence. (Cheers.) We cannot promise to put an end to our raising this matter in public. If you do not allow people to express what is in their minds and hearts, and you bottle up their feelings, you only get just what our friends of the South African Party want to avoid—a revolution. (Hear, hear.) We do not want to force republicanism. We do not say that there should be a republic if there is only a small majority of the public of the Union in its favour, because we do want to consider the minority. Minorities also have their rights. (Hear, hear.)"

"However, they could not agree with us on this matter, and stuck to the declaration of the Prime Minister that we cannot at any time secede. They argued that republican propaganda will lead to trouble and dissension, and they said, or hinted, that some day a change might come about somehow, and this may bring about our freedom, but they would not be with us in our propaganda, which they objected to. And there the matter rests for the present. On this matter we could not see eye to eye."

Mr. F. W. Beyers, K.C., M.L.A., said that he desired to correct one little thing Mr. Hofmeyr had said, which had reference to the King's veto. The King had a veto; but it did not depend on the advice of his British Ministers. It was his veto, but it was purely theoretical, and had not been exercised in practice for the last two hundred years.

Mr. Fremantle's Fear.

Mr. Fremantle asked whether the matter of a resident Union Minister in London had been raised, because he held that if there was to be such a Minister, it only meant Imperial Unionism in another guise.

Mr. Beyers replied in the negative.

THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL TO THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

(Received 1st March, 1920.)

[Answered by No. 17.]

(No. 92.)

SIR,

Government House, Ottawa, 16th February, 1920.

WITH reference to Lord Milner's despatch of the 5th August, Dominions No. 619,* I have the honour to transmit, herewith, copies of an approved minute of the Privy Council for Canada on the subject of the International Air Navigation Convention. 90

* Not printed. This enclosed copy of [Cmd. 266] (i.e., draft International Air Navigation Convention agreed by a Sub-Commission of the Peace Conference). See Dominions Nos. 76 and 81 for correspondence as to this Convention.

2. You will observe that my Ministers desire that an amendment to the British North America Acts may be submitted to the Imperial Parliament declaring generally in effect that an enactment of the Parliament of Canada, otherwise intra vires, shall operate and be deemed to have operated, extra-territorially according to its intention in the like manner and to the same extent as if enacted by the Parliament of the United Kingdom.

Enclosure in No. 16.

CERTIFIED COPY OF A REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL, APPROVED BY HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL ON THE 5TH FEBRUARY, 1920.

(P.C. 2613.)

THE Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated 16th December, 1919, from the Minister of Justice, stating that he has had under consideration the report of 5th December, 1919, of the Chairman of the Air Board, recommending that His Majesty's Government be requested to promote legislation by the Parliament of the United Kingdom "providing that any law of Canada relating to aircraft registered in Canada may extend to such aircraft and personnel licensed as well without as within the territorial limits of Canada," and submitting the following observations with reference thereto:

This submission suggests the desirability of considering the more comprehensive question as to the extra-territorial effect which is, or ought to be, incident to the legislation of the Dominion.

It was held by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Queen versus Burah, 3 A.C. 903-5, that "the Indian legislature has powers expressly limited by the Act of the Imperial Parliament which created it, and it can, of course, do nothing beyond the limits which circumscribe these powers. But, when acting within those limits, it is not in any sense an agent or delegate of the Imperial Parliament, but has, and was intended to have, plenary powers of legislation as large, and of the same nature, as those of Parliament itself. The established courts of justice, when a question arises whether the prescribed limits have been exceeded, must of necessity determine that question; and the only way in which they can properly do so is by looking to the terms of the instrument by which, affirmatively, the legislative powers were created, and by which, negatively, they are restricted. If what has been done is legislation within the general scope of the affirmative words which give the power, and if it violates no express condition or restriction by which that power is limited (in which category would, of course, be included any Act of the Imperial Parliament at variance with it), it is not for any court of justice to inquire further or to enlarge constructively those conditions and restrictions."

Moreover in Hodge versus The Queen, 9 A.C. 131-2, it was held by the same tribunal upon a contention of the appellants that the local legislatures of Canada could not delegate their powers, that this objection was founded on an entire misconception of the true character and position of the provincial legislatures which were in no sense delegates of or acting under any mandate from the Imperial Parliament. And their lordships proceeded to say that "When the British North America Act enacted that there should be a legislature for Ontario, and that its legislative assembly should have exclusive authority to make laws for the province and for provincial purposes in relation to the matters enumerated in section 92, it conferred powers not in any sense to be exercised by delegation from or as agents of the Imperial Parliament, but authority as plenary and as ample within the limits prescribed by section 92 as the Imperial Parliament in the plenitude of its power possessed and could bestow. Within these limits of subjects and area the local legislature is supreme, and has the same authority as the Imperial Parliament, or the Parliament of the Dominion, would have had under like circumstances to confide to a municipal institution or body of its own creation authority to make by-laws or resolutions as to subjects specified in the enactment, and with the object of carrying the enactment into operation and effect."

The principle thus enunciated was reaffirmed by Lord Watson in the later case of The Liquidators of the Maritime Bank of Canada versus Receiver-General of New Brunswick 1892, A.C. 441-3.

Certain it is that the laws of the United Kingdom cannot, any more than those of Canada, operate within a foreign jurisdiction to which the sanction of the enacting authority does not extend; but, in the case of the former, when the intention is manifest that domestic consequences are to follow upon extra-territorial acts or omissions, the Minister apprehends that it is the duty of the judicial tribunals of the United Kingdom to see that these provisions do not fail of effect by reason of any denial of the omnipotence of Parliament.

Whether the laws of Canada in like cases impose a similar obligation upon the domestic tribunals may be a debatable question, and the purpose of this report is to submit that the existence of any doubt as to the propriety of resolving that question in the affirmative is incompatible with the true purpose and intent of the constitution of the Dominion, and the position which Canada occupies as a constituent state of the Empire exercising with respect to all matters appertaining to the self-government of Canada, sovereign legislative authority.

In Attorney-General for Ontario versus Attorney-General for Canada, 1912, A.C. 582, the Lord Chancellor (Loreburn), delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee, said: "In 1867 the desire of Canada for a definite constitution embracing the entire Dominion was embodied in the British North America Act. Now, there can be no doubt that under this organic instrument the powers distributed between the Dominion on the one hand and the provinces on the other hand cover the whole area of self-government within the whole area of Canada. It would be subversive of the entire scheme and policy of the Act to assume that any point of internal self-government was withheld from Canada."

In the well-known case of McLeod versus Attorney-General for New South Wales, 1891, A.C. 455, their lordships of the Judicial Committee had before them an appellant convicted of bigamy, who had been lawfully married in the Colony of New South Wales, and who had subsequently contracted a bigamous marriage in the United States of America, and it was held that the Statute upon which the indictment was founded did not, according to its true interpretation, extend to the offence charged; but their lordships added that they were of the opinion that "if the wider construction had been applied to the statute, and it was supposed that it was intended thereby to comprehend cases so wide as those insisted on at the bar, it would have been beyond the jurisdiction of the Colony to enact such a law. Their jurisdiction is confined within their own territories, and the maxim which has been more than once quoted, Extra territorium jus dicenti impune non paretur, would be applicable to such a case. Lord Wensleydale, when Baron Parke, advising the House of Lords in Jefferys versus Boosey, expresses the same proposition in very terse language. He says: 'The legislature has no power over any persons except its own subjects—that is, persons natural-born subjects, or resident, or whilst they are within the limits of the kingdom. The legislature can impose no duties except on them; and when legislating for the benefit of persons must, prima facie, be considered to mean the benefit of those who owe obedience to our laws, and whose interests the legislature is under a correlative obligation to protect.' All crime is local. The jurisdiction over the crime belongs to the country where the crime is committed, and, except over her own subjects, Her Majesty and the Imperial legislature have no power whatever. It appears to their lordships that the effect of giving the wider interpretation to this statute necessary to sustain this indictment would be to comprehend a great deal more than Her Majesty's subjects; more than any persons who may be within the jurisdiction of the Colony by any means whatsoever; and that therefore, if that construction were given to the statute, it would follow as a necessary result that the statute was ultra vires of the Colonial legislature to pass."

It is not necessary to discuss the proposition suggested by the McLeod case that there is a limitation of legislative power common to the Parliament of the United Kingdom and to Colonial Legislatures whereby the exercise of that power in either case becomes in a measure ineffective for the creation of offences in foreign countries; because the object of the Minister will be achieved if it be established that the authority of the Dominion, in relation to the matters legislatively committed to it, is not in this respect less extensive than that of His Majesty's Imperial Parliament; and it is to be observed that Lord Halsbury in his qualified denial of jurisdiction for crime, save to the country where the crime is committed, states in effect that the colonies, in common with Her Majesty and the Imperial Parliament, have no power, except over British subjects, with respect to crime extra-local; and that the wider interpretation necessary to sustain the indictment would comprehend more than Her Majesty's subjects. Consequently, this case is not an authority for attributing to the Dominion territorially a more limited legislative authority in the execution of its legislative powers than that possessed by His Majesty's Imperial Parliament.

It is provided by section 177 of the Army Act that "where any force of volunteers, or of militia, or any other force, is raised in India or in a colony, any law of India or the colony may extend to the officers, non-commissioned officers and men belonging to such force, whether within or without the limits of India or the colony; and any such law may apply, in relation to such force and to any officers, non-commissioned officers, and men thereof all or any of the provisions of this Act, subject to such adaptations, modifications and exceptions as may be specified in such law, and where so applied this Act shall have effect in relation to such force, subject to such adaptations, modifications and exceptions as aforesaid; and where any such force is serving with part of His Majesty's regular forces, then so far as the law of India or the colony has not provided for the government and discipline of such force, this Act and any other Act for the time being amending the same shall, subject to such exceptions and modifications as may be specified in the general orders of the General Officer Commanding His Majesty's Forces with which such force is serving, apply to the officers, non-commissioned officers and men of such force, in like manner as they apply to the officers, non-commissioned officers and men of the regular forces."

This provision certainly contemplates that colonial legislation governing the military forces of a colony has or shall have effect beyond the limits of the colony, but it is not improbably introduced rather for the purpose of defining in the cases to which it refers the application of the Army Act, and to avoid conflict as between the Imperial and the local statutes, than to confer a power upon the local authorities to regulate their military forces when serving abroad; a power which, in the view presented by the Minister, was consistently with the decisions already incident to colonial authority. In any case this enactment furnishes a precedent for statutory acknowledgment of the operation of local laws beyond colonial limits.

A question as to the extra-territorial effect of a statute of Canada came up for consideration directly in the case of Attorney-General for the Dominion versus Cain versus Gilhula, 1906, A.C. 542. The Alien Labour Act of the Dominion provided for the expulsion from Canada of aliens who entered the country contrary to the prohibition of the Act. The respondents Cain and Gilhula were men of this description; and, having been apprehended with a view to their deportation, obtained their discharge upon habeas corpus by order of a Canadian judge upon the ground that section 6 of the Alien Labour Act, upon which the deportation proceedings were founded, transcended the powers of the Dominion Parliament inasmuch as it purported to authorise the Attorney-General, or his delegate, to deprive persons against whom it was to be enforced of their liberty without the territorial limits of Canada. The Judicial Committee reversed this judgment upon appeal; and Lord Atkinson, pronouncing the judgment, stated the question and his conclusion as follows:—

"The question, therefore, for decision in this case resolves itself into this: Has the Act 60 and 61 Vict. c. 11, assented to by the Crown, clothed the Dominion Government with the power the Crown itself theretofore undoubtedly possessed to expel an alien from the Dominion, or to deport him to the country whence he entered the Dominion? If it has, then the fact that extra-territorial constraint must necessarily be exercised in effecting the expulsion cannot invalidate the warrant directing expulsion issued under the provisions of the statute which authorises the expulsion."

It has already been decided in Musgrove versus Chun Teong Toy that the Government of the Colony of Victoria, by virtue of the powers with which it was invested to make laws for the peace, order and good government of the colony, had authority to pass a law preventing aliens from entering the colony of Victoria. On the authority of this case section 1 of the above-mentioned statute would be intra vires of the Dominion Parliament. The enforcement of the provisions of this section no doubt would not involve extra-territorial constraint, but it would involve the exercise of sovereign powers closely allied to the power of expulsion and based on the same principles. The power of expulsion is in truth but the complement of the power of exclusion. If entry be prohibited it would seem to follow that the Government which has the power to exclude should have the power to expel the alien who enters in opposition to its laws. In Hodge versus Reg. it was decided that a colonial legislature has within the limits prescribed by the statute which created it 'an authority as plenary and as ample . . . as the Imperial Parliament in the plenitude of its power possessed and could bestow.' If, therefore, power to expel aliens who had entered Canada against the laws of the Dominion, was by this statute given to the Government of the Dominions, as their lordships think it was, it necessarily follows that the statute has also given them power to impose that extra-territorial constraint which is necessary to enable them to expel those aliens from their borders to the same extent as the Imperial Government could itself have imposed the constraint for a similar purpose had the statute never been passed."

The Cain and Gilhula case is the only one in which a decision specifically relating to the point under consideration has been pronounced in relation to the Dominion by the tribunal of ultimate authority; and the judgment maintains, as appears from the foregoing extract, the extra-territorial authority of the Parliament of Canada with respect to the particular legislation which was under review.

It thus appears that in the leading case in which a question was submitted the decision was resolved favourably to the Dominion; but a general rule is of such great importance, and the occasion for its application emerges so frequently in connexion with legislative acts which become necessary in the development of the policy of the country, and in relation particularly to matters of navigation and transport, that it is undesirable that the question should remain subject to any doubt.

In the growth of the constitution the United Kingdom and the Dominions have under His Majesty relations which may be assimilated to those of independent sovereign states, each exercising within its own compass exclusive and independent sovereign powers of legislation and government, and which make it constitutionally the duty of the Parliament of the United Kingdom on the one hand to see that its legislation does not invade the appropriate sphere of Dominion authority, and for the Parliament of the Dominion, on the other, to see that its legislation is confined within that sphere. By the observance of these principles perfect harmony is ensured, but the attribute of unlimited sovereignty with its incidents is just as essential for the peace, order, and good government of Canada within its constitutional range of authority as it is for the United Kingdom within its own domain, or for the Empire as a whole in relation to Imperial affairs. With respect to the latter, this report is not concerned with the method by which the Dominions may best co-operate in the framing and execution of the legislative measures which may be necessary to give effect to the general policy in which all parts of the Empire have a common interest. This submission has to do simply with obtaining, for the avoidance of doubt, a declaration by the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Dominion extra-territorial authority in respect of all matters constitutionally pertaining to the Dominion.

For the reasons hereinbefore stated the Minister recommends that His Majesty's Government be requested to submit, for the sanction of Parliament of the United Kingdom, an amendment to the British North America Acts declaring generally, in effect that an enactment of the Parliament of Canada, otherwise intra vires, shall operate and be deemed to have operated extra-territorially according to its intention in the like manner and to the same extent as if enacted by the Parliament of the United Kingdom.

The Committee concur in the foregoing and advise that Your Excellency may be pleased to transmit a copy hereof, if approved, to the Secretary of State for the Colonies for the information of His Majesty's Government.

All which is respectfully submitted for approval.

RODOLPHE BOUREAU,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

To His Excellency the Governor in Council.

5th December, 1919.

THE undersigned has the honour to direct attention to the constitutional limitation whereby the operation of Canadian legislation does not extend beyond the territorial boundaries of Canada, and to the express provision of the Air Board Act which, in recognition of this constitutional limitation, authorises the Air Board, subject to the approval of Your Excellency in Council, to regulate and control aerial navigation only "over Canada and the territorial waters of Canada."

The proposed Convention relating to International Air Navigation on the other hand imposes upon states which become parties to it an obligation (Article 26) to "adopt measures to insure that every aircraft under its flag, wherever it may be, shall comply" with certain Rules of the Air and other regulations contained in Annex D to the Convention, and that "it will punish all persons who do not observe these regulations."

Having regard to the existing constitutional limitations, it is impossible for Canada to perform this obligation, and the Air Board is of opinion that it is expedient, and indeed necessary, that it should be made possible for Canada to do so.

A like difficulty in the case of the land and air forces in any colony has been met by a provision (Army Act, section 177) whereby a colonial law applying to any force raised in the colony may extend to the officers, non-commissioned officers and men belonging thereto, whether the force is within or without the limits of the colony.

The undersigned has consequently the honour to recommend that an humble address be presented to His Majesty asking that like provision may be made in the case of the laws of Canada relating to Air Navigation, and that a statute be passed by the Imperial Parliament providing that any law of Canada relating to aircraft registered in Canada, and to personnel licensed in Canada, may extend to such aircraft and personnel as well without as within the territorial limits of Canada.

Humbly submitted,

ARTHUR L. SIFTEN,
Chairman, the Air Board of Canada.

TELEGRAM.

[Answered by No. 29.]

(Paraphrase.)

6TH MAY. Referring to your despatch 16th February, No. 92,* I observe that notice has been given of address to King setting out actual terms of proposed amendment of British North America Act. It is difficult to arrive at any very clear idea as to the precise scope of the amendment owing to the general terms in which it is couched. In particular, proposal that Canadian legislation should have same effect as if enacted by Parliament of United Kingdom may raise difficulty with other Dominions as appearing to place them in same relation to Canadian Parliament as to Parliament of United Kingdom.

The question is thus one which will require very careful consideration, and does not admit of immediate reply. It would be of assistance if I could be informed what points proposed amendment is intended to cover beyond the extension of jurisdiction to aircraft registered in Canada or personnel licensed in Canada. Legislation can be introduced at once for this latter purpose if desired that it should be done.—MILNER.

ADMIRALTY, AIR MINISTRY, AND BOARD OF TRADE.

[Answered by Nos. 19, 20, 23, 24, 25 and 27.]

SIR, Downing Street, 27th May, 1920.
[To Board of Trade only.—With reference to your letter of the 5th March,*] I am directed by Viscount Milner to transmit to you copy of a despatch† from the Governor-General of Canada relative to the desire of the Canadian Government that general powers of legislating extra-territorially should be conferred on the Canadian Parliament, together with copy of a letter which has been addressed to the Law Officers of the Crown on the subject.

2. Lord Milner would be glad to receive any observations which [Earl Curzon of Kedleston] [Mr. Secretary Shortt] [the Army Council] [the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty] [the Air Council] [the Board of Trade] may have to offer.

I am, &c.,
HENRY LAMBERT.

Enclosure in No. 18.

COLONIAL OFFICE to LAW OFFICERS.

GENTLEMEN, Downing Street, 27th May, 1920.
I AM directed by Viscount Milner to transmit to you copy of a despatch† from the Governor-General of Canada (dated the 16th February), forwarding an approved Minute of the Privy Council for Canada in which the Canadian Government request His Majesty's Government to submit, for the sanction of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, an amendment to the British North America Act, declaring generally in effect that an enactment of the Parliament of Canada, otherwise intra vires, shall operate, and be deemed to have operated, extra-territorially according to its intention in the like manner and to the same extent as if enacted by the Parliament of the United Kingdom.

2. On the 26th February, 1920, the Minister of Justice gave notice in the House of Commons of Canada of a Resolution for an Address to the King, praying His Majesty to give his consent to submit a measure to the Parliament of the United Kingdom to amend the British North America Act, 1867, by adding the following sub-section to Section 91 of that Act:—

"Any enactment of the Parliament of Canada otherwise within the legislative authority of the Parliament shall operate and be deemed to have operated extra-territorially according to its intention in the like manner and to the same extent as if enacted by the Parliament of the United Kingdom."

3. It will be observed that the question was raised primarily with reference to legislation for the control of aerial navigation, especially in connexion with the International Air Convention and that there is no suggestion in the Minute of Council that so far as the Convention is concerned, the necessary powers for carrying out the obligations which it will impose on Canada, if ratified by His Majesty in respect of the Dominion, already exist under Section 132 of the British North America Act.

4. The Air Navigation Bill now before Parliament, which will enable effect to be given to the Convention so far as this country and the Colonies are concerned, is drawn up on the basis that the Dominions will pass their own legislation for the purpose. I am to enclose in this connexion a copy of a letter dated the 7th January, 1919, from the Minister of Justice to the Prime Minister of Canada, in which Sir R. Borden expressed his concurrence, dealing with an early tentative draft Bill printed in the Report of the Civil Aerial Transport Committee (vide enclosed copy of the Parliamentary Paper [Cd. 9218]). It will be seen that strong exception was taken to that draft Bill as not only governing Canadian aircraft when beyond the limits of Canada but also regulating aircraft even while in or over the territory of the Dominion.

* 12772: not printed; it transmitted copy of Memorandum enclosed in No. 6 in Dominions No. 64.
† No. 16.

5. Had the request in the Minute of Council been confined to the matter of aerial legislation, Lord Milner would have taken immediate steps to meet the wishes of the Canadian Government, but the very general terms in which the proposed amendment of the British North America Act is expressed appear to him to call for the most careful consideration from both a legal and a constitutional point of view, and he has accordingly sent to the Canadian Government the telegram* of which a copy is enclosed.

6. It will be observed that the letter of the Minister of Justice mentioned in paragraph 4 of this letter, while asserting the sole right of the Canadian Parliament to legislate for Canadian aircraft while out of the Canadian jurisdiction, was equally emphatic in asserting the same right in respect of all aircraft within the Dominion. The allusion in the Minute of Council to Section 177 of the Army Act (which appears in an adapted form as Section 177 of the Air Force Act) suggests, however, that the proposed amendment does not exclude legislation for other parts of the Empire. In any case the terms of the proposed amendment are not such as to exclude the possibility of conflicts of law between Canadian legislation and Acts of the Imperial Parliament operating extra-territorially or the possibility of the Canadian Parliament legislating for other parts of the Empire. So far as the Imperial Parliament and the United Kingdom and the Colonies are concerned this is a matter solely between His Majesty's Government and the Canadian Government, but it is open to grave question whether His Majesty's Government would be justified, so far as the other Dominions are concerned, in assenting on their own responsibility to any arrangement which might derogate from their existing jurisdictions. The difficulty of dealing with the proposal of the Canadian Government is, of course, increased by the fact that it is retrospective in character.

7. The only Dominion Constitution which expressly confers power to legislate ex-territorially is that of the Commonwealth of Australia. Section 5 of the Commonwealth of Australia Act (63 and 64 Vic. Ch. 12) declares that "the laws of the Commonwealth shall be in force on all British ships, the Queen's ships of war excepted, whose first port of clearance and whose port of destination are in the Commonwealth" and Section 51 (X) of the Constitution gives the Commonwealth Parliament power to legislate for "Fisheries in Australian waters beyond territorial limits." The powers of Dominion Parliaments generally to legislate for ships outside their territorial limits are those conferred by Section 735 and Section 736 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. Lord Milner is consulting the Board of Trade as to the position of British ships other than those registered in Canada, not engaged in the coasting trade, under the proposal of the Canadian Government, and their views will be communicated to you later. In the meantime, I am to invite attention to the general statements as to the respective provinces of the Imperial and Dominion Parliaments in merchant shipping matters contained in the despatches to the Commonwealth Government of the 29th November, 1907, and the 18th September, 1908 (No. 3 and No. 7 in [Cd. 3891] and [Cd. 4355] respectively), to the correspondence as to Canadian Merchant Shipping legislation printed in the accompanying Colonial Office prints (Dominions Nos. 9, 18, 43, and 56) and to Resolution XXIII of the Imperial Conference of 1911 and the discussions at that Conference on the legislative powers of the Dominions in regard to Merchant Shipping ([Cd. 5745,] pp. 18, 144-6, 149-153, 406-424). A Consolidating Bill relating to Merchant Shipping is now under consideration in Canada. A memorandum on the Bill by the Board of Trade recently communicated to the Canadian Government is also enclosed.

8. Other Departments that may be concerned are also being consulted and their views will be submitted to you when received. In the meantime Lord Milner would be glad if you would take the matter into consideration and favour him with any observations which you may be good enough to offer on the legal and constitutional problems involved in the proposal put forward by the Canadian Government.

I am, &c.,
HENRY LAMBERT.

MR. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) to SIR ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister).

DEAR SIR ROBERT,

London, 7th January, 1919.

IN relation to the reports of the Civil Aerial Transport Committee, the draft of the proposed International Convention with regard to Aerial Navigation, and the draft of a Bill for the regulation of Aerial Navigation referred to in these reports, I desire to submit the following observations bearing upon the position of the Dominions generally, and of Canada in particular, as it may be affected by the Convention of the proposed legislation.

I.

The Convention by its terms does not apply as of right, except to the mother countries of the contracting States. The second paragraph of Article 48 provides the method whereby it may be put into force in colonies, possessions or protectorates of any such State. I would suggest that in so far as the self-governing Dominions are concerned, their becoming bound by it should be made dependent on their adherence to it. For this manner of dealing with an analogous case, a precedent is found in the Treaty of 1911 with Japan (Article XXVI.) In view of the present national status of the Dominions, this seems a more fitting way of dealing with the matter. It puts the Dominions as towards the States, with whom the Convention may be entered into, in their true position as nations within the Commonwealth.

II.

Section 23 of the draft Bill makes applicable to all aircraft, including such as may be owned by Canadians resident or domiciled in Canada, whenever they happen to be elsewhere than in or over the territory of the Dominion, all the provisions of the proposed Act, except so far as these provisions are expressly limited to the British Islands and the territorial waters adjacent thereto. It further subjects to the provisions relating to the registration of aircraft, and those contained in collision regulations, aircraft papers regulations and signals of distress regulations, all aircraft even while in or over the territory of the Dominion, thus withdrawing, as regards these particular matters, from any control by Dominion legislation, aircraft, whether Canadian or foreign even while within Canadian territory.

Sub-section 2 of this section makes clear that in the regards just mentioned, it is intended by the Bill to limit the power of the Parliament of the Dominion, or the legislatures of any of its provinces, to make provision in relation to itself or its territory.

The enactment of such limitation is doubtless legally within the power of the Parliament of the United Kingdom. The exercise of that power is, however, I submit, unconstitutional.

The proposed legislation, as appears by what is above stated, not only governs all aircraft the property of Canadians whenever they pass beyond the limits of Canada, but furthermore as regards the particular matters of registration, collisions, aircraft papers, and signals of distress, governs and subjects to regulations to be made under its provisions all aircraft, Canadian and foreign, while actually within Canadian territory.

That, under the provisions of the Canadian Constitutional Acts, all these matters are proper subjects of legislation, either by the Parliament of the Dominion, or the legislatures of the provinces, does not appear to be open to question. Indeed as has been pointed out, sub-section 2 of Section 23 of the Bill practically concedes that the United Kingdom Parliament, in dealing with them, limits the powers conferred upon the legislative bodies of the Dominion. This action constitutes an invasion of Canada's rights as conferred upon her by the Act of 1867 and the different amendments thereto. As such it is open to the gravest objection, which it seems but proper should be brought to the notice of the Imperial Cabinet.

So far as, with regard to the particular matters in question, it may be deemed desirable that there should be uniformity of law within the Commonwealth, that uniformity can, without difficulty, be brought about by concurrent action of the legislatures of the different parts.

The principle that it is the constitutional right of the self-governing Dominions to legislate exclusively with regard to subjects coming within the purview of the powers conferred upon them is too well established, and too fully recognized for it to be necessary to insist upon it.

It will doubtless be sufficient to ensure its being respected in the present instance, that attention should be called to the fact that the enactment by the Parliament of the United Kingdom of the provisions above referred to, would be a violation of that principle.

Yours sincerely,
CHAS. J. DOHERTY.

FOREIGN OFFICE to COLONIAL OFFICE.

[Answered by No. 26.]

SIR,

Foreign Office, S.W.1, 10th June, 1920.

WITH reference to your letter of 27th May,* relative to the desire of the Canadian Government that general powers of legislation extra-territorially should be conferred on the Canadian Parliament, I am directed by Earl Curzon of Kedleston to state that, in his opinion, the Canadian proposal seems somewhat larger than is warranted by the circumstances of the case. The need for large and practically unlimited extension of legislative powers of the Canadian Parliament is not established by the fact that Canada has signed, or intends to sign, the Air Convention; that particular difficulty could be immediately dealt with, as has been pointed out in Lord Milner's telegram of 6th May.†

2. Lord Curzon, however, would be glad if the following observations on the general question of extending the field within which Dominion legislation can operate, might be brought to the notice of Viscount Milner.

3. Although the change is quite informal, the fact cannot be concealed that the Peace Conference of 1919 has effected a complete change in the position of the self-governing Dominions. Their admission to membership of the League of Nations has imposed upon them obligations which cannot be circumscribed by the geographical limits of their respective territories, and a right to legislate with effect outside their own borders on matters within their competence, seems to be an inevitable outcome of the position which the Dominions have now attained. Unless, for instance, Canada is given power to legislate in a way which binds Canadians outside her borders, she will find it almost impossible to carry out the obligations under Article 16 of the Covenant, of compelling all Canadians to cease financial or commercial transactions with a Covenant-breaking State. Unless an extension of the existing powers of legislation is conferred, it will be necessary for the Dominion Government to come to the Imperial Parliament on each occasion to supplement the Dominion legislation, and to force a Dominion to do so is inconsistent with that separate membership of the League which was definitely and formally assured to the Dominions.

4. The aspect of this question which is imminent is that which touches the Dominions upon whom "C" mandates have been conferred. The mandate for German South-West Africa has been accorded to the Union of South Africa, that of New Guinea to Australia, and of Samoa to New Zealand, upon the footing that those areas are to become an integral part of the territory of the respective Dominions. Those areas, however, do not become, from the technical and legal point of view, British territory or a portion of the territory of the Dominion. As the rights of the Parliaments of South Africa, Australia, and New Zealand stand today, those Parliaments have no power to legislate for these new areas which are to become an integral part of their territory, and yet by the terms of the Covenant, these ex-German colonies are to be subject to the legislation of the Dominion concerned.

5. The only proposal which has as yet been made for overcoming this difficulty has been the issue of an Order in Council under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act of 1890, but it seems doubtful whether this method would satisfy the Dominions, and Lord Curzon understands that General Smuts has protested strongly against it. It is, moreover, doubtful whether such a proceeding is even feasible, in view of the fact that an Order in Council under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act is void if it is in conflict with the statute law of the United Kingdom. Consequently, the Foreign Jurisdiction Order, or any action taken under such an Order in the territory concerned, for the enforcement of a Dominion law which was in conflict with the United Kingdom law, would be invalid. The most satisfactory solution of the problem would seem to be to increase the legislative powers of the Dominion Parliaments and to confer upon them the right to legislate on subjects otherwise within their competence with effect outside the limits of the Dominion.

6. With regard to the question of the possibility of conflict between the legislation of the Dominion concerned and that of the United Kingdom, or of some other Dominion, I am to add that although in theory this objection is very strong, Lord Curzon thinks that undue importance should not be attached to it. The same possibility of conflict exists between the legislative powers of any two Sovereign independent States. Every Sovereign State has the right to legislate for all persons within its borders, and for all its subjects elsewhere. The French Legislature today, for instance, has rights which might theoretically raise the same possibility of conflict with the legislative rights of the Imperial Parliament, as would happen if this extension of the legislative powers of the Dominion Parliaments were accorded, but in practice conflicts of this kind arise but seldom. The sphere within which the legislation of each State is to operate is well understood, and when any difficulties do arise, they can usually be smoothed over without trouble.

I am, &c.,

V. WELLESLEY.

AIR MINISTRY to COLONIAL OFFICE.

[Answered by No. 33.]

SIR,

Air Ministry, Kingsway, London, W.C.2, 23rd June, 1920.

WITH reference to your letter of the 27th ultimo,* transmitting a copy of a despatch from the Governor-General of Canada relative to the desire of the Canadian Government that general powers of legislation extra-territorially should be given to the Canadian Parliament, I am commanded by the Air Council to state, for the information of Viscount Milner, that inasmuch as the present relations of the Dominions and India to the United Kingdom, and their status as contracting States under the International Air Navigation Convention, have led to their exclusion from the provisions of the Air Navigation Bill, which is now before Parliament, it appears to the Council that it will be necessary for the Dominions and India, in order to carry out their obligations under the Convention, to pass legislation applying extra-territorially to aircraft carrying their nationality mark wherever such aircraft may be.

It would consequently appear that if the existing constitutions of the Dominions do not empower the passing of such legislation, then these constitutions should be enlarged by Imperial Statute to the degree necessary for such purpose.

I am to add that the Council consider that power should also be given to the Dominions to legislate for offences committed on their aircraft when over the high seas or over other States (since in the latter case it is possible that for one reason or another the offence may not be dealt with by the territorial State), and in this connexion I am to call attention to clause 13 (1) of the Air Navigation Bill, a copy of which is enclosed,* and to suggest that it might be helpful on this point.

I am, &c.,

EXTRACT FROM DEBATES IN CANADIAN HOUSE OF COMMONS,
24TH JUNE, 1920.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT.

RIGHT HONOURABLE C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved the following proposed resolution:—

Resolved, That a humble Address be presented to His Most Excellent Majesty the King in the following words:—

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty:

MOST GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN:

WE, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects the Commons of Canada, in Parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty praying that you may graciously be pleased to give your consent to submit a measure to the Parliament of the United Kingdom, to amend the British North America Act, 1867, in the manner following, or to the following effect:—

"An Act to amend the British North America Act, 1867.

"Be it enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same as follows:—

"1. Section 91 of the British North America Act, 1867, is hereby amended by adding thereto the following subsection:—

"2. Any enactment of the Parliament of Canada otherwise within the legislative authority of the Parliament shall operate and be deemed to have operated extra-territorially according to its intention in the like manner and to the same extent as if enacted by the Parliament of the United Kingdom."

All of which we humbly pray Your Majesty to take into your favourable and gracious consideration.

He said: This resolution has been standing on the Order Paper practically throughout the session. I understand there is no objection to it being passed. I have had the opportunity of conferring with the leader of the Opposition and some other leading members on the other side of the House with regard to it. The entire purpose and effect of the legislation that we are asking to be enacted is to give an interpretation to the provisions of the British North America Act which will settle what is now a disputable or unsettled question. There is a jurisprudence and there are judgments which hold, or at all events are interpreted as holding, that there is something restricted in the effect of the legislation of the Parliaments of the Dominions as compared with the effect of legislation enacted by the Parliament of the United Kingdom and the effect which attaches to legislation enacted by them. The interpretation that we ask for is that it should be enacted. That the legislation of this Parliament within the scope of its attributions—it is not suggested to extend them in any way—shall be deemed to operate extra-territorially according to its intention in like manner and to the same effect as if enacted by the Parliament of the United Kingdom. We are not seeking to encroach on the jurisdiction of the United Kingdom. The sole purpose we seek to have made clear is that to legislation upon matters within our compass there shall attach, where Parliament attaches to it, the same extra-territorial effect that would attach to the legislation of the Parliament of the United Kingdom.

Now, that effect goes no further than that such law shall be law in Canada; we do not pretend that it can be enforced in foreign countries. But we wish to make certain that the law imposing obligations upon the citizens of Canada to be carried out outside the limits of our own country we will be entitled to enforce in our Courts whenever our citizens may return within this jurisdiction. That is precisely the power that attaches to the legislation of the Imperial Parliament. As I say, it is not at all a settled thing that it does not attach to our legislation. There are judgments which certainly justify the conclusion that it does; there are other judgments that justify the conclusion that it does not. In the absence of such settlement it would be necessary for us in each particular case to go to the United Kingdom to ask for jurisdiction.

The particular matter that has brought this to our attention is the legislation which we may be called upon to enact and the regulations which it may be necessary to impose to govern Canadian aerial navigation. Any such legislation would necessarily have to deal with Canadian aerial navigators and the management of Canadian aircraft, and I think it is obvious that if doubt be suggested as to whether we can enforce those laws with regard to the operation of any Canadian aircraft the moment it gets outside the actual limits of Canada, we would be put in a very difficult position. Now, it seemed to us better to settle the question once for all.

MR. FIELDING: Would the honourable gentleman give us some concrete cases which would make it clearer to the wayfarer, even though he be a member of Parliament and not a lawyer? I think I have grasped the intention of my honourable friend, but he might give us an illustration of what he desires to control by this legislation.

MR. DOHERTY: Take the particular instance I was mentioning—

MR. FIELDING: That was very general.

MR. DOHERTY: There are in process of preparation certain rules of aerial navigation which it is expected, under conventions and treaties to be made, will govern the aircraft of all the different nations. Under those it will be our obligation to see that our aircraft and those managing it conform to the rules not only while they are actually within our country, but when they get in the air over the ocean or over some other country.

MR. FIELDING: Up over Great Britain, for example?

MR. DOHERTY: Yes. But this won't exclude the authority of any country in which our men may be. As I pointed out, there is no pretension that our law will prevail in any other country, but if our citizen comes under the operation of this law he will be bound in addition to conform to such obligations as we may impose upon him as a Canadian citizen. That is one instance, and many others might be cited. The effect of this would be that if we did enact legislation imposing certain obligations upon our citizens while they were outside of this country, when those citizens returned we would be in a position to enforce those laws within Canada. The only effect will be to remove any doubt as to whether there is a difference between the effect of a Dominion law in that respect and the law of any other country.

MR. FIELDING: I can readily understand that where a Canadian airman—if you take him as an illustration—goes outside the three-mile limit on the high seas he would be responsible as a Canadian citizen. But the question to my mind is, if a Canadian airman goes to England and commits some offence against these laws we lay down in England is he to be punished when he returns to Canada?

MR. DOHERTY: If he has violated our laws which we have prescribed as a rule of conduct while he is outside of this country then when he returns he will be liable to such consequences as our legislation imposes.

MR. FIELDING: Even although he has already been punished in England?

MR. DOHERTY: In that case I have no doubt that the rule against punishing a man twice for the same offence would apply. But what we have in mind is that if we are going to take responsibility for our aviators carrying on in accord with the general rules that may be agreed to by the different nations, we ought to have the power of enforcing the obligations that we impose upon them. It is not easy to define exactly how far the effect goes of this extra-territorial application of the laws of the country. But all that is asked by this legislation is that the effect attaching to the legislation of other countries extra-territorially shall attach to the legislation of this country; it simply puts us in the same position as other countries. My own impression would be that we are in that position, but it is a doubtful question and we would like to have it settled.

MR. FIELDING: It can hardly be alleged that the House is taken by surprise in connexion with this matter, as this motion has been standing on the Order Paper for nearly four months. But it has been so long on the Order Paper that most members have forgotten it, and those who have not forgotten it have supposed it was dead. However, I am assured that the matter has been one of conference between the Minister of Justice and some of the legal members on this side, and upon the assurance that it is acceptable to them, I, a poor layman, do not want to offer any objection.

Motion agreed to.

MR. DOHERTY moved:

That the said address be engrossed.

Motion agreed to.

MR. DOHERTY: I beg to move:

That a message be sent to the Senate to inform Their Honours that this House has passed an Address to His Most Excellent Majesty the King, praying that he will graciously be pleased to give his consent to submitting a measure to the Parliament of the United Kingdom to amend certain provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, in the manner set forth in the said Address hereto attached, and requesting that Their Honours will unite with this House in the said Address by filling up the blank therein with the words "Senate and".

EXTRACT FROM DEBATE IN THE CANADIAN SENATE, 26TH JUNE, 1920.

THE BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT.

Proposed Amendment—Joint Address to the King.

THE Senate proceeded to consider a Message from the House of Commons with a proposed Address to His Majesty the King, praying that he may graciously be pleased to give his consent to submitting a measure to the Parliament of the United Kingdom to amend certain provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, in the manner set forth in the said Address.

HONOURABLE SIR JAMES LOUGHEED moved that the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the said Address by filling up the blank therein with the words "Senate and."

He said: The object of this is to secure Imperial legislation amending the British North America Act, whereby it will be placed beyond all controversy that the Dominion Government has authority to legislate extra-territorially. This legislation is desirable chiefly because of the new conditions which have arisen through the development of aerial transportation. Not only is the Government of Canada establishing an air service, but aerial transportation is being organized and established by commercial companies. This will involve of course a new branch of law, and it is desirable that there should be no question as to the authority of Canada to legislate for the punishment within its own territory of violations of the law which may take place over the territory of another nation. It is doubtful whether we have that authority to-day. Of course, every sovereign power has that authority; but, owing to the British North America Act being silent upon a question of that kind, or not dealing with it in express language, it is very desirable that we should secure the necessary legislation to permit of our regulations being enforced. We are entering into arrangements, for instance, with the United States, to enforce regulations that may be agreed upon between the two countries respecting aerial navigation. The United States, being a sovereign power, could exercise jurisdiction extra-territorially to enforce regulations, and persons who violated those regulations outside the United States could be punished upon their return to United States territory. It would be unfortunate if we in Canada were precluded from enforcing our regulations likewise. We do not say we have not inherently that right, by reason of the constitutional powers which we already possess, but it is desirable, in view of our relations with other countries, that this should be placed beyond all peradventure. Our object is, therefore, to seek legislation amending the British North America Act so as to give us expressly that authority.

HONOURABLE HEWITT BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen, I have listened to the very full explanation my honourable friend has given on this matter. I regret to say that I have not been able to look into it personally as much as I would like to do, but I cannot see why this legislation is necessary. It does seem to me that any citizen of Canada who goes outside the Dominion and infringes the law of the country can be punished when he comes back if the Government thinks it desirable to punish him.

HONOURABLE SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: Not if the offence has been committed outside of Canada.

HONOURABLE MR. BOSTOCK: That is just the point.

HONOURABLE SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, that is the point.

HONOURABLE MR. BOSTOCK: The offender can be punished when he comes back. We cannot, of course, punish him if he is outside our jurisdiction.

HONOURABLE SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: It is not absolutely clear that we have the right, for the constitutional reasons I have pointed out.

HONOURABLE MR. BOSTOCK: Of course, if it is not absolutely clear, I do not see any harm in making it clear; but I should have thought that we had that right already.

HONOURABLE MR. POWER: I think that after the aviator passes the three-mile limit he ceases to be within the jurisdiction of this Parliament, and it is questionable whether anything he did then would be an offence against the laws of Canada.

HONOURABLE SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: That is the point.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Honourable Sir James Lougheed it was resolved that an Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-General, respectfully requesting that His Excellency would be pleased to transmit the said Joint Address to His Majesty.

The motion was agreed to.

It was ordered that a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House that the Senate has adopted the said Address.

BOARD OF TRADE to COLONIAL OFFICE.

[Answered by No. 33.]

Board of Trade (Marine Department).

SIR, Great George Street, London, S.W.1, 28th June, 1920.

I AM directed by the Board of Trade to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of 27th May,* concerning the desire of the Canadian Government to be given general powers of legislation extra-territorially. In reply I am to enclose, for the information of the Government, a Memorandum setting out the bearing of this request upon merchant shipping law.

In this connexion, I am to refer to the resolutions which were passed at the Imperial Merchant Shipping Conference of 1907, and I am to call attention to the fact that although the New Zealand representatives brought forward at the Conference in 1911 a resolution pressing for the grant of further legislative powers to the Dominions in relation to merchant shipping, this resolution was not pressed.

Before, therefore, any extension of the powers of the Dominion Legislatures with respect to merchant shipping can be decided upon, and its scope (if it is decided to make it) determined, it appears desirable that the matter should be fully discussed at any general conference of Dominion representatives with representatives of His Majesty's Government which may be held in the near future.

I have, &c.,

G. E. BAKER.

Enclosure in No. 23.

EXTRA-TERRITORIAL OPERATION OF CANADIAN LEGISLATION.

Merchant Shipping.

1. THE Canadian Government have asked that an amendment may be made to the British North America Acts, declaring that an Act of the Parliament of Canada, otherwise within their powers, shall operate extra-territorially to the same extent as Acts passed by the Parliament of the United Kingdom. Before considering the effect of such a provision on merchant shipping law, it is desirable to set out briefly how the Merchant Shipping Acts of the United Kingdom apply in relation to the British Empire. Their provisions may be said to consist of the following:—

(a) Provisions applying throughout the whole of His Majesty's dominions.

(b) Those applying to British ships generally, at foreign ports or on the high seas.

(c) Those applying only to the United Kingdom and home waters.

(a) The most important parts of the Merchant Shipping Acts, which are declared to apply throughout the whole of His Majesty's dominions, are those relating to the registry, ownership and measurement of ships, to shipowners' liability and to legal proceedings. The necessity for absolute uniformity in these matters is clear, and while it is the case that Canada has her own laws about registration, which differ in some respects from the law of the United Kingdom as laid down in Part I. of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, it follows from the fact that registrars of British ships all over the world are in regular communication with, and take instructions or advice from, the Registrar-General of Shipping and Seamen, that uniformity in practice is pretty well secured.

In the same way the tonnage measurement of ships is uniformly administered, as the dominions and colonies use the Board of Trade instructions in carrying out the requirements of the law. As regards shipowners' liability, which is dealt with in Part 8 (sections 502 to 509) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, it is a fact that the Canadian law on this subject differs slightly from that of the United Kingdom and the rest of the Empire, and it has not been possible to trace exactly how this occurred. It is difficult to see how, if a case came before the Privy Council on appeal from Canada, it could be decided in any other way than under United Kingdom law.

Of recent years, however, it has become the practice to exclude the Dominions from legislation of this kind, and this was done, for instance, in the case of the Maritime Conventions Act, 1911, which altered our law as to collision and salvage.

(b) The parts of the Merchant Shipping Act which apply to British ships on the high seas and in foreign ports include those relative to discipline, naval courts, the collision regulations and those which determine the action to be taken by masters in relation to Consuls, and in dealing with seamen who have to be left behind abroad through illness, injury or otherwise. The provisions in regard to leaving seamen behind belong to Part II. of the Act, and apply to all British ships, including those registered in a British possession, "except where the ship is within the jurisdiction of the Government of the British possession in which she is registered" (section 261(d), 1894). It is not clear exactly what the meaning of this phrase is, but looking at sub-sections (c) and (d) of section 261, it is possible that it may apply to the case in which the colonial registered ship is engaged on a voyage which begins and ends in the place in which she is registered. On the other hand, it may merely mean while the ship is within the territorial waters of that Possession. As some of the provisions in regard to leaving seamen abroad apply to things happening "at any place out of the United Kingdom," and other provisions apply only to places outside of His Majesty's dominions, the latter interpretation is the more probable.

(c) The parts of the Merchant Shipping Acts which apply only in the United Kingdom are those relating to the organization of mercantile marine offices, surveyors, etc., to fishing boats, and to purely internal matters like wreck, salvage, lighthouses, and pilotage. In these purely local matters no question can arise as to the Dominions having extra-territorial jurisdiction, as they relate solely to things which occur either in the country or within territorial waters, or to ships which never, in fact, come within any other jurisdiction, such as fishing boats, which may go beyond the three mile limit but which do not as a rule go into ports outside a dominion or colony. There are certain other provisions such as those relating to the detention of ships for unseaworthiness, the marking of loadlines, and the provisions relating to passenger steamers, which apply only to ships being at or sailing from ports in the United Kingdom or the British Islands; but many of these provisions impose a continuing liability which follows the ship throughout her voyage. For example, while the British ship which does not come to the United Kingdom need not be marked with a loadline under the Merchant Shipping Acts, once she has come to a United Kingdom port she must be marked and must remain marked until her next return.

2. The general powers of colonial legislatures in regard to merchant shipping are contained in sections 735 and 736 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. The Board of Trade regard these sections as giving power to a British dominion or possession to legislate for her own registered ships, and for all British ships engaging in the coasting trade of the dominion or possession. Section 735 gives power to "repeal wholly or in part any provisions of this Act . . . relating to ships registered in that Possession," and this power has been taken to imply the power to substitute other provisions for those repealed. It is a little difficult to determine exactly how far this power extends, but in the view of the Board of Trade it would not enable a British dominion or possession, having repealed the provisions of our Acts in relation to safety (e.g., life-saving appliances, loadline, etc.), to claim thereafter that ships registered in the dominion or possession could come to the United Kingdom without complying with our, or equivalent, requirements. The point is of very considerable importance in relation to Canada, because Canada at present has no requirements as to loadline (the law which was passed in 1891 not having been considered satisfactory, and not having been brought into force by Order in Council as required by section 444), and her law relative to crew space and certain other matters is not in accordance with ours. The view that a dominion or colony can make some laws in regard to shipping, which have extra-territorial operation, is, however, supported by certain provisions of our Acts, such as, for example, section 114 (4), 1894, which provides that the master of a ship registered in a British possession need not comply with the United Kingdom law as to agreements, if he has an agreement with the crew made in accordance with the law of the port of registry or of that at which he engaged the crew.

Further, provision is made in sections 264 and 444 for the recognition of passenger certificates and loadline certificates granted in a British possession, though in both these cases the recognition has to be made by a Special Order in Council. Section 264 definitely provides that if a dominion or possession applies or adapts Part II. of the Act to certain ships the law has effect throughout His Majesty's dominions.

As regards those provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act which relate to things to be done on the high seas or by masters and by British Consuls in foreign ports, there is no definite provision in empowering British possessions to deal with matters of that kind. From a practical point of view it would be very embarrassing if Consuls had to deal with British ships registered in various ports of the Empire in a different way according to the port of registry of the vessel. It seems, therefore, essential that the laws which apply to British ships in foreign ports should be uniform, and the only way in practice to secure this uniformity is either by creating an Imperial code or by leaving the matter to be dealt with entirely by United Kingdom law.

3. Reference was made to the provisions of section 735 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894, which gives power to British possessions (including what are now dominions) to repeal provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, which extend to the colony. There is, however, no provision by which a possession or dominion can repeal laws made in another possession or dominion, and if we assume that in general the idea was that a British possession or dominion had (in general) only territorial jurisdiction, there was obviously no need for such a provision. If, however, dominions or possessions were to be given extra-territorial jurisdiction generally with regard to shipping there would certainly be possibilities of considerable conflict of law. It may be stated roughly that the merchant shipping legislation of Canada has not developed so far as that of this country, and on the other hand, Australia and New Zealand have gone further in a good many ways, as, for example, by dealing with wages questions in their merchant shipping law, and by imposing a number of requirements on shipowners in excess of our law. It is unlikely that New Zealand, for instance, would agree to Canadian ships coming to her ports and claiming to be free from the requirements which are imposed by law on New Zealand ships, while we should equally object to Canadian ships claiming to be absolutely free from our jurisdiction while in United Kingdom ports. We, on the other hand, have always claimed that ships registered in the United Kingdom need not comply with the (to us) excessive requirements of the Australian and New Zealand law, so long as they do not engage in the Australian or New Zealand coasting trade. This is in accordance with the view that a dominion or colony should only legislate, in so far as her legislation is not in strict agreement with that of the United Kingdom for ships registered in the dominion or colony or engaged in the coasting trade. A difficulty which arises through a strict adherence to this principle is that of the colonial-registered ship which trades outside of the jurisdiction of her own colony. For example, a certain number of Canadian-owned sailing ships transferred their registers to Barbados in order to evade certain Canadian requirements in regard to certificated officers. We have, however, in practice, agreed that a colonial Government can require any British ship sailing from her port to carry certificated officers to the same extent as similar ships are required to carry certificated officers when sailing from a port in the United Kingdom.

A further example of the possibilities of conflict between the law of the United Kingdom and of certain dominions is contained in the legislation which has been passed by Australia, Canada and New Zealand, on the lines of the Harter Act, of the United States, to prohibit shipowners from inserting in bills of lading clauses limiting their liability in the case of damage to cargo. The New Zealand law on this subject was at first drawn to apply to all contracts of carriage relating to goods shipped to and from New Zealand, but after representations from the Home Government, the New Zealand Government agreed to limit the effect of their legislation to goods carried from New Zealand or contracts entered into in New Zealand.

The present position of merchant shipping legislation through the Empire is in certain respects unsatisfactory. The real solution of the difficulty is to have an Imperial code, but, as indicated above, the practical difficulty is that Canadian legislation is not in certain respects up-to-date, and Australia and New Zealand have in our view imposed certain obligations which are not necessary on grounds of safety, or go beyond the statutory requirements enacted in the United Kingdom in the interests of seamen. South Africa, as yet, has not much shipping and no recent merchant shipping legislation. There are, however, indications that United Kingdom and Australian legislation may come closer together. If so, one great difficulty in the way of uniformity will be removed. If a satisfactory agreement could be made with all the dominions on merchant shipping law we should then have very little objection to agreeing to the Canadian proposal, so far as merchant shipping is concerned. Until this can be done, however, it is desirable to maintain the present position as laid down in the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and in the resolutions of the Conference of 1907.

SIR,

War Office, London, S.W.1, 20th July, 1920.

WITH reference to your letter of the 27th May last,* relative to the desire of the Canadian Government that general powers of legislation having extra-territorial effect should be conferred on the Canadian Legislature, I am commanded by the Army Council to acquaint you, for the information of Viscount Milner, that they see no danger, from a War Office point of view, in the proposal to confer these powers, seeing that, under section 177 of the Army Act, the Canadian Government already has such powers in respect of the forces raised in the Dominion.

2. The first part of section 177 of the Army Act is quite general in its terms, and it is open to the Canadian Legislature to apply to the Canadian Forces a code of military law entirely different from the Army Act. The subsequent provision of the section enabling the Canadian and other Colonial Legislatures to apply the Army Act is purely permissive and it is open to them to adopt the British code or to have an entirely different code.

3. In these circumstances the Army Council do not see that so far as the War Office is concerned any prejudicial effects need follow from the proposal of the Canadian Government.

[Answered by No. 33.]

SIR,

Home Office, Whitehall, 6th August, 1920.

With reference to your letter of the 27th May last,* transmitting a copy of a despatch from the Governor-General of Canada relative to the desire of the Canadian Government that general powers of legislation extra-territorially should be conferred on the Canadian Parliament, I am directed by Mr. Secretary Shortt to forward herewith a copy of a memorandum on the subject which is designed to raise various points which deserve consideration and may possibly be of assistance to the Law Officers if Lord Milner thinks well to send it to them.

I am, &c.,

E. BLACKWELL.

Enclosure in No. 25.

MEMORANDUM.

It is somewhat difficult to deal with the question of the possible trouble to which the amendment of section 91 of the British North America Act, 1867, suggested by the Canadian Government, may give rise on questions of nationality and the treatment of aliens until we know what are the views of the Law Officers as to the legal and constitutional effect of the proposed amendment, and as to whether it involves any real extension of the present legislative powers possessed by Canada. At the same time, one cannot approach the consideration of the particular points which are of interest to the Home Office without forming some view upon the general question.

The amendment proposes to give extra-territorial effect where necessary to legislation which is otherwise within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada.

The Canadian argument as disclosed in the copy of the Canadian Privy Council report of the 5th February, 1920, is to the effect that the amendment is merely declaratory of the existing law. Their argument is based upon a number of judicial decisions which are quoted. Upon those decisions the Canadian Government seek to justify the proposition that Canadian Legislature already possesses legislative powers which may take effect outside the territorial limits of Canada and that "the United Kingdom and the Dominions have under His Majesty relations which may be assimilated to those of independent sovereign states each exercising within its own compass exclusive and independent sovereign powers of legislation and government." It is the duty, they say, of the Imperial Parliament not to invade the appropriate sphere of Dominion authority. The propositions enunciated by the Privy Council in this report are of a general nature and are apparently intended to be of general application. The whole question has been provoked, however, by the Canadian desire for special extra-territorial authority in connexion with the proposed legislation on the subject of aircraft control. Navigation and transport are also mentioned as matters in respect of which extra-territorial powers of legislation may be required (see page 4 of the report).

* No. 18.

The only case which directly bears upon the proposal advanced by the Canadian Government is that of Attorney-General for Canada v. Cain, 1906 A.C. 542. The decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in that case was to the effect that the expulsion of an alien under the Canadian Alien Labour Act cannot be invalidated merely by reason of the necessity for such extra-territorial constraint as may be necessary for the purpose of effecting the expulsion and that the Crown must be deemed to have clothed the Dominions with the necessary powers for this purpose. The Canadian argument based on this case is that whereas the Parliament of Canada is shown to have extra-territorial authority with respect to the particular legislation under review in that case, it is therefore necessary and right that the proposal shall be enacted in general terms so as to give effect to this extra-territorial authority in any case where it is required. But even though constitutionally the Canadian Legislature now possesses authority to legislate for the Dominion in exactly the same way and to the same extent as the Imperial Parliament could have legislated for Canada if the powers of the Imperial Parliament had not been delegated to the Canadian Government, that legislative authority is on the face of it intra-territorial in its scope since Canadian Legislature has authority to legislate only for the peace, order and good government of Canada. In considering, therefore, whether the proposed amendment involves an extension of Canadian legislative authority, it is impossible not to feel that there is some significance in the Canadian desire for an express declaration of extra-territorial powers. Such an express declaration is an entirely different thing from a legal decision to the same or similar effect (as in the Attorney-General v. Cain) that in order to carry out a particular course of action which has been authorized by statute it may be necessary to infer an authority to produce certain extra-territorial consequences.

Whatever may be the precise legal consequences of the proposed amendment it seems therefore to represent an attempt by the Canadians to extend their powers, and it is necessary to deal with it on the basis that there is at least danger that if passed the amendment may enable the Canadian Government to pass laws purporting to affect other parts of the Empire. The undesirability of a situation in which such a claim is possible is in itself a strong objection to the amendment. The fact that there is at present no clear indication that the Canadian Government have any intention of making an unreasonable use of the amendment if passed is insufficient to dispose of this objection.

In considering the possible effects of the amendment upon subjects which are of special concern to the Home Office, namely, nationality, naturalization, and the treatment of aliens, it is not easy to see what kind of legislation it would be open to the Canadian Parliament to pass so as to give rise to conflicts of law within the Empire, or (as regards the deportation of aliens) so as to go beyond what was declared valid in Cain's case. Any attempt by a country to give extra-territorial effect to its legislation by directing things to be done and, in the event of disobedience, constraint to be exercised outside its own territory would so far as it involved action in the territory of another independent State, clearly not be recognized by that other State. Although, therefore, the relation between the Dominion of Canada and the United Kingdom or between Canada and the other Dominions is not that of one independent State to another, it is hardly conceivable that the Canadian Government would seek to impose obligations or attempt to direct things to be done in the United Kingdom or in any other part of the British Empire for the purpose of effecting the disposal of aliens by deportation from Canada.

As regards nationality and naturalization, there may be some risk of legislation which would be embarrassing to the Imperial Government and the Governments of the other Dominions. So far as Canadian local certificates of naturalization are concerned, the local certificate so long as it is on the face of it expressed to take effect in Canada only could not have effect elsewhere. It is only in cases where legislation according to its intention as judicially ascertained must necessarily have an extra-territorial effect that the amendment is intended to operate.

As regards Imperial certificates, the peculiar position of the Dominion of Canada resulting from the failure by the Canadian Government to adopt our 1914 Act in the manner intended somewhat complicates the position. The conclusion that the passing of legislation similar to and to a great extent in exactly the same terms as the Imperial Act of 1914 is tantamount to adoption within the meaning of section 9 (1) of that Act is a matter of convenience and policy rather than an obvious conclusion of law. If it were decided by a competent judicial authority that Canada had not adopted the Imperial Act, Canada would not by virtue of that Act have any power to grant an Imperial certificate. The suggested amendment might create a certain amount of inter-Dominion conflict of opinion and might precipitate recourse to a judicial decision on the true legal and constitutional position of Canada in regard to the grant of certificates of naturalization. Canada in such circumstances might seize the opportunity of using the now proposed amendment for the purpose of passing an Act designed to give Imperial validity to all certificates of naturalization granted in Canada, i.e., an Act giving such certificates an extra-Canadian effect throughout the Empire and not limited to giving effect to such certificates in those Dominions which have formally adopted our 1914 Act. Such developments are perhaps not very likely, but the possibility of unnecessary confusion and argument is to the detriment of Imperial interests. Upon the assumption that Canada has adopted the Imperial Act of 1914 it is possible that the amendment may give rise to confusion in a similar way. Canada has power, upon this basis, to grant Imperial certificates, but those certificates do not have effect for the purpose of conferring the status of a British subject in any Dominion which has not adopted part 2 of the Act. If, however, the proposed amendment were passed it appears to be possible that the Canadian Legislature might thereby be enabled to pass an Act expressing the intention that Imperial certificates of naturalization granted in Canada should have effect in all His Majesty's dominions irrespective of any limitations imposed by section 9 of the Imperial Act of 1914. But any such attempt would involve also a claim to pass a law which had wider extra-territorial effect within the Empire than the Imperial Act though not in excess of the powers which the Imperial Parliament could have exercised if it had desired to do so; and on the whole the risk of any such legislation by Canada may not be great.

The general conclusion is:—

(1) That the possible consequences resulting from the amendment if adopted are so largely dependent upon the decision as to its exact legal and constitutional effect that any estimate of its significance in relation to those subjects in which this Department is specially concerned must necessarily be indeterminate.

(2) The amendment, if adopted, may give rise to some difficulty and confusion on questions of nationality and naturalization. The mere possibility that questions of doubt and difficulty may arise as between the Imperial Parliament and Canada and as between Canada and the other Dominions is sufficient to throw grave doubts on the desirability of the amendment in the interests of the Empire.

[Answered by No. 28.]

SIR,

Downing Street, 13th August, 1920.

I AM directed by Viscount Milner to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 10th June,* relative to the proposal that general powers of extra-territorial legislation should be conferred on the Canadian Parliament, and to transmit to you, for the information of Earl Curzon of Kedleston, copy of a report on the subject which has been furnished by the Law Officers of the Crown.

2. An Address to the King praying for an amendment of the British North America Act in the terms set out in the reference to the Law Officers† was passed by the two Houses of the Canadian Parliament before the recent prorogation, and it is to be presumed that a despatch may shortly be received from the Governor-General forwarding the Address and dealing with the points raised in Lord Milner's telegram of the 6th May.‡

3. It appears from the debates§ on the Address to His Majesty, of which copies will be sent to you when available, that what the Canadian Government wish to secure by their proposal is the power of enforcing in the Canadian Courts, on Canadian citizens, when they return within the Canadian jurisdiction, any obligations imposed on them by the law of Canada when outside the limits of the Dominion.

* No. 19.

† Enclosure in No. 18.

It still remains necessary, however, to consider the proposal with reference to the terms in which the Imperial Parliament is asked to give effect to it. I am accordingly to inquire whether it is correctly understood from your letter that Lord Curzon sees no objection to the proposed amendment of the British North America Act on the ground that it would enable the Canadian Parliament to legislate for British subjects in foreign countries provided that these are (by whatever test may be agreed upon) Canadians, and, if so, whether this applies also to the special case of China, where British subjects generally are at present legislated for by Orders in Council under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act.

4. As regards the question discussed in paragraphs 4 and 5 of your letter of the necessity of giving the Dominions upon whom "C" mandates have been conferred the power of legislating for the mandated territories, this matter formed the subject of the Law Officers' opinion of the 23rd January, 1920,* of which a copy is enclosed for convenience of reference, and in view of that opinion does not require to be considered in connexion with the proposal of the Canadian Government. With reference, however, to the statement in paragraph 5 that an Order in Council under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act is void if it is in conflict with the Statute law of the United Kingdom, I am to observe that the Foreign Jurisdiction Act (section 12) merely provides that if an Order in Council made in pursuance of the Act as respects any foreign country is in any respect repugnant to the provisions of any Act of Parliament, etc., extending to His Majesty's subjects in that country, it shall to the extent of such repugnancy, but not otherwise, be void, and that it shall not be void on the ground of repugnancy to the law of England unless it is repugnant to some such Act, etc., as aforesaid, and that in Queen v. Staples, the Privy Council held that there must be repugnancy to a Statute or Order applied in some special way to British subjects in the foreign country in question. So far as repugnancy to Imperial Statutes is concerned, legislation under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act is thus in much the same position as that in which all Dominion legislation stands at present in consequence of the Colonial Laws Validity Act.

H. J. READ.

LAW OFFICERS' REPORT.

WE have taken the matter† into our consideration and in obedience to Your Lordship's commands have the honour to report:—

That Section 91 of the British North America Act, 1867, gives the Parliament of Canada power to legislate for the peace, order, and good government of Canada, and amongst other subjects within this power enumerates the regulation of trade and commerce, navigation and shipping, patents and copyright and criminal law. In Attorney-General for Canada v. Cain (1906) A.C. page 542 it was held that a Canadian enactment was not necessarily ultra vires because it involved extra-territorial constraint, but no doubt, as a general rule, Colonial legislation is ultra vires if it purports to operate extra-territorially. The reasons for this rule are obvious. If it were acknowledged as a general principle that laws of the Colonies might have extra-territorial operation, frequent conflicts between the various Colonies would almost inevitably arise owing to overlapping and conflicting legislation. (Conflict between Imperial and Colonial legislation is prevented by the Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865 (28 and 29 Vict. c. 63), any Colonial law repugnant to the provisions of any Imperial Act extending to the Colony being void to the extent of the repugnancy.)

It is difficult to say what would be held to be the effect of the proposed amendment, having regard to the words "otherwise within the legislative authority of the Parliament." It might be held that it merely expresses the existing law, as exemplified in Attorney-General for Canada v. Cain (ubi supra). But if it were construed as giving the Canadian Parliament power to legislate extra-territorially generally with regard to all the matters mentioned in the section, provided only that the legislation could be said to concern the peace, order and good government of Canada, it would reverse the fundamental rule that Colonial legislation must prima facie relate exclusively to the Colony, and might, we think, quite probably lead to conflict with the other self-governing Dominions, who would naturally expect to be placed on the same footing in this respect as Canada.

In our opinion the Government should refuse to assent to the proposed amendment, and should consent to extra-territorial power being given to Colonies only as regards specified subjects where for special reasons it is considered desirable that they should have such powers.

ADMIRALTY to COLONIAL OFFICE.

[Answered by No. 33.]

SIR,

Admiralty, 19th August, 1920.

In reply to your letter of the 27th May,* relative to the desire of the Canadian Government that general powers of legislation ex-territorially should be conferred on the Canadian Parliament, I am commanded by My Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty to request that you will inform the Secretary of State for the Colonies that they assume that the restrictions placed on Dominion legislation by the constituting Acts of Parliament would suffice to prevent any possibility of difficulty by reason of such legislation referring to the class of questions dealt with in the Foreign Enlistment Act or relating to Treaties, or having a bearing on International Law, etc. If this be the case, the chief importance of the proposal from the Admiralty point of view appears to lie in the effect which the conferment of the proposed powers would have on acts dealing with naval discipline. This aspect of the question has been referred to the Judge Advocate of the Fleet, whose advice is to the following effect.

2. If the Canadian Government were given general powers to legislate ex-territorially, the result would be that its Naval Discipline Act would, prima facie, be effective everywhere, even, for instance, in Portsmouth or Sydney harbours. Apart from the grave constitutional questions which conceivably might arise in these circumstances, it cannot be said that as things are at the present moment, there is any overwhelming objection to the proposal, inasmuch as Canada has already applied the Imperial Naval Discipline Act to her naval forces. Nevertheless, it is thought that the proposal is to be deprecated from the legal point of view. At present the view taken by legal authorities in Great Britain is that Dominion Parliaments, which have under their constitutions the power to legislate for the peace, order, and good government of the Dominions in relation to naval defence, have no power to legislate effectively for naval discipline outside the territorial waters of the Dominion. It was to surmount this difficulty that, as the result of an opinion of the Law Officers to the above effect, the Naval Discipline (Dominion Naval Forces) Act was passed in 1911. That Act ensures our Naval Defence Act being in force in Dominion ships at all events when outside the waters of the Dominions.

3. The change in the legislative powers now proposed by Canada would, no doubt, if acceded to, be demanded by the other self-governing Dominions, and the result would inevitably be that in time differences would arise in the Naval Discipline Acts in force in the different Dominion navies; differences probably at first small, but possibly later on extending to what are considered here to be essential points. The degree of objection to this depends on the ultimate development of the Dominion navies. If they become merely allied navies, the importance may be small. If, on the other hand, they become in time of emergency, as in the late War, an integral part of the naval forces of the Crown, it is very important to keep the disciplinary laws as nearly alike as possible.

* No. 18.

4. Further, it appears to be inevitable that in the immediate future the Dominion navies should depend largely for training on the Royal Navy, and there is a risk of serious difficulty when Dominion ships in peace time are attached to fleets or squadrons of the Royal Navy if the Naval Discipline Acts in force in them are different in essential points. It may be anticipated that the question would arise sooner or later whether the proviso to section 1 of the Act of 1911 (which enacts that where any Dominion forces or ships have been placed at the disposal of the Admiralty the Naval Discipline Act of the British Navy shall apply without any modification or adaptation) was not impliedly repealed, or, if not, whether it ought not to be repealed. At present the Dominions are willing to adopt the Naval Discipline Act and the Act of 1911. Whether, however, they would continue to be willing to accept our Naval Discipline Act in its entirety if the doubt as to their powers to legislate ex-territorially for naval discipline were removed, is by no means certain in view of the known tendency in the Dominions to deprecate severe punishments for offences against naval and military discipline.

5. Their Lordships agree generally with the views expressed by the Judge Advocate of the Fleet.

I am, &c.,
V. W. BADDELEY.

With reference to your letter of the 13th instant,* I am directed by Earl Curzon of Kedleston to state that Viscount Milner is correct in thinking that Lord Curzon does not think it necessary to raise any objection to the proposed amendment of the British North America Act on the ground that it would enable the Canadian Parliament to legislate for British subjects in foreign countries, provided that these are Canadians.

2. With regard to China, the right of the Crown to legislate by Order in Council and King's Regulations, under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, for all British subjects in China will not, in His Lordship's opinion, be prejudiced by the conferment on the Dominion Parliament of powers to legislate for Canadians with extra-territorial effect.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS to GOVERNOR-GENERAL'S SECRETARY.

SIR,

Ottawa, 25th August, 1920.

WITH reference to a Secret despatch from the Secretary of State for the Colonies to the Governor-General, dated the 6th May, 1920, with regard to the proposed amendment of the British North America Act respecting extra-territorial legislation, I have the honour to represent that the Minister of Justice apprehends that the requisite provision cannot well be expressed except in general terms. The suggestion was that it should be declared in effect "that an enactment of the Parliament of Canada, otherwise intra vires, shall operate and be deemed to have operated, extra-territorially according to its intention in the like manner and to the same extent as if enacted by the Parliament of the United Kingdom." The limitation introduced by the words "otherwise intra vires" appears to the Minister to exclude the possibility that the other Dominions would be placed in the same relation to the Parliament of Canada as to the Parliament of the United Kingdom. It is in relation only to the powers committed to the Parliament of Canada by the British North America Acts, section 91 of the Acts of 1867, or otherwise, that extra-territorial authority can attach. It will be for the judicial tribunals to determine the enacting authority for, as well as to interpret, any legislation for which the power in question may be invoked. Obviously any such enactment must have Canadian locality with respect to the persons affected or the subject matter; thus, for example, Canadian shipping should be subject to local regulation not conflicting with the provisions of the Imperial Merchant Shipping Acts; it should be possible to extend local criminal enactments against offences committed abroad by Canadians, as in the case of Canadians who commit bigamy in foreign countries and return to Canada; the regulation of the Customs and Air Services also produces occasion for the exercise of extra-territorial power; but it is impossible to foresee or to enumerate all the conditions under which the authority might with propriety be usefully exercised. The Parliament of Canada has within its prescribed limits authority as plenary and ample as the Imperial Parliament in the plenitude of its power possesses and can bestow, and it is in the Minister's opinion desirable to set at rest by Imperial sanction any doubts which might otherwise exist as to the operation extra-territorially of the legislation of the Parliament of Canada within those limits, whether as to person or subject matter. The other Dominions, it is submitted, cannot be thereby possibly affected as the exercise of legislative powers with relation to them is not incident to any of the powers possessed by the Parliament of Canada.

I am at the same time to transmit herewith an Address* to His Excellency from the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, forwarding a Joint Address† of the two Houses to His Majesty the King, praying that steps may be taken to amend the British North America Act, 1867, so as to cause any enactment of the Parliament of Canada otherwise within the legislative authority of the Parliament to operate and to be deemed to have operated extra-territorially according to its intention in the like manner and to the same extent as if enacted by the Parliament of the United Kingdom, and I am to request that His Excellency may be humbly moved to communicate the substance of what is above set forth to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, at the same time forwarding the Address to the King in order that it may be submitted to His Majesty.

I AM directed by Viscount Milner to acknowledge the receipt of your Report of the 13th July‡ relative to the proposal that the British North America Act should be amended so as to confer powers to legislate extra-territorially on the Parliament of Canada.

2. I am now to transmit to you the following further papers:—

- (a) Copy of a despatch from the Governor-General of Canada transmitting the Address of both Houses of the Parliament of Canada, praying the King to submit a measure to Parliament for the purpose in question.
- (b) Copy of a further despatch from the Governor-General enclosing a letter from the Department of External Affairs explaining, in reply to Lord Milner's telegram of the 6th May, the nature of the proposed amendment as viewed by the Canadian Government.
- (c) The Debates on the Address which took place in the House of Commons of Canada on the 24th June and in the Senate on 26th June.
- (d) Letters containing the observations of the Foreign Office, Air Ministry, Board of Trade, War Office, Home Office and Admiralty on the proposed amendment of the British North America Act, together with copies of subsequent correspondence with the Foreign Office.

3. Lord Milner would be obliged if you would favour him with any further observations which you may have to offer after considering these papers.

COLONIAL OFFICE to LAW OFFICERS, AND LAW OFFICERS' REPORT.

GENTLEMEN,

Downing Street, 20th December, 1920.

I AM directed by Viscount Milner to acknowledge the receipt of your further Report of the 10th November† relative to the proposal that the British North America Act should be amended so as to confer powers to legislate extra-territorially on the Parliament of Canada.

2. The origin of the proposal is the adoption by the Canadian Government of the view that such legislation is required to enable the Dominion to control effectively the proceedings of Canadian aircraft outside Canada. The question whether immediate legislation of the character proposed is required from this standpoint would seem to be affected by two points:—

(i) Whether or not, if Canada becomes a party to the International Air Convention, the powers conferred by Section 132 of the British North America Act can be regarded as such as to enable the Canadian Parliament to deal with offences against the Convention even if committed outside the limits of the Dominion. The Section, which seems to be couched in very wide terms, runs as follows:—

"The Parliament and Government of Canada shall have all powers necessary or proper for performing the obligations of Canada or of any Province thereof, as part of the British Empire, towards Foreign Countries arising under Treaties between the Empire and such Foreign Countries."

(ii) Whether, apart from any question of Treaty obligation, the necessary powers for dealing with Canadian offenders against the Canadian laws relating to aviation found within the Canadian jurisdiction, even if the offences have been committed outside Canada could not be secured by a Canadian law making it an offence to re-enter Canada having committed such an offence, in accordance with the principle of the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Peninsular and Oriental Navigation Company v. Kingston, A.C., 1903, page 471.

3. Lord Milner would be obliged if you would be so good as to take the above points into your consideration and favour him with your observations thereon.

I am, &c.,

G. GRINDLE.

SIR,

Downing Street, 21st January, 1921.

WITH further reference to your letter of the 11th October last,* I am directed by Viscount Milner to state that the Law Officers of the Crown have advised

(a) That the powers conferred by section 132 of the British North America Act, 1867, relative to the performance of the Treaty obligations of Canada, are sufficient to enable the Canadian Parliament, if Canada becomes a party to the International Air Convention, to deal with offences against the Convention by Canadian airmen even though the offences are committed outside the limits of the Dominion, and

(b) That apart from any question of Treaty obligations the necessary powers for dealing with Canadian offenders against the Canadian laws relating to aviation found within the Canadian jurisdiction, even if the offences have been committed outside Canada, could be secured by a Canadian law making it an offence to re-enter Canada having committed such an offence, in accordance with the principle of the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in *P. & O. MY LORD DUKE,

Downing Street, 21st January, 1921.

I HAVE the honour to acknowledge the receipt of Your Excellency's Secret despatch of the 1st September,* enclosing a copy of a letter from the Department of External Affairs setting forth the views of the Minister of Justice on the points raised in my telegram of the 6th May† with regard to the proposed amendment of the British North America Act respecting extra-territorial legislation.

2. The explanations of the proposed measure given in the letter enclosed in your despatch, and in the speeches on the subject delivered in the Canadian Parliament by the Minister of Justice and Sir James Loughheed, on the 24th and 26th June,‡ respectively, show that the powers which it is desired to secure by the proposed measure are of a much more limited character than had been supposed when I sent my telegram of the 6th May. His Majesty's Government still, however, feel great difficulty with regard to the form of the proposed measure, and have some doubt whether an amendment of the Act is really necessary to secure the purposes which your Ministers have in view.

3. The origin of the proposal is the adoption by the Canadian Government of the view that such legislation is required to make it clear that the Canadian Parliament has power to control effectively the proceedings of Canadian airmen and aircraft outside Canada. His Majesty's Government would regret if the prolongation of the discussion of the proposed measure should cause the Canadian Government any inconvenience in this respect, but they are advised by the Law Officers of the Crown that the powers conferred by section 132 of the British North America Act, 1867, relative to the performance of the Treaty obligations of Canada, are sufficient to enable the Canadian Parliament, if Canada becomes a party to the International Air Convention, to deal with offences against the Convention by Canadian airmen, even though the offences are committed outside the limits of the Dominion.

4. Apart from the specific powers conferred by section 132 of the British North America Act, it would appear that even where there is no question of Treaty obligations, the necessary powers could be secured for dealing with Canadian offenders against Canadian laws (e.g., those relating to aviation) who are found within the Canadian jurisdiction, even if the offences have been committed outside Canada. His Majesty's Government are advised that it is open to the Canadian Parliament, in accordance with the principle of the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in P. & O. Navigation Company v. Kingston, A.C., 1903, page 471, to confer the necessary jurisdiction on the Canadian Courts by passing a law making it an offence to re-enter Canada having committed such an offence.

SIR,

India Office, Whitehall, London, S.W.1., 2nd February, 1921.

I AM directed by the Secretary of State for India to acknowledge receipt of Sir Henry Lambert's letter of 21st January, 1921,* regarding the advice given by the Law Officers of the Crown as to the competence of the Canadian Parliament to deal with offences against the Air Convention.

I am to inquire whether the Secretary of State for the Colonies is advised that the Parliaments of the other Dominions already possess all the powers necessary to carry out their obligations under the Convention, and whether it is proposed to introduce any Imperial legislation extending the powers of the Dominion Legislatures. In the latter event Mr. Montagu would desire to consider the question of introducing simultaneous legislation in Parliament with a view to enabling the Indian Legislature to enact measures having the extra-territorial effect required by the Convention.

SIR,

Downing Street, 11th February, 1921.

WITH reference to your letter of the 2nd of February† relative to the competence of the Dominion Parliaments to deal with offences against the Air Convention, I am directed by the Secretary of State to request you to inform Mr. Secretary Montagu that there has been no indication that any of the Dominions other than Canada considers that its Parliament has not already all the powers necessary to carry out its obligations under the Convention.

2. It would, in fact, appear from the second ruling of the Law Officers of the Crown (which, though given with special reference to Canada, applies generally), that Imperial legislation is not required to confer on the local Courts the jurisdiction necessary to enable them to deal with offences against the local law committed outside the territorial limits.

3. Consequently, it is not proposed to introduce into the Imperial Parliament any legislation on the subject.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS TO GOVERNOR-GENERAL'S SECRETARY.

SIR,

Ottawa, 1st March, 1921.

WITH reference to the Secret despatch to His Excellency from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, dated 21st January, 1921, on the subject of the proposed amendment of the British North America Act respecting extra-territorial legislation, I have the honour to state that the suggestions contained in the third and fourth paragraphs of Lord Milner's despatch have been carefully considered by the Minister of Justice, and he regrets that in his opinion they do not meet the case.

He points out that section 132 of the British North America Act, 1867, provides that the Parliament of Canada shall have all powers necessary or proper for performing the obligations of Canada, or of any Province thereof, as part of the British Empire, towards foreign countries arising under treaties between the Empire and such foreign countries. This provision is unnecessary, so far as concerns powers within the purview of section 91, and therefore he apprehends that its purpose was to confer upon the Dominion the limited powers which it describes in so far as these might require to be exercised with regard to the classes of subjects enumerated by section 92, which otherwise rest exclusively with the Province; it being intended, as is obviously most convenient, that for the performance of treaty obligations there should be no distribution of powers as between the Dominion and the Provinces, and that the power of the Dominion should be comprehensive. Section 132 therefore operates only in derogation from the exclusive authority of the Provinces, and presumably is effective only with respect to such powers as are strictly necessary or proper for performing obligations contracted by treaty. The purpose which it serves is thus closely limited; there may be many provisions which the Parliament of Canada would consider advisable, either with respect to regulation of the Air Force or otherwise, for which no treaty undertaking exists, and for the sanction of which there is, in consequence, no international obligation.

In the case of Peninsular and Oriental Navigation Company vs. Kingston, 1903, A.C., 471, to which the Secretary of State for the Colonies refers, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council had under consideration a provision of the Customs Act of Australia that the seals upon ships' stores arriving in any port from parts beyond the seas and bound to any other port within the Commonwealth should not be broken except by authority, and that the master of any ship entering port with the seals broken should be liable to a penalty. It was pointed out by Their Lordships that the legislation proceeded upon precisely the same lines as section 135 of the Imperial Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, under which if a foreign ship were to take goods so sealed from one bonded warehouse in the United Kingdom to another, going in the course of her voyage outside of the territorial limits of the United Kingdom, the very same question might arise, and that upon her arrival at any other port in the United Kingdom the master would undoubtedly be liable to the penalties prescribed by that section. There is therefore nothing in this case founded upon any distinction between the legislative powers of the United Kingdom and those of the Dominions. In fact it seems to be implied by the decision that the powers in either case are the same. The Peninsular and Oriental Navigation Company's case merely affords an illustration, and probably it is cited for no other purpose than to show that it is possible by apt legislative expression to impose penalties for entering a territorial jurisdiction after having committed beyond that jurisdiction an act which the legislature to the extent of its powers has prohibited. Doubtless that is a method or expedient of legislation available either to the United Kingdom or to the Dominions, but the Dominion of Canada desires to be limited to that form of legislation no more than the United Kingdom is, and there may be circumstances in which it would not afford an adequate remedy.

The object of the request formulated by the Order in Council of 5th February, 1920, was to obtain, for the avoidance of doubt, a competent declaration of the equality of Dominion legislative powers for purposes of local government with those which the Parliament of the United Kingdom possesses for its local government. In either case, it may be requisite that the legislature should impose, with adequate sanction, duties upon its nationals to be observed beyond territorial limits. There can, it is submitted, be no question about the legal effect of such legislation as proceeding from His Majesty's Parliament at Westminster; it is desirable that the authority of the Dominion Parliament in relation to its nationals, wherever they may be, should be equally clear, and in the absence of any acceptable suggestion for the improvement of the form of enactment proposed to effect this purpose the Minister adheres to that which is outlined by the penultimate paragraph of the aforesaid Order in Council.

I am to request that His Excellency may be humbly moved to communicate the views, as above set forth, to Mr. Secretary Churchill.

Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs.

[Copy sent to Air Ministry, War Office, Admiralty, Board of Trade, Home Office, and Foreign Office, 9th May, 1921. L.F.]

GENTLEMEN,

Downing Street, 5th May, 1921.

WITH reference to your Report of the 24th December last* relative to the proposed amendment of the British North America Act respecting extra-territorial legislation, I am directed by Mr. Secretary Churchill to transmit to you a copy of a despatch† on the subject addressed by Viscount Milner to the Governor-General of Canada on the 21st January, together with a copy of a despatch‡ in reply which has been received from the Governor-General.

2. It will be seen that the Canadian Government do not share the view that in matters relating to the enforcement of the Treaty obligations of Canada, the desired powers are already conferred by Section 132 of the British North America Act, and that they also regard as undesirable and inadequate the expedient of proceeding in accordance with the principle of the Judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in P. & O. Navigation Company v. Kingston. Further they state that, in the absence of any acceptable suggestion for the improvement of the form of enactment, they adhere to that originally proposed.

3. In these circumstances Mr. Churchill would be obliged if after taking into consideration the papers accompanying this letter and those forwarded with the previous references you could either suggest another formula for submission to the Canadian Government or state for communication to the Canadian Government precisely what the objections are to the formula originally proposed.

4. In connexion with the allusions to "nationals" in the penultimate paragraph of the letter accompanying the Governor-General's despatch of the 2nd March,‡ I am to transmit to you a copy of a Bill "to define Canadian Nationals" introduced into the House of Commons of Canada by the Minister of Justice on the 1st March, 1921, together with the Debates§ on the Bill so far as received (viz., 1st March, pp. 421-2; 4th March, p. 616; 8th March, pp. 679-684; 10th March, pp. 805-826), and a pamphlet containing the Immigration Act. As regards Clause 1 (a) of the Bill I am to refer to Section 2 sub-sections (d) and (f) of the Immigration Act (pp. 8 and 9 of the pamphlet||). You will observe that in the Second Reading Debate on the 8th March (Hansard, p. 680) Mr. Doherty remarked:—"Should the legislation which this House asked last year to have passed by the British Parliament clearing up any doubt as to the extra-territorial effect of our legislation be enacted, as I have every reason to believe it will be, it will then be important to have a clear cut definition of who are the people who may be affected by that legislation."

We have taken the matter into our consideration and in obedience to your commands have the honour to report

THAT we cannot suggest any other formula which would at the same time satisfy the desires of the Canadian Government and be free from objection on constitutional grounds. It appears from paragraph 3 of the letter of the 1st March, 1921, from the Department of the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the Dominion of Canada desires the same powers of extra-territorial legislation as are possessed by the Imperial Parliament, and the objections to the formula originally proposed are those indicated in the Law Officers' Report of 13th July, 1920,* namely, that if this formula were construed as giving the Canadian Parliament the power of extra-territorial legislation generally with regard to all the matters mentioned in Section 91 of the British North America Act, provided only that the legislation could be said to concern the peace, order and good government of Canada, it would reverse the fundamental rule that Colonial legislation must prima facie relate exclusively to the Colony, and might possibly and even probably lead to a serious conflict of laws as between the various self-governing Dominions if the other Dominions were placed on the same footing in this respect as that upon which Canada desires to be placed.

GENTLEMEN,

Downing Street, 22nd July, 1921.

I AM directed by Mr. Secretary Churchill to acknowledge the receipt of your Report of the 31st May* relative to the proposed amendment of the British North America Act, respecting extra-territorial jurisdiction.

2. Mr. Churchill notes that you are unable to suggest any formula which would at the same time satisfy the desires of the Canadian Government and be free from objection on constitutional grounds. It would not, however, in his opinion, be desirable to object to the formula proposed by the Canadian Government on the constitutional ground that it would reverse the fundamental rule that Colonial legislation must prima facie relate exclusively to the Colony. Having regard to the present status of the Dominions, he feels that it can hardly be expected that the Canadian Government should be content that the Canadian Parliament should remain subject to the limitations of a Colonial legislature.

3. He does not himself see any difficulty in principle to complying with the wishes of the Canadian Government as explained in the despatch from the Governor-General of the 1st September, 1920, and in the Debates in the Canadian Parliament enclosed in the Reference of the 2nd November, 1920,† especially in view of the statement contained in the despatch of the 1st September, 1920, as to the intention of the words "otherwise within the legislative authority of the Parliament."

4. Doubts were expressed in regard to the formula proposed by the Canadian Government by certain Departments of His Majesty's Government in the letters forwarded in the Reference of the 2nd November, 1920, but those letters were written before the subsequent explanations of the Canadian Government were communicated to those Departments.

5. Mr. Churchill would, in any event, be reluctant to refuse a request put forward by the Canadian Government with the endorsement of the Canadian Parliament. He would, therefore, be glad to be in a position to inform them that His Majesty's Government will introduce legislation on the lines desired, and if the formula proposed by the Canadian Government does not go beyond the wishes and intentions explained in the despatch of the 1st September, 1920, and in the debates in the Canadian Parliament, he does not himself see any reason why such intimation should not be made.

6. In these circumstances he would be glad if you would advise him whether the proposed formula goes beyond the expressed wishes and intentions of the Canadian Government. Should the answer to this question be in the affirmative, and should you still find it impossible to suggest another formula for giving effect to those wishes and intentions, he thinks that it will be necessary to furnish the Canadian Government with a detailed statement of the difficulties to which the proposed formula, as a means of carrying out their wishes and intentions, gives rise, and he would be obliged if you could assist him in this respect.

I am, &c.,
HENRY LAMBERT.

REPORT.

[Copy sent to Air Ministry, War Office, Admiralty, Board of Trade, Home Office, and Foreign Office, 29th August, 1921. L.F.]

The proposed formula does, in our opinion, go beyond the expressed wishes and intentions of the Canadian Government, particularly in view of the doubt as to what would be held to be the effect of the words "otherwise within the legislative authority of the Parliament." We have already expressed our opinion as to these words in our Report dated the 13th July, 1920.‡

* See No. 44. † No. 35. ‡ Enclosure in No. 26.

We have again considered the question of suggesting an alternative formula, and beg to report that an Act of the Imperial Parliament might be passed to amend the British North America Act, 1867, in terms which would, in our opinion, give effect to the expressed intention of the Canadian Government, as explained by Mr. Doherty and Mr. Newcomb, without being open to objection on constitutional grounds.

We are of opinion that the Address of both Houses of Parliament of Canada may be accepted with the substitution of the following for Clause 2 of the proposed Act, namely:—

"2. An enactment of the Parliament of Canada may operate extra-territorially, provided that, and in so far as, such extra-territorial operation is ancillary to, and necessary for, its enforcement as a law for the peace, order and good government of Canada."

(Secret.)

MY LORD,

Downing Street, 18th August, 1921.

I HAVE the honour to acknowledge the receipt of the Duke of Devonshire's Secret despatch, of the 2nd March,* forwarding a letter from the Department of the Secretary of State for External Affairs relative to the proposed amendment of the British North America Act respecting extra-territorial legislation.

2. At the end of this letter it is stated that the Minister of Justice adheres to the form of enactment originally proposed in the absence of any acceptable suggestion for its improvement. I have accordingly been in communication with the Law Officers of the Crown with a view to the possibility of submitting an alternative form of enactment to Your Excellency's Government. They have given their careful consideration to the matter, which involves not a few intricate and delicate problems, and they now advise that in their opinion the substitution of the following form of enactment for that originally proposed, namely:—

"2. An enactment of the Parliament of Canada may operate extra-territorially, provided that, and in so far as, such extra-territorial operation is ancillary to, and necessary for, its enforcement as a law for the peace, order, and good government of Canada."

would remove the difficulties hitherto felt by His Majesty's Government in the matter while giving effect to the intention of your Government as explained by the Minister of Justice in the debate in the House of Commons of Canada on the 24th June, 1920,† and in the letter from the Department of the Secretary of State for External Affairs which accompanied the Duke of Devonshire's despatch of 1st September, 1920.‡

3. I shall be glad to learn whether the suggested alternative form of enactment would be acceptable to your Ministers.

I have, &c.,

SIR,

Downing Street, 12th May, 1921.

I AM directed by Mr. Secretary Churchill to transmit to you, to be laid before [Earl Curzon of Kedleston,] [Mr. Secretary Shortt,] a print* containing the text of a Bill to define Canadian nationals introduced into the Canadian House of Commons, on the 1st March, and the Debates thereon, which took place on the 1st, 4th, 8th, and 10th March. After some further discussion in Committee, on 13th April, the Bill was read a third time, on the 15th April. In connexion with clause 1 (a) of the Bill, I am to enclose a pamphlet† containing the Canadian Immigration Act and to invite attention to section 2, sub-sections (d) and (f) of the Act (pages 8 and 9 of the pamphlet).

2. It will be observed from the letter from this Department, of the 9th May,‡ that copies of the Bill, the Debates, and the Immigration Act have been transmitted to the Law Officers of the Crown in connexion with the further despatch§ recently received from the Governor-General of Canada regarding the proposed amendment of the British North America Act respecting extra-territorial jurisdiction which formed the subject of your [letters of the 10th June and of the 20th August.¶] [letter of the 6th August.¶]

3. Mr. Churchill will be glad to be favoured with [Lord Curzon's] [Mr. Shortt's] observations on the Bill.

4. [To Foreign Office only: It will be observed from the Debates that the Bill has been introduced with reference not only to the proposed amendment of the British North America Act, but also to the position of Canada as a Member of the League of Nations, in particular as a party to the Permanent Statute of the International Court of Justice. In the latter connexion, it will be seen that on the 10th March (page 16 of the prints) Mr. Doherty made a statement as to the position of the "British Empire" as a member of the League.

5. Attention has been called in the letter from this Department, of the 7th May,†† to the bearing of the Bill on the question of the position under Commercial Treaties conferring rights on British subjects generally of British subjects connected with parts of the Empire to which such Treaties do not apply, a question which has again come up in consequence of the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States to the effect that in consequence of the non-adherence of Canada to the Real and Personal Property Convention with United States a British subject resident in Canada is not entitled to the benefits conferred by that Convention on British subjects generally. It may also have some bearing, in view of the position of the Dominions as "States" under the Air Convention (vide Article XL) on the question whether "nationals" of one of the British "States" can own aircraft registered in another British "State" (vide Article VII).

6. The Bill would also appear to bear on the question of the classes of British subjects in the United States whose interests would be looked after by the Canadian Minister, at Washington, when appointed.]

THE HOUSE OF COMMONS OF CANADA

BILL 17.

An Act to define Canadian Nationals.

HIS MAJESTY, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

Canadian Nationals defined.

1. The following persons shall be deemed to be Canadian Nationals, viz.:—

(a) Any British subject who is a Canadian citizen within the meaning of The Immigration Act, chapter twenty-seven of the statutes of 1910, as heretofore amended;

(b) The wife of any such citizen;

(c) Any person born out of Canada, whose father was a Canadian National at the time of that person's birth.

Declaration renouncing
Canadian nationality

2. (a) Any person who by reason of his having been born in Canada is a Canadian National, but who at his birth or during his minority became under the law of the United Kingdom or of any self-governing Dominion of the British Empire, a national also of that Kingdom or Dominion, and is still such a national, and,

(b) Any person who though born out of Canada is a Canadian national; may, if of full age and not under disability, make a declaration renouncing his Canadian nationality and on making such declaration shall cease to be a Canadian National.

HOUSE OF COMMONS DEBATES. OFFICIAL REPORT—REVISED EDITION.

Tuesday, 1st March, 1921.

CANADIAN NATIONALS DEFINITION ACT.

RIGHT HONOURABLE C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 17, to define Canadian Nationals. He said: The purpose of the Bill is to define what constitutes a Canadian national. The necessity for such a definition results, in a large measure at all events, from the fact that under different measures adopted in connexion with the carrying out of the operations of the League of Nations, there are provisions made defining certain rights and privileges which may be enjoyed by the nationals of the different members of the League. Under those circumstances it is necessary, I think, that we should make a definition by statute so that the world may know who is, and is recognized as, a Canadian national. The Bill contains one section which defines as being Canadian nationals, British subjects, domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada.

Motion agreed to and Bill read a first time.

Friday, 4th March, 1921.

CANADIAN NATIONALS DEFINITION ACT.

First Reading.

RIGHT HON. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill number 17 to define Canadian Nationals.

MR. MACKENZIE KING: Will the Minister please explain the purpose of this Bill?

* The Debates annexed to this letter include the Senate Debates and the Bill in its final form. They were sent to the Foreign Office and the Home Office on 10th June.

MR. DOHERTY: I did not contemplate to-day going further than getting the Bill into the committee stage. The purpose of the Bill is to define Canadian Nationals, and it would seem to me that the discussion of the definition might very properly be held in Committee. It seems to me highly probable that I may feel desirous of amending the Bill so as to make more complete the definition that is therein contained. I would suggest to the House that the Bill have its second reading, and when we get into committee stage I would move that the committee rise. We could then deal with the question later.

MR. MCMASTER: On the understanding that we can discuss the principle?

MR. DOHERTY: Yes, there would be no objection to a discussion of the principle in committee.

MR. MACKENZIE KING: I think that one or two members on this side of the House desire to speak on this Bill and possibly to refer more particularly to the principle involved. Under the circumstances I would suggest that the Minister do not press his motion.

MR. DOHERTY: Well, in the event I will not press my motion at the present time. It does seem to me that for the purpose of the discussion of a principle it would be desirable that we should have before us a complete definition. Therefore, there is a desire for discussion upon the motion, I would move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. MACKENZIE KING: I would like to point out to my right hon. friend that we were not expecting to go on with this Bill to-day, and that a good many members are absent.

MR. DOHERTY: I understand that, and I was rather impressed with the idea that that might very probably be the case. I realize that there is room for a very interesting discussion, and I would therefore move that the debate on the motion for second reading be adjourned.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

CANADIAN NATIONALS DEFINITION ACT.

Second Reading.

RESUMING debate on the motion of Right Hon. Mr. Doherty for the second reading of Bill No. 17, to define Canadian Nationals, adjourned from 4th March.

RIGHT HON. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): As I explained to the House when this matter was up last it is my intention, when we get into committee, to propose amendments to the definition of a Canadian National as set forth in the Bill. As that definition constitutes practically the entire Bill, I quite recognize the importance of the changes which I have in contemplation. I have asked to have the Bill as proposed to be amended printed and circulated, and I believe that has been carried out. I was informed this morning that it had been printed, and last evening I handed to the leader of the Opposition a number of copies of the Bill as proposed to be amended. I trust that under those circumstances there has been opportunity for hon. gentlemen to take communication of the amendments. Upon what may be called the principle of the Bill, it seems to me that very little is called for beyond the explanation which was given at the first reading. What needs to be clearly understood at the outset—I think it is perhaps scarcely necessary for me to mention this, but it is well to avoid any misapprehension—is that the Bill does not contemplate to in any way affect the status or position of any Canadian as a British subject. Notwithstanding its enactment we shall all remain, of course, British subjects; and under the definition as proposed nobody will be a Canadian national who is not a British subject. But the purpose of the Bill is to define a particular class of British subjects who, in addition to having all the rights and all the obligations of British subjects, have particular rights because of the fact that they are Canadians. I think we have always understood that without a specific statutory definition there has for a long time been such a person as a Canadian, and some outstanding indications which justify a man in claiming to be a Canadian. But we have reached a stage now where there are certain specific rights created in favour of Canadians, or, to use the expression in the Bill, of Canadian nationals, as such, and should the legislation which this House last year asked to have passed by the British Parliament clearing up any doubt as to the extra-territorial effect of our legislation be enacted, as I have every reason to believe it will be, it will then be important to have a clear-cut definition of who are the people who may be affected by that legislation.

I might give an outstanding instance of where we have rights created in favour of Canadian nationals the provisions of the Convention establishing the permanent Court of International Justice. Under those provisions—which I have no doubt will meet with the approval of this House when the Convention is brought down—the judges of that court are to be elected by the representatives of the different members of the League. To secure election, it is essential that a candidate or aspirant should have a majority of the votes both of the Council and of the Assembly. Each country, member of the League, has a right—a right not to be exercised directly by its government, but in the manner which I will point out in a moment—to nominate candidates. Each country proceeding in the manner to which I have referred is entitled to nominate four candidates; not more than two, however, of those candidates can be Nationals of the nominating country. So there we have a case where we need to distinguish between a National and a non-National of the nominating country.

MR. BUREAU: Will the minister allow me a question? He states that a distinction has to be made between a Canadian national and a Canadian citizen. Is it on account of the League of Nations that the word "national" is used?

MR. DOHERTY: We have already a definition of a Canadian citizen in the Immigration Act, but that definition is expressly limited to the Act itself, and we have no definition of a Canadian citizen which can be of general application.

MR. BUREAU: That is not exactly what I had in my mind.

MR. DOHERTY: I know, but I wanted to make that clear. There is a reason for using the word "national" rather than the word "citizen." It is to be found in this, that in the particular convention to which I referred and in the general proceedings of the League the word "national" is used as designating a person, whether subject or citizen, who forms part of the people of a particular member of the League. I am not certain that "national" is perhaps the most desirable word for England, but the word used in the French version of those proceedings by which the word "national" in our Bill should be translated is the word "ressortissant." I think the idea of using that word was to avoid the necessity of making distinctions between people who are subjects or citizens of a country and to get one word that, whatever the national designation, would cover the class of people who constitute the people of that country.

M. BUREAU: Le mot "ressortissant," est-il celui employé dans les procédures officielles de la Société des nations?

MR. DOHERTY: Oui, le mot est celui employé. But perhaps I had better proceed in English. In the official documents this word "ressortissant" is used. You may have to talk of the "subject" of one country and of the "citizen" of another country, but in "ressortissant" you get one word for them all. We passed considerable time with some very distinguished French gentlemen and some equally distinguished English gentlemen, trying to find an English word that would be an exact translation of "ressortissant."

MR. BUREAU: Do they use the word "national" in the English translation?

MR. DOHERTY: Yes, the word "national" is taken as the translation of the word "ressortissant." It seems further desirable that in making the definition we should use the term which is employed in these documents, because, after all, what we want to do, so far as that is a particular reason for this measure, is to have a clear-cut definition of who is the person who, as being a national of Canada, is entitled to these rights.

There is to be found in the convention a further reason for having this clear-cut definition. There is a provision in the convention that if two or more candidates, nationals of the same member of the League, should be elected judges, the question of which of these should be the judge is to be determined—and it is perhaps consoling to those of us who are not as young as we at one time were—in favour of the gentleman who counts the largest number of years to his credit. But it is obviously important that we should be able to establish just who is a Canadian national, so that it may not be suggested that, if another British subject is elected and one of our men is elected, that would be a case of the election of two men who are nationals of the same member of the League. I may say that the convention as originally drafted might have been open to that suggestion, but at the instance of the representatives of Canada, among others, the wording was modified so as to make it quite clear that this question of one giving way to the other would not arise when there were elected not merely two nationals of the British Empire, but two nationals of the same member of the League. That is another instance in which we have the creation of a right in favour of the Canadian national. The recognition that each member of the League has nationals of its own being once made so clear, it seems to me only a natural thing, even if there were no other reason for it, that this country should take the responsibility of defining who its nationals are, and that is what this Bill proposes to do. As I said at the outset, there is no question of modifying in any way the position and status of us all as British subjects. The purpose of the Bill is only to define a particular class of British subjects—a class who have the peculiar quality of being that kind of British subjects who are nationals of Canada. As to the details, I assume we would deal with them better in committee. But speaking in a general way, if hon. gentlemen will look at the Bill they will see that the provisions defining "Canadian national," in the first place make such a Canadian national every British subject who comes within the definition of a Canadian citizen under the Immigration Act. In addition, a provision is made with regard to certain classes of persons which follows the principles upon which the question of the quality of British subject is determined by the British Nationality Act, which we also have enacted. The definition of "Canadian citizen" in the Immigration Act limits the quality, so far as that quality results from birth, to the person born in Canada. In addition to the person born in Canada this Bill proposes to enact that the son of a Canadian national born while his father is a Canadian national, even though he be born outside of Canada, shall be a Canadian national. All hon. gentlemen will agree that if any one of us found himself in the unfortunate position of being absent from Canada temporarily with his family at a time when a child was born to him, he would want that child to be as full-fledged a Canadian as he is himself.

There is also a provision that the wife of a Canadian national shall be a Canadian national. With regard to persons such as the child in question, whose quality of Canadian national results from the fact of his paternity, though he was born elsewhere, there is a provision analogous to that which is found in the British Nationality Act, conferring upon such a child, if he should be entitled to nationality in any other British dominion, the privilege of renouncing his Canadian nationality. There is no need of providing for what will happen if he is entitled to become and desires to become the subject of some other country, because that is already covered in the British Nationality and Naturalization Act. Of course, if a man ceases to be a British subject he necessarily ceases to be a Canadian national.

MR. EULER: In the case of men who were naturalized while they were minors, because of the fact that their fathers were naturalized, but who under the present Franchise Act have no vote unless they obtain a voting certificate—are they considered Canadian nationals under this Bill, even if they have not that certificate?

MR. DOHERTY: Anybody who is a British subject and who was born in this country or who has domicile in this country as described in the Immigration Act, is a Canadian national. This proposed legislation, of course, has nothing to do with the franchise. I do not know what action may be taken in the future; the franchise may or may not be granted to all Canadian nationals, that depends upon the legislation of this Parliament on the question of the franchise. The Bill does not deal with any particular rights that are to belong to Canadian nationals; it is concerned simply with the making of a definition. The question as to what rights should belong to them or whether there should be differences between different classes, either as to the franchise or as to any other matter, is a thing that would have to be dealt with in separate legislation.

There is also provision for the case where a child is by reason of his birth a Canadian national, but by reason of his parentage or for some other reason, may at the time of his birth or later become entitled to recognition as a national of some other part of the Empire; the same privilege is given to him to make the declaration whereby he would cease to be a Canadian national. Both these classes follow absolutely the principle laid down with regard to the quality of British subject in the Act dealing with British nationality.

MR. EULER: I would like to ask the minister another question.

MR. DOHERTY: Might I suggest that questions will come more regularly and could be better dealt with when we go into committee on the Bill? Of course, I am precluded now from saying anything more on this reading save by way of reply to close the debate.

HON. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): Mr. Speaker, I regret that, from my point of view, with which all may not agree, this is another step in the wrong direction. When a false step is taken, it leads to another false step, and the first one having been taken, the second, perhaps, becomes unavoidable, and that is possibly the situation to-day. The word "National," as a noun, would be properly and fairly interpreted in the language of international affairs as a citizen of a sovereign State. Hitherto, we have all been glad to be British nationals. Canada is not a sovereign State; I do not want it to become a sovereign State, and I claim the expression "Canadian national" is rather difficult to be understood. This is, however, a step in the wrong direction; I do not expect to correct it, and I am satisfied simply to express my opinion.

HON. JACQUES BUREAU (Three Rivers and St. Maurice): Mr. Speaker, if I understand aright the explanation of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), this legislation has become necessary in order to define membership in the League of Nations. The word "ressortissant," which has been translated by "national," must mean that a man, although not, as the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) has stated, a member of an independent nation or of a sovereign State, has a voice in the League of Nations and must be more particularly identified. That is the reason why the expression "Canadian national" is used to translate the word "ressortissant," to show that the man belongs to one of the Dominions, that is, Canada. This Act on the statute books comes, comme un cheveu sur la soupe, an Act to define Canadian nationals. Might I suggest that, in order to facilitate the understanding of this legislation in the future, we put a preamble to it, stating in as few words as possible the explanation which has just been given by the Minister of Justice? I might suggest these words: That whereas it has become necessary, for the purpose of the better working of the League of Nations where Canada has a voice as a separate entity to define the status of the members who appear in the League of Nations as representing Canada, this legislation should be enacted defining these representatives as Canadian nationals—comme ressortissant de la nation canadienne, comme bon semblera. In that way, it will be seen in years to come why this legislation was enacted. In a few years the world will, perhaps, become normal again, and the next generation or the generation succeeding that will possibly be at a loss to know how this legislation came on the statute book unless some explanation is given by the preamble.

MR. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Verchères): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, in the French version of the Bill, these words "Nationaux Canadiens" are incorrectly given as a translation for the English "Canadian Nationals." The definition given of these people in paragraph "B" is as follows:

(b) British subjects who ordinarily reside in Canada although not domiciled there.

I should like to know from the right hon. minister whether British subjects residing in India, in South Africa, and even in China may be termed "Canadian Nationals."

MR. DOHERTY: If the hon. member will allow me, I am afraid he is reading from the Bill as it was originally introduced.

MR. ARCHAMBAULT: Yes.

MR. DOHERTY: I explained the matter and I am responsible for the confusion. I am surprised we have not the Bill before us as reprinted, because I gave most special instructions and it was reported to me early this forenoon—

MR. ARCHAMBAULT: (Translation.) I am surprised myself but can we continue the discussion if we have not the Bill before us?

RIGHT HON. MR. DOHERTY: (Translation.) I said, at the outset of my remarks, that in case some hon. members would deem it advisable, I would not insist on proceeding with the Bill, but how could I possibly make such a suggestion?

MR. SPEAKER: Order.

MR. DOHERTY: I am out of order, I am afraid, but I only want to make the suggestion that questions of this kind seem to be questions that should properly be dealt with in committee. The difficulty is that I am being asked questions and I am not entitled to answer. If, when we go into committee on the Bill, any hon. gentleman feels that he is under a disadvantage by reason of this unfortunate accident, I certainly shall not insist on pressing the Bill through.

MR. ARCHAMBAULT: I submit we should not discuss a Bill that we do not have before us.

MR. DOHERTY: All right.

HONOURABLE W. L. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my purpose in rising now is not to take exception to the principle of the Bill, but rather to draw the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) to the form in which the Government is introducing its legislation. This is the second important Bill to which, after its introduction the Government has presented an amendment much more substantial in its nature than the provisions of the Bill itself, with the result that we on this side of the House are expected to discuss a measure, the provisions of which we have not seen and with which we are not familiar. It is quite true the Minister of Justice last night presented me with a copy of the amendment he purposes moving to the Bill, but the amendment is a more substantial measure than the Bill itself. While I have been favoured with a number of copies, there has been no opportunity for members on this side to consider the matter, and, what I think is equally important, there has been no opportunity for the country to become familiar with the measure which my right hon. friend has introduced. We should have some idea of the measures that are to be discussed in this chamber, and some opportunity should be given for public opinion to express itself before measures are finally passed through this House. My right hon. friend would be taking a course that would be in the public interest if he would have his Bill presented in the form in which he hopes it to pass this House. The Government might consider that suggestion as applicable equally to all future legislation.

MR. DOHERTY: If I may be permitted, I thought I had said, we shall say, at least half a dozen times, that I did not expect hon. members to discuss the Bill unless they felt ready to do so. I made the most frank, candid and open confession that there had happened this error; that I acknowledged my responsibility and asked nobody to suffer in the slightest degree, and in the face of that complaint is made that hon. members are expected to do this, that and the other thing, whereas hon. members had been assured that they were not expected to do anything of the kind.

MR. MACKENZIE KING: It is the practice to which we are objecting.

MR. DOHERTY: Let us get the whole mystery and see what the awful crime of this Government was. The imputation is that this matter was not given consideration. The trouble came, perhaps, because it got too careful consideration. Two drafts were made of this Bill, and the unpardonable offence that occurred was that, when I was handed the draft for introduction, I was handed the first draft instead of the second. My offence goes to that extent and no further. I have acknowledged that members should have this Bill before them and that they should not be expected to discuss the matter without it. As to presentation, if the hon. gentleman thinks something is to be gained by that, I have no particular objection to take this Bill back and re-introduce it. But, as a matter of fact, the Bill as proposed to be amended is printed in full, and if it is not actually in the hands of members, the responsibility is on whoever has charge of the distribution of those papers. Let me make this suggestion: Let the Bill go into committee, as I said a few moments ago, and if then it is not thought there has been opportunity for its consideration, I shall certainly not press that it be proceeded with.

MR. BUREAU: May I ask a question?

MR. SPEAKER: We must come to some semblance of order in this debate. We are debating the principle of the Bill on its second reading, where hon. members are restricted by the rules to only one speech. Now we have had two or three speeches, and all sorts of questions. I submit that the debate ought to be adjourned, or else brought to a conclusion, one or the other. If it goes on, we must adhere to the rules.

MR. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet intervened in this debate, and therefore I am in order in speaking now. I think we should not be called upon to discuss even the principle of this Bill, without having had it before us. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), with his usual courtesy, has said that he is prepared to do everything to meet our reasonable requirements, which is only what we would expect of him. We accept the evidence of this spirit of justice, and I would now move that the debate be adjourned and that we proceed to some other business. If I want to speak again, I shall have another opportunity.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Thursday, 10th March, 1921.

CANADIAN NATIONALS DEFINITION ACT.

RESUMING the adjourned debate on the motion of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) for the second reading of Bill No. 17, to define Canadian nationals, adjourned from 8th March.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I understand that this debate was adjourned by the hon. member for Bromé (Mr. McMaster).

MR. MCMASTER: I merely adjourned the debate, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of getting over an impasse, and not with any intention of contributing to it until I had listened with the same attention as I always do to the extensive remarks—

MR. BUREAU: The more extensive remarks.

MR. MCMASTER: —to the more extensive remarks of the right hon. Minister of Justice.

Bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

THE CHAIRMAN: I beg to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that this Bill is a reprint of the original Bill as proposed to be amended in Committee of the whole House. Mr. Doherty moves to amend clause one by striking out all the words after the word "persons" in the first line and substituting the following words:

—shall be deemed to be Canadian nationals, viz.:—

(a) Any British subject who is a Canadian citizen within the meaning of the Immigration Act, Chapter 27 of the Statutes of 1910, as heretofore amended.

(b) The wife of any such citizen.

(c) Any person born out of Canada whose father was a Canadian national at the time of that person's birth.

Shall the amendment carry?

MR. BUREAU: May I call the attention of the committee to the French version of the Bill? If I understood the explanation of the Minister of Justice, this "Canadian national" was originally baptized in French at the League of Nations, and then was translated into English. I see that the English version was first used before this House and then translated into French, and that translation does not correspond with the original term which was born at the League of Nations. Of course, this is a matter that cannot very well be left to the translators, as, if so, it generally brings confusion later on. In order that the English version which I have in my hand should correspond with the French version, I would first ask the Minister of Justice if he would not consider it advisable that section one instead of reading "The following persons shall be deemed to be," should read, "The following persons shall be Canadian nationals"? For, after all, we make them Canadian nationals, and we do not want to have anything equivocal about their status. Therefore in the latter form it would correspond with the French version, "Sont réputées ressortissantes du Canada les personnes suivantes, savoir."

MR. DOHERTY: I would have no objection to accepting the modification. I may explain that instead of declaring that certain persons are British subjects, or that certain persons are Canadian nationals—which, I am prepared to admit, seems to be the more natural and more direct expression—it seems for a very long time past to have been the practice to say that certain persons "shall be deemed to be," etc. In the draft as it was originally before the House the words "the following persons are Canadian nationals" were used. I see no objection to accepting the definition, if the hon. gentleman thinks it is important. I believe the meaning is absolutely the same. But if we are going to modify it, I would rather say "the following persons are Canadian nationals," than "the following persons shall be Canadian nationals."

MR. BUREAU: That is better.

MR. DOHERTY: I beg therefore to move that section one, as now before the committee, be amended by substituting the word "are" for the words "shall be deemed to be."

THE CHAIRMAN: Mr. Doherty moves to amend section one, as proposed to be amended, by striking out the words "shall be deemed to be" and replacing them by the word "are." Shall the sub-amendment carry?

MR. DOHERTY: I think we might just as well deal with the French version at the same time.

MR. BUREAU: Yes.

MR. DOHERTY: I beg to move to amend subsection one in the French version by substituting the words "sont ressortissantes" for the words "sont réputées ressortissantes."

M. LE PRÉSIDENT: M. Doherty propose que la première clause du Bill 17, version française, soit amendée en remplaçant les mots "sont réputées ressortissantes" par les mots "sont ressortissantes."

MR. DOHERTY: I beg to further amend that same section by striking out the words "les personnes suivantes, savoir," so the section would read: "Sont ressortissantes du Canada."

MR. FIELDING: Is there such a thing now as a Canadian national? Is it right to say, "the following persons are Canadian nationals," or do we not by this Bill make them so? It is a very fine distinction; I merely call the hon. gentleman's attention to it.

MR. DOHERTY: I think that both things are true. There does exist to-day such a thing as a Canadian national; if there does not, then all those who are proud of the fact that they are Canadians have been attaching to themselves a designation that means nothing. It is equally true that this Act, speaking the day it is passed, declares the fact to exist that certain persons are Canadian nationals. The moment this Bill is passed—whether by virtue of this law or by virtue of any anterior thing is immaterial—these people are Canadian nationals.

MR. MCMASTER: The present tense is used in the expectation that the Bill will pass. If the Bill does not pass, then anything provided in it is of no avail. I take it, therefore, looking at the matter from the purely legal aspect, that it is correct to use the present tense.

MR. DOHERTY: I think the hon. gentleman is quite right. The Bill speaks the moment it is passed; until that moment it says nothing.

MR. MORPHY: If there is no such thing as a Canadian national, how can it be said, as set forth in subsection (c) of section 1, that any person born out of Canada "whose father was a Canadian national at the time of that person's birth," shall be a Canadian national?

MR. DOHERTY: I think that the verb "was" as used there has in mind the fact that we are speaking of a person who will be born in the future. The reference is to any person whose father "was" a Canadian national when that person was born.

MR. MORPHY: But there is no such thing as a Canadian national.

MR. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman does not suppose there are going to be no children born in the future; that our Canadian nationals are all going to be barren?

MR. MCMASTER: Some of them are barons.

MR. DOHERTY: But not barren. I am really puzzled to know how to make it any clearer. Perhaps my hon. friend will suggest a method.

MR. CANNON: Prior to the introduction of this Bill was there any correspondence on the subject between the Canadian Government and the British Government?

MR. DOHERTY: No.

MR. CANNON: I understand that this Bill is a very important one in that it gives to Canadian citizens what might be called a separate status from that of a British subject. Has the Government in any way, shape or form conferred with the British authorities, formally or informally, with regard to this measure?

MR. DOHERTY: No. The hon. gentleman is under a misapprehension if he thinks that this Bill modifies to the extent of one iota the status of any of us as British subjects. It did not seem to the Government necessary to ask the permission of the British Government—which, I am sure, would not have had the slightest objection—how we ought to define a Canadian, still leaving that Canadian as a British subject just where he was before. I do not see how the hon. gentleman could regard that as necessary.

MR. MACLEAN (South York): Will this Bill involve any change in the classification of the census returns?

MR. DOHERTY: I do not know that there has been in the past any heading in the census returns specifying people as being or not being Canadian nationals.

MR. MACLEAN (South York): But do we specify Canadians now?

MR. DOHERTY: I have not the census returns before me, but I am under the impression that people are classified according to the origin of their ancestors. I am not quite certain whether there is a column which classifies people as Canadians.

MR. MACLEAN (South York): Then it is high time we had some definition of that kind. In our documents we do not recognize a man as a Canadian; he is distributed here and there and all over.

MR. CORP: That is for election purposes.

MR. MACLEAN (South York): Perhaps so; I have nothing to say on that. But our statutes, our documents and our official returns seem to go out of the way to avoid defining a Canadian. I had thought that this was the beginning of legislation in that direction.

MR. DOHERTY: I hope it is.

MR. MACLEAN (South York): I hope we shall soon have legislation of that kind so that it will be established here, in our documents and otherwise, as well as among all other nations, that there is such a thing as a Canadian. I do not ask for any amendment just now in that direction, but I hope that the Minister of Justice and the Government generally will do what they can to see that a Canadian is at least recognized on his own statute book; for he has not been so recognized in the past. When I say that I speak for the people of all the provinces. A recognition in our statutes, public documents, etc., of what a Canadian is, would be a further step towards the unification of the people of this country.

MR. LAPOINTE: I endorse the view of my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean). It is because I think it is a step in that direction that I heartily support the Bill. I was sorry I was not here when the second reading was moved.

MR. MORPHY: The Minister spoke about trying to make clear subsection (c) of section 1, which provides that any person born out of Canada "whose father was a Canadian national at the time of that person's birth" shall be deemed to be a Canadian national. That language imports the idea that there was such a thing as a Canadian national prior to the passing of this Bill. I take it from the minister that there is no such thing until this Bill is passed, so that a boy or girl born ten years ago or five days ago could not say that his or her father was a Canadian national at the time of that child's birth, because there was no such thing then. If this is intended to apply after the Bill is passed and assented to, I see two things. The provision that "Any person born out of Canada whose father is a Canadian national at the time of that person's birth," will apply to the future; it does not cover the past. Therefore, the clause is worthy of a little consideration, when we are taking what I conceive to be a rather important step in defining Canadian nationality. I quite agree with the remarks of the hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) and the hon. member for East Quebec (Mr. Lapointe), in their desire, which I apprehend is the desire of the whole House, so to define Canadian nationality that it will appear in everything Canadian from this time forward.

MR. MACLEAN (South York): I am not a lawyer, but I say that the original draft of the Bill was more to the point and to the argument we are now making, that is, if the words "shall be deemed to be" are in the Bill. I have seen in the Statutes, especially in past practice, a good many clauses where that term is constantly used. If we are creating a new thing and making a new departure here to-day, beginning to establish and recognize at this late hour a Canadian national, the most emphatic way of asserting it is to put in those very words: "shall be deemed to be." I will not press that for the moment on the Minister of Justice; but I think, when he consults his law officers and the practice heretofore in our statute books, he will find that the term "shall be deemed to be" as it was first read in this chamber this evening, is not only more explicit, but announces the beginning of a new condition of affairs, and we are now beginning to define what a Canadian national is. It will be another landmark in the creation of Canadian nationality.

MR. FIELDING: I do not think the Minister of Justice has quite caught the point raised by the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy). Let me state a case. Twenty years ago a British subject residing in Ontario moved his family across to the United States, and a year later a son was born to them. That son to-day is nineteen years of age. Does he become a Canadian national under this Bill?

MR. DOHERTY: Yes.

MR. FIELDING: The minister thinks he does.

MR. DOHERTY: I am quite sure.

MR. FIELDING: The clause reads:

Any person born out of Canada whose father was a Canadian national at the time of that person's birth.

That person was born nineteen years ago. The hon. member for North Perth says—and I agree with him there—that there was then no such thing as a Canadian national, and, therefore, that does not bring the son nineteen years of age to-day and residing in Buffalo, within this Bill.

MR. MACLEAN (South York): Does my hon. friend contend that the original drafting would convey the intention he wishes to see conveyed?

MR. FIELDING: I rather thought the expression "shall be deemed to be" was a better one, but that was objected to, and apparently with good reasons. My objection goes to the root of the whole business. I think it is nonsense.

MR. DOHERTY: I rose hoping to be in agreement with my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding), but unfortunately his last statement makes that impossible. I am disposed to think, as suggested by the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy), that the definition as it is in the Bill, is not wide enough to cover a person born before the passing of this measure, but I think we can find a form of words that will produce that result by letting the present clause stand as it is, but by adding to it in this way.

(c) Any person born out of Canada whose father was a Canadian national at the time of that person's birth, or with regard to a person born before the passing of this Act whose father at the time of such person's birth possessed all the qualifications of a Canadian national as defined in this Act.

I think that will make the matter clear.

MR. EULER: I am not a lawyer like most of the gentlemen who have spoken on the Bill, and I realize that perhaps I am rather bold in attempting to point out what seems to me to be a lack of consistency between subsection (a) of section 1 on the one hand and subsections (b) and (c). Subsection (a) reads:

The following persons shall be deemed to be Canadian nationals, viz.:—

(a) any British subject who is a Canadian citizen within the meaning of the Immigration Act, chapter 27 of the Statutes of 1910, as heretofore amended.

In looking up the Immigration Act, chapter 27, section 2, I find the last paragraph of subsection (f) reads:

Provided that for the purpose of this Act a woman who has not been landed in Canada shall not be held to have acquired Canadian citizenship by virtue of her husband being a Canadian citizen; neither shall a child, who has not been landed in Canada be held to have acquired Canadian citizenship through its father or mother being a Canadian citizen.

That seems to exclude certain women and certain men, and yet subsection (b) of the Bill states specifically that the wife of any such citizen shall be deemed to be a Canadian national, and subsection (c) reads:

Any person born out of Canada whose father was a Canadian national at the time of that person's birth.

There is an inconsistency there. If we interpret according to subsection (a) and the Immigration Act, certain women and certain men would not be included, and yet subsection (b) makes no exception whatever; it says simply "the wife of any such citizen." I do not know whether the point is well taken or not.

MR. DOHERTY: We are here defining Canadian nationals. The Immigration Act was defining a Canadian citizen. The first subsection in this Bill makes everybody who is a Canadian citizen a Canadian national, and the two other subsections deal with people who are not necessarily Canadian citizens. With regard to the wife, it seemed to us proper that the wife of a Canadian national should be a Canadian national. In the Immigration Act there is a special and particular reason for not recognizing necessarily as a Canadian citizen the wife of a person who is a Canadian citizen, and the purpose of making a distinction there was to prevent a woman who never had been in Canada, and who perhaps might be subject to some objection from the immigration point of view, from coming into Canada merely because her husband had succeeded in meeting all the requirements and had become a Canadian citizen. The Immigration Act is dealing with immigration, and the term "Canadian citizen" has in that Act a meaning only with regard to immigration. We have, however, taken everybody who is a Canadian citizen under that Act and recognized him or her as a Canadian national, because that Act put upon the definition of a Canadian citizen every restriction that was thought necessary with regard to people coming into this country. If in the Immigration Act the wife of a Canadian citizen as such, without any other condition, had become a Canadian citizen we need not have said anything about her in this Act; but we are doing so because we do not see the necessity of maintaining with regard to a Canadian national the same distinction which from the immigration point of view it was thought desirable to make in the case of a person who never was in Canada.

With regard to the Canadian citizen suppose a man came into this country and acquired Canadian citizenship under the Immigration Act and then went out and married the most notorious prostitute, a woman of the worst of habits. It would not be thought desirable, would it, that because she had married that Canadian citizen, she should be entitled to come right into our country? She will not be entitled to come right into our country and therefore in this Act it does not seem necessary to make the same distinction with regard to a Canadian national. Though under this Act she may be entitled to call herself a Canadian national, under the Immigration Act she would not be entitled to come into Canada.

MR. MURPHY: In view of the point raised by my hon. friend from North Waterloo, and the explanation given by the Minister of Justice, may I suggest to him that a good deal of confusion with regard to the interpretation of this section might be avoided if no part of that interpretation was dependent upon the language of some other statute? If, instead of this reference in subsection (a) to another Act, a definition were given in the subsection without reference to any other Act, there would be less danger of confusion, because the other Act upon which the interpretation of this subsection depends may be amended from time to time, and consequently the definition in this Act will be affected by such amendment.

MR. DOHERTY: The hon. member will notice that in referring to the definition we refer to "a Canadian citizen within the meaning of The Immigration Act, chapter twenty-seven of the statutes of 1910, as heretofore amended." We say, "as heretofore amended." We are fixing it now. It is not going to follow that because somebody amends the Immigration Act in the future, that that amendment will affect this Act.

With regard to the other part of it, what seemed to us was this: We get a definition in the Immigration Act as it stands that is satisfactory. What would be gained by copying that definition into this statute? I think that there is some value in collecting your legislation, but all that we were concerned with in this Act, once we had come to the conclusion that the definition of a Canadian citizen in the Immigration Act was satisfactory as far as it went, was to provide for people, if there were any, who we thought ought to be Canadian nationals, though they did not come within the definition of a Canadian citizen as contained in the Immigration Act, and those two classes are the people dealt with in (b) and (c). The Immigration Act, peculiarly enough, does not say anywhere that the wife of a Canadian citizen, even after she has come into Canada, and is accepted, is by the fact of her being the wife of a Canadian citizen, a Canadian citizen herself, but it does enact as though it thought that if she were landed in Canada the mere fact that her husband was a Canadian citizen would make her one. It does enact negating her right to be a Canadian citizen merely because her husband is one, unless she has been landed in Canada. That, I think, is a very wise provision from the point of view of immigration. It protects us from the coming in of improper people merely because they happen to be the wives of perfectly proper people perhaps. It did not seem to us in dealing with the definition of a Canadian national generally, where there was no question of the country being practically affected, that it was necessary to get down to as fine a definition as that. We thought we might safely follow what is a general rule in all legislation I have seen with regard to nationality, namely, that the wife of the man has the nationality he has.

MR. EULER: I quite understand that it is possible for a person to be a Canadian national, and yet not be a Canadian citizen, but it seemed to me there was some conflict in the various subsections.

MR. DOHERTY: There is an intentional difference.

MR. EULER: Is it fair to assume, then, that subsections (b) and (c) are inserted in order to override the disqualification that would otherwise exist by virtue of subsection (a) of the Immigration Act?

MR. DOHERTY: No. The Immigration Act stands absolutely untouched, and as regards immigration will continue absolutely to govern. Our reference to it is only for the purpose of bringing in as Canadian nationals everybody who is a Canadian citizen under the Immigration Act. It does not make anybody a Canadian citizen who under the Immigration Act is not a Canadian citizen. It does not remove any disability, as, for instance, in the case of the wife, the disability resulting from the fact that she has not been landed in Canada. The Immigration Act stands as the law, absolutely untouched. All that this Act is doing is defining what is a Canadian national.

MR. VIEN: Will the right hon. gentleman read the definition in the Immigration Act?

MR. McMASTER: Before the minister does so, I should like to say just a word. Would it not be well for the minister to follow the suggestion of the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy)? We are going to be asked in this statute to make reference to another statute that may be changed from year to year. The minister has pointed out that this statute will not change from year to year, and he is quite right, but in order to find out what this statute says, we will have to turn in years to come, not to the Immigration Act that we are familiar with at that future date, but to the Immigration Act as it exists to-day. We will have to trace the changes in the Immigration Act up to this day, and then stop there. I wish the minister to realize that most of the questions that have come from this side of the House are in the tone of helpful and instructive criticism; I think I am speaking for a great number on this side of the House when I say that we are glad to see anything that points to a definite acceptance of our status of nationality; of course, in this vale of tears I never expect to reach the condition where everybody will agree with what I say, but I put it to the minister, as this Act may be consulted frequently from time to time, would it not be better to have that other Act put in full in this clause, in order that it may be a sort of handbook for us in the future?

MR. DOHERTY: I will answer first the question of my hon. friend from Lotbinière. Subsection (f) of section 2 of the Immigration Act says:

(2) A British subject who has Canadian domicile; or,

(3) A person naturalized under the laws of Canada who has not subsequently become an alien or lost Canadian domicile:

Provided that for the purpose of this Act a woman who has not been landed in Canada shall not be held to have acquired Canadian citizenship by virtue of her husband being a Canadian citizen; neither shall a child who has not been landed in Canada be held to have acquired Canadian citizenship through its father or mother being a Canadian citizen.

That is the definition broadly. But there are definitions of Canadian domicile which of course have to be read into that definition, because we have to deal with a British subject who has Canadian domicile. Now, I did not repeat that definition because it would have involved in this Bill not only the reproduction of those few lines from the Immigration Act, but also the definitions in that Act, first, of domicile, and then of Canadian domicile and, I think, even of how Canadian domicile is lost, because Canadian citizenship goes with it; and under our definition Canadian nationalism would go with it if nationalism or citizenship does not depend on birth but merely on domicile. It would be possible to copy this into this Act.

MR. VIEN: What is the difference between domicile, as defined by that Act, and Canadian domicile?

MR. DOHERTY: I do not think that the definition in the Act is exactly the definition which, generally speaking, would by law define domicile. So far as I can see, the definition there was intended perhaps to avoid the difficulties with regard to intention which arise when you have at common law to determine the question of the change of domicile. I think the purpose of making this particular definition of domicile was to get rid of that question of determining that there was an intention to change domicile: As I think every lawyer knows, it is one of the most puzzling things when you are thrown on the common or everyday law for the purpose of determining change of domicile.

MR. VIEN: How would they overcome the difficulty by the definition?

MR. DOHERTY: Whether they succeeded I do not say, but domicile in the definitions means:

The place in which a person has his home, or in which he resides, or to which he returns as his place of permanent abode, and does not mean the place where he resides for some special or temporary purpose.

I may be mistaken, but I think that if you did not have that section a man might have his home in Canada, which might be the place to which he returned, but he might never have given his domicile of origin and might be still domiciled in France or England. I do not want to get into the niceties of the matter.

MR. VIEN: I fail to see how the definition as given in the Immigration Act overcomes the question of intention, which has to be proven in every case. If he has not left his domicile in England his real domicile will of course be there, because he cannot have two.

MR. DOHERTY: Under that definition, though his domicile, to all intents and purposes, may be in England he will, under our Immigration Act, have a Canadian domicile. I would rather not be led into what I am satisfied might be an interminable discussion of the intricacies of the question of how you determine at common law when a man has changed his domicile. I have had occasion to go into the question in a number of cases, and I think it was a wise provision in the statute here not to require, in order to enable a man to say that he had Canadian domicile that allowed him to come back into this country, that he should be able to establish positively, according to the ordinary law, that his domicile of origin had actually ceased to be his domicile and that his actual and real domicile was here. At all events, whatever may have been the wisdom of it, the definition is there.

MR. VIEN: You are in effect reproducing it in this Bill.

MR. DOHERTY: Yes. The view as expressed in this Bill is that if it is a good enough domicile to entitle a man to come into this country and to go back and forth freely under the Immigration Act, it is good enough to entitle him, on the one hand, to be treated as a Canadian national and, on the other hand, to subject him to the obligations of a Canadian national. It must be borne in mind that while it looms large in our eyes as a very great privilege to be a Canadian national, that privilege carries with it certain duties, and we are interested not only in seeing that those entitled to this great privilege may be able to demonstrate it, but that it is made clear just who are subject to our legislation as applicable exclusively to Canadian nationals; and that will come to have a greater importance when, as I anticipate, we have had passed the amendment removing doubts as to the extra-territoriality of our legislation. The practical question is, what is the balance of convenience—because I do not understand that we differ as to the substance of the matter—to recopy into this Act all these definitions of domicile, etc., or to content ourselves with stereotyping them now as being for all time, at least until we amend the law, the test as to who is a Canadian national? Now, it is true that a man will have to go to the Immigration Act to-day to ascertain what domicile is. But might I point out that until our present Act which we are passing is modified he will have to go back to the Canadian Nationalization Act of to-day to find what a Canadian national is? I do not really appreciate as greatly as my hon. friends do the difficulty of having to refer from one statute to another, both being contemporaneous. The Act appeared to me to be really more simple and clear by putting it into the shape in which it was, but if hon. gentlemen think it a matter of importance, I am willing to consider the suggestion that we might improve things by recopying this statute. It is very usual to legislate by reference to other existing statutes rather than to repeat the provisions referred to.

MR. VIEN: I think that the reasons given by the right hon. gentleman should prompt us to ask that the question put by my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) be further considered and answered. The right hon. gentleman has told us that he wanted to avoid two things; first, a discussion as to the definition given in the Immigration Act of the word "domicile"; secondly, the repetition of that definition because it meant three definitions—the first that of "Canadian citizen," the second "domicile," and the third "Canadian domicile." In the explanation which the minister has given I find a reason that should justify us in insisting upon a definition of the word "domicile." I have the definition as given by the minister, but I contend that if in the Immigration Act the word "domicile" may be so defined it will not preclude a person from becoming a Canadian citizen even if he has not left his domicile in England. I contend, Sir, that we should define what a Canadian national is and we should attach to the definition of "domicile" such restrictions as would permit nobody to be a Canadian national if he has kept his domicile in England or elsewhere. Suppose, for instance, that a gentleman comes from Holland. According to the definition of the word "domicile" in the Immigration Act he is not necessarily bound to prove that he has left his domicile in Holland. He could become a Canadian citizen without that, provided he complies with the wording of the Immigration Act which is, as the right hon. gentleman clearly stated and explained a minute ago, that he has a principal place of domicile where he returns to.

MR. DOHERTY: May I point out to the hon. gentleman that if his theory is right we will inevitably get into a long discussion as to what technically may be a "domicile."

MR. VIEN: It may be necessary.

MR. DOHERTY: It is almost inevitable with regard to every man who wants to be a Canadian national, is that you may have the greatest difficulty in the world in establishing his domicile. More particularly will that be difficult in the case of his children. Surely the hon. gentleman would be satisfied—

MR. VIEN: No, not after the explanation given by the hon. gentleman a minute ago.

MR. DOHERTY: Because I told the hon. gentleman in substance that theoretically a man's domicile may be somewhere else he will not be satisfied though the man has practically done all the things which satisfied the requirements of the Immigration Act. The purpose of that definition is to get rid of the difficulty of proving a thing exceedingly difficult to prove. Now, will the hon. gentleman look for a moment at the other side of this picture. It will be acknowledged that in many and many an instance there will be an interest in claiming that the man is a Canadian national. Are we going to have people coming into this country, and domiciled under all the conditions prescribed in the Immigration Act, free to say to us: "Oh, I am not a Canadian national; I am not governed by those laws that apply to Canadian nationals." I sympathize with the hon. gentleman in the high value, the immense value, that he attaches to being a Canadian citizen—we are all proud of our Canadian nationality—but while I fully join with my hon. friend in that sentiment he must remember also that in many and many a case it will be the interest of this country to establish the fact that a man who is living in Canada—and getting all the advantages and benefits that he enjoys if he complies with the definition of a domicile—should be subjected to every law that applies to a Canadian national.

MR. VIEN: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but the explanation given does not convince me at all. I think that we should not allow a person residing in Canada to claim to be a Canadian national if he has a domicile elsewhere. That the Immigration Act does not compel a person to prove his intent to abandon his domicile elsewhere before becoming a Canadian citizen is an unfortunate thing, in my opinion. I am not responsible for what was done in 1910 or for the amendments made to that Act; but if I had been a member of the House at that time I would have objected to a definition which would allow a person to become a Canadian citizen without at first giving up the domicile that he had in any other country, be it France, Belgium, England or elsewhere. It is impossible to obtain national unity in this country, it is impossible to create that Canadianism which the right hon. gentleman claims to have fostered for the last few years, without exacting from every person who wishes to become a Canadian citizen the abandonment of any domicile he may have in any other country.

MR. DOHERTY: Does the hon. gentleman know that in order to become a British subject and to be naturalized under the laws of this country there is absolutely no requirement to abandon domicile? All that is required to become a British subject is that you should reside in this country for five years. The question of domicile is not raised at all; there is no requirement of any kind of domicile. We have gone further in our definition of Canadian citizenship than is necessary to be naturalized as a British subject. The hon. gentleman would create for our Canadian nationalism, and the acquisition of it, conditions that no other country has dreamed of requiring. What I want to point out to the hon. gentleman again is that the cases involved will be few and far between—very, very few—where the man who has complied with the requirements of our Immigration Act has not really got his domicile in Canada. But the purpose of that definition is to avoid the necessity, once you get all these outstanding facts—which in nine hundred and ninety-nine out of a thousand cases will mean that the man actually has his domicile here—establishing under the common law the change of intention as regards domicile. When I say "one in a thousand" it would probably be only in one case in ten thousand that the domicile of a man who had complied with all the requirements would not be in Canada. The purpose is to get rid of the difficulty of proving what is in a man's mind as to the seat of his principal establishment and to get rid of the rule under common law that a man always through his life has his domicile of origin unless you prove affirmatively not merely that he came away from there and lived elsewhere, but that he had the intention of changing his domicile.

MR. VIEN: Does not the right hon. gentleman believe that it is a good thing?

MR. DOHERTY: I have difficulty in thinking of anything that could be worse. There is nothing sacred about the common law domicile. If we get people to come here and make Canada their place of abode, whether they are British subjects to begin with or become naturalized as such, I cannot conceive that it would be a misfortune that they should be Canadian nationals during all that time because perhaps they have in the back of their heads the idea that some time they will go back to be buried, we will say, in the country they came from. At common law that is what you have got to negative. You have got to prove in some way what the man's intention was in addition to everything he did. Of course, what he did is valuable evidence of what he intended. If the hon. gentleman's suggestion were carried out, so far as it would modify this law it would make it unworkable and would not prevent any misunderstanding.

MR. VIEN: We are trying to define Canadian nationals—ressortissants du Canada. I would object to any definition which would cover persons who do not live in Canada with the intention of making this country their home permanently—

MR. DOHERTY: You require him to make it his home.

MR. VIEN: There is no similarity between the case of a British subject and the case of a Canadian national. A British subject may be such whether he lived in Australia, in India, or in South Africa.

MR. DOHERTY: Or whether he lived in France.

MR. VIEN: It does not matter at all.

MR. DOHERTY: Exactly. Why should it matter here?

MR. VIEN: That is why I say there is no similarity between the principle of becoming a British subject, as mentioned by the right hon. gentleman, and what we purpose to do by this law; that is to say, to create Canadian nationals. I would not like to say that all British subjects will become Canadian nationals, because the minister must bear in mind that it gives some advantage for those persons who are about to be defined by the Act to be able to claim they are Canadian nationals, it also implies a responsibility. Therefore, I would not like the Act to define as Canadian nationals persons who do not intend to make Canada their principal place of permanent abode. In the second place, Sir, I beg strongly to support the motion of my hon. friend from Brome. No matter what the definition may be, it will be much clearer and much handier for reference purposes that these three definitions be given here. For that reason I would ask that the expressions "Canadian citizen," "domicile," and "Canadian domicile" be repeated in this Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

MR. CAHILL: Is a British subject under all conditions permitted to come into Canada under the Immigration Act; and, if so, what is a British subject under the Act?

MR. DOHERTY: There are certain classes of British subjects who may be excluded from Canada. That is precisely the advantage of being a Canadian citizen. All British subjects are not entitled de pleno simply because they are British subjects to come into Canada: they are likely to be excluded if they come under any of the excluding sections of the Canadian Act. When the hon. gentleman asks me what is a British subject, I would inform him that he would find enumerated in the British National Act the kinds of people who are British subjects. For instance, everybody born within the realm is a British subject; everybody born outside the realm but of a father who is a British subject is a British subject; and everybody naturalized under the laws of the United Kingdom or under the laws of Canada becomes by such naturalization a British subject. A British subject is a man who owes allegiance to, and who is entitled to protection as a subject of the British Crown. Our Canadian national will be that kind of British subject who is in a special manner subject to and owes obedience to Canadian laws as administered through Parliament and the Government and ultimately His Majesty, he being King of these Dominions just as he is King of Great Britain and the entire Empire.

As regards the suggestion that I should insert this definition in the Bill, I cannot attach to it the importance that the hon. gentleman does. However, I would be willing to consider referring to this definition as fully developed in the schedule and printed in those sections in the schedule. I am sorry that I cannot follow the reasoning of the hon. gentleman with regard to the question of domicile, although I recognize the strength of his conviction on the subject. As to the mere form, I do think it would make a very awkward Act if you deemed it necessary to take definitions out of another Act to which you refer and re-copy them into an Act intended only to give a definition, and I confess I do not see the advantage of it. It would be almost as reasonable to say that when you amend an article of the Civil Code of Quebec you must begin by going back and reproducing the code; that every time there is any connection between any two laws you must reproduce both of them in the same statute. I confess that I cannot see the importance of taking such a course. We have at all times to refer from one statute to another and, as I pointed out a little while ago, supposing it is twenty-five years hence, this Act will have been amended by that time or it will not have been. If it has not been, you will have to go right back to this date to find the definition. But if you did, what would the hardship be?

MR. VIEN: The hardship would be this: you will have to cover a period of ten years to find out what amendments have been made.

MR. DOHERTY: Well, is it such an appalling thing to have to look at statutes going back a period of ten years? Surely in my hon. friend's own experience the cases are few in which he does not have to look at more than one statute. The Immigration Act as it stands to-day is printed in one book, and it would be very easy to look up.

MR. CANNON: At the opening of the discussion the right hon. gentleman explained that this Bill is a consequence of our being a separate and distinct member of the League of Nations. The British Empire is also a member of the League of Nations; will the British Empire have British Empire nationals, while at the same time, Australia, Canada, India, and South Africa have nationals of their own? If so, what will be the legal difference between a British Empire national and a Canadian national?

MR. DOHERTY: The description of the British Empire as a distinct member of the League has always been interpreted as meaning the United Kingdom with the Crown colonies and dependencies.

MR. CANNON: Excluding the Dominions?

MR. DOHERTY: Yes. I may say that there has been serious criticism of the adoption of that form. It was urged at the time that the United Kingdom with the Crown colonies and dependencies should have been one member, and we should have been the others, all together going to make up the British Empire. We were not able to get it put that way, in words.

MR. VIEN: Why?

MR. DOHERTY: Really I cannot tell you why; no reason was given that I could possibly grasp. I do not know how far it is proper that I should publicly discuss things that took place in discussion in a small committee; perhaps it is not proper that I should go into the details. But while we could not get our view recognized in words, we have it recognized in practice. The British Empire is spoken of as one member of the League, but in the practical operation it is the United Kingdom that is that particular member, and we of the Dominions had our membership and our representation and our say on a footing of equality with the gentlemen who represented the United Kingdom. I think that when the proper opportunity comes we should urge that that misnomer be corrected, and when we do so we shall probably be able to make the reasonableness of our contention apparent. Perhaps it will be permissible for me to say that in officialdom, which counts for a great deal on the other side, you find an aversion to calling things by their right names. They have a love for hanging on to an old name, even when the thing itself has ceased to exist. Possibly after a thing has been gone for years, even for centuries, the name will still be there.

MR. VIEN: Has it not occurred in Canada also?

MR. DOHERTY: Yes.

MR. VIEN: Particularly in the naming of political parties.

MR. DOHERTY: Yes. I have always been struck with the extent to which the name "Liberal" is a misnomer, as applied to so many hon. gentlemen who sit opposite. Certainly my hon. friend has hit upon an apt illustration.

MR. VIEN: And the word "Tory."

MR. DOHERTY: And how utterly inapplicable the word "Tory" is to some people over here.

MR. MARCEL (Bonaventure): When I was in Paris about ten years ago I sought to have myself registered as a Canadian in one of the Departments of the French Government. That designation was refused, and I was inscribed simply as a British subject. That, of course, was quite satisfactory to me, but I would like to know whether as a result of this legislation a man may in future claim to be inscribed on any public document as a Canadian?

MR. DOHERTY: I certainly think he would be entitled to; indeed, I thought he was in the past. On any occasion when I have been travelling and have been asked what my nationality was, I have said: "Canadian"—and it went right down. At the League of Nations we from Canada were never known as anything else—and we were not anything else—than the Canadian representatives, and we sat at the table in the position officially designated "Canadian Delegation." As I had occasion to say the other day, time develops many things. Perhaps it is some years since my hon. friend was in Paris.

MR. MARCIL (Bonaventure): I was there in 1910.

MR. DOHERTY: Well, that is ten years ago—and we are getting along.

MR. VIEN: Is it the purpose of the Bill to establish clearly who is a Canadian national as distinguished from nationals of France or of other countries?

MR. DOHERTY: Of course, we can only make laws that are laws in Canada. When the country defines what its nationals or its subjects or its citizens are, it does not make a law that binds an outside country. But it puts before the world its contention; in the first place, it makes them such in its own country, where its law has force, and then it puts before the world who it is that it claims as its subjects. It can do nothing more.

MR. VIEN: And a subject may be claimed by two countries?

MR. DOHERTY: Certainly, just to-day we have innumerable cases of dual nationality. In the recent war there were many instances of young men who had been born in Canada of French fathers. Those young men were Canadians, British subjects, undoubtedly, but in France they were French citizens, and we saw many of them go back to join the colours in France, recognizing their position as French citizens. It is one of the things that is inseparable from nationality that, as each country makes its own laws, you always have the possibility of dual nationalities; I do not think you can get rid of them until you have some system of treaties or conventions.

MR. CANNON: What will be the exact new privileges or rights conferred on Canadian nationals, in accordance with this law?

MR. DOHERTY: This law confers no rights whatever upon Canadian nationals. It defines what a Canadian national is.

MR. CANNON: What is the object of the law?

MR. DOHERTY: If there never had been a League of Nations, and if, therefore, we never had any rights to exercise there, I would have thought the Canadian Parliament, in view, amongst other things, of what the hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) said a little while ago and in view of what the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) has said, would have welcomed a Bill defining this.

MR. CANNON: We all do.

MR. DOHERTY: Well, the hon. gentleman asks me what rights this Bill is going to confer. This Bill is not going to give anybody any rights. This Bill makes a definition. Let me give one instance, and it is only one. The nationals of every country that is a member of the League have, to begin with, a right to representation in the Assembly. We want to exercise those rights. We have a right to nominate Canadian nationals as aspirants for appointment to the permanent Court of International Justice and, if we get a majority, to elect them. If we have litigation with any other country brought before that permanent Court, and there happens to be sitting upon that permanent Court a national for our adversary, then we have a right to say: "We want a national of ours to sit there, too, to balance the thing up," because they do not proceed by refusing the judge who is a national of one of the parties; their method of evening the matter up is to say to the other party: "You may have a judge of your nationality." All these things turn upon our nationality. Supposing someone says to us: "Is this gentleman a Canadian national?" What is a Canadian national? What is a British subject? This is what the Parliament of Canada is defining to be a Canadian national. If, after the passing of this legislation, I declare that I am a Canadian national, and anybody disputes that, I will turn to the Statute and say: "I fulfil all those conditions." For years back, why do you find in the laws of Great Britain, or in France, or of any other civilized country, the definition of their citizen or subject or national? Surely we have the same interest as all other countries have to form a clear-cut idea of who it is that is entitled, not only to rights in the outside world, but to claim for himself the honourable and distinctive title of Canadian national. We want to define that.

MR. VIEN: I understand the minister is going to introduce a schedule containing a definition.

MR. DOHERTY: I said that I was going to consider that. I must say that I have not been able to consider it very much since, but the more I consider it, the less it impresses me as a necessary thing. I shall, however, be glad to consider whether it would be desirable to do that or not.

MR. MCKENZIE: I suppose the principle of this Bill is conceded by its receiving its second reading. It is fortunate for the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) that he is a member of a Tory Government when introducing and advocating and carrying through Parliament legislation of this kind. I can recall very well conditions in this House when, if a Minister of Justice in a Liberal administration would introduce anything that would look like severance from the Mother Country and cutting away the sacred ties between ourselves and the mother land, woe betide us because we would hear from the stalwart gentleman from Ontario whom I see looking at me from the other side.

MR. DOHERTY: This does not.

MR. MCKENZIE: But it seems to be all right for this Minister of Justice to be a Nationalist. A Nationalist in this country has a significant meaning, and our Tory friends do not like to be told that they are in league with the Nationalists; that they are in league with a Nationalist who used to make openings in the British flag.

MR. DOHERTY: There are Nationalists and Nationalists.

MR. MCKENZIE: Now it is all right to put us all in the same class and say that we are all Nationalists. The Bourassa sect and everybody that followed him are all right now. We have found that we have come to them, and we are all Nationalists. I do not think the good loyal people of Ontario will like the idea that we have forsaken Canadian citizenship with all that that term meant, and that we are now Nationalists, if we take our definition of a Nationalist from what Mr. Bourassa and those behind him were preaching. In 1867, only four provinces of Canada entered Confederation; they each had their status before Confederation; but when they became Canada, they got that status from an Imperial Act of Parliament, and in that Imperial Act they are called the "Dominion of Canada." By what right does this Parliament change the name from the "Dominion of Canada" to the "Nation of Canada"? We have no right, instead of calling ourselves the "Dominion of Canada" to call ourselves the "Nation of Canada." That means a change in the British North America Act, and after this Act passes, wherever the name "Dominion of Canada" occurs in the British North America Act, we shall have to substitute for it the "Nation of Canada" or the "Kingdom of Canada." There is no "Nation of Canada," and no person can say for one moment that there is. Before you can have a Nationalist, you must have a nation. As far as I am concerned, to be a Canadian citizen and a British subject is good enough for me, and I do not find it necessary, even with all its beauty and wealth of language and fine definition, to go to France for any definition of what I am. I am a Canadian.

MR. DOHERTY: We are trying to give you a home-made definition.

MR. MCKENZIE: I am a Canadian and a British subject, and particularly proud of being a subject of the British Empire and under the folds of the British flag. For that reason, I submit to the minister that I do not think we have any right to use the word "national," nor have we any business to declare ourselves a nation except by some convention with the Mother Country. If it is agreed to by convention that all the Dominions shall be called nations, and so forth, I shall have no fault to find; but it is going too far for this Parliament to declare that we are no longer a Dominion of Canada, but a nation with all the responsibilities that that word implies. We must be either one thing or the other. If we are a nation,—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. MCKENZIE: —we have a right to declare war. Will my hon. friends who are saying, "hear, hear," say that we have a right to declare war, or to pass in this House legislation that would be a cause of war between Great Britain and any other country? They will have to say that we could not. But if people are satisfied with the empty shell and are content to think they are a nation when they are not, I suppose we should not deprive them of the privilege of playing with the idea; but there is no such thing. It is always unwise to live under false pretences, and I see no advantage whatever in trying prematurely to get away from our present status to be a nation when we are really not. I think the whole of this legislation is a useless bungle of words.

MR. PARENT: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: I want to point out to the committee before the hon. member speaks that a discussion on the principle of the Bill is certainly not now in order. The Bill was held over at the request of the Opposition owing to the fact that it was not printed, and in order that the principle might be discussed upon the second reading. It is certainly not in order for hon. members to discuss the principle of the Bill at this stage.

MR. MCKENZIE: If the Chairman has any reference to me he is sending coals to Newcastle. I was in this House many years before the hon. gentleman, and I know the rules of the House.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman will then possibly remember that among the rules of the House is one that the ruling of the Chair cannot be questioned, and that it can only be appealed from. I hope that the other hon. members of the committee will adhere to the ruling.

MR. PARENT: It was not my intention to make a speech at all. I simply wanted to call the attention of the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) to a state of affairs which I have noticed while travelling from New York to Montreal. I was just wondering whether it would not be possible to have the form of questions submitted to immigrants and Canadian passengers coming into this country printed in both the French and English languages. That will be a good job for the Printing Bureau if the hon. gentleman wants to see that both languages in this country receive equal consideration.

MR. CALDER: That involves a question that is scarcely pertinent to the provisions of this Bill. There is something in the suggestion made by the hon. member but at the same time we must remember there are a great many people in Canada other than the French-speaking people. The number of people entering Canada from France during the last ten or fifteen years has been comparatively small compared with the numbers arriving from other countries, and if it is desirable to have these forms printed in some language other than English, it certainly would be desirable to have them printed in these other languages as well. I am aware, of course, of the argument for having public documents printed in the two official languages, but that is not applied all along the line.

MR. McMASTER: I think I ought to point out very respectfully to the Minister of Immigration and Colonization that the French language is on a very different footing in this country from the other languages to which he alludes. The first part of my hon. friend's remarks would almost lead an impartial observer to the conclusion that he had forgotten that fact. I am sure that he cannot have done so, but if by any possibility he has, I take in all kindness this opportunity of reminding him of it. As far as official documents are concerned, the hon. member (Mr. Parent) is only asking what I would imagine the constitution of the country accorded him.

MR. VIEN: There is something more to be said in that direction in answer to my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization. The question put by my hon. friend (Mr. Parent) was in reference to Canadian nationals who travel—they are not necessarily immigrants—and who when coming into Canada after a journey to the United States are obliged to answer a questionnaire. A great number of those who travel from New York, Boston, and other American cities to Canada would not understand the questions if they were put to them in English. Very often these people are Canadian nationals coming back to their country. May I ask when we shall know the decision of the right hon. the Minister of Justice as to the schedule?

MR. DOHERTY: I have promised to consider it. I would like to have the Bill go through, and if I should come to the conclusion that it was desirable to add the schedule, I would have the Bill sent back into committee. I would ask the hon. gentleman if he would be kind enough to think it over too, because I know of only one reason for accepting his suggestion, and that is his strong feeling on the subject. I have a great respect for that. Perhaps we might make an honourable compromise in that way. If the Bill goes through committee, I would seriously consider the suggestion, and perhaps he will do so too; perhaps we shall both come to the conclusion that the schedule is not necessary, or perhaps we shall both come to the conclusion that it is.

MR. PARENT: May I ask the right hon. the Minister of Justice if in his capacity as minister he would recommend to the Minister of Immigration and Colonization that the forms submitted to Canadian nationals travelling from other countries to Canada be printed in both the French and English languages?

MR. DOHERTY: I think they ought to have the questions put to them in one or the other of the official languages which they understand, which, of course, in my own case and the case of many hon. gentlemen on the other side will involve the necessity of printing them in both languages, as we happen to have the good fortune to understand both. I think that was the sense in which the Minister of Immigration and Colonization spoke. I do not suppose the suggestion is that when you are face to face with a Russian who does not speak either French or English, you should put the questions to him in both French and English before you go out to get a Russian interpreter and try and put the questions in some language he does understand. My hon. friends, I think, know without my saying it that I have every sympathy for their feeling with regard to their language. For myself I never see any ground to make comparisons between the French language and any other language than the English in this country. I never see the possibility of putting the French language on a par with any foreign language in this country. To that extent I go, but I think all will agree that there can be no object in dumping before a Russian who understands neither French nor English a list of questions in French any more than there would be in putting them in English.

MR. PARENT: If such a man comes here he knows the situation?

MR. DOHERTY: Do not let the hon. gentleman suppose I am putting the French and Russian languages on a par, but the French and English. When you get people who understand neither, I would think there was not much object in talking to them in either.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Doherty moves to amend clause 1 as printed in the Bill by substituting the word "are" for the words "shall be deemed to be," and adding the following words, "or with regard to any person born before the passing of this Act whose father at the time of such birth possessed all the qualifications of a Canadian national as defined in this Act."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. DOHERTY: I move to add to the Bill as Clause 2 the following:

2. (a) Any person who by reason of his having been born in Canada is a Canadian national, but who at his birth or during his minority became under the law of the United Kingdom or of any of the self-governing Dominions of the British Empire, a national also of that Kingdom or Dominion, and is still such a national, and.

(b) any person who though born out of Canada is a Canadian national; may, if of full age and not under disability, make a declaration renouncing his Canadian nationality and on making such declaration shall cease to be a Canadian national.

MR. FIELDING: Where has this declaration to be made? The Act is silent on that point.

MR. DOHERTY: It may perhaps be desirable to specify the place. If I fall into error in that regard it is simply in following the identical analogous provision contained in the British Nationality Act and also the Act of this country. No particular formality was required for the declaration of alienage as between the nationals of different parts of the Empire. The principle laid down in the British Act with regard to a British subject who, under the circumstances mentioned there, renounces his British citizenship, was followed, and I think the section, with the words mutatis mutandis, was copied directly from that Act.

MR. FIELDING: What do you understand it to mean as it stands now? The declaration is to be made under what circumstances, at what point, in what form, and before whom?

MR. DOHERTY: As I say, the Act does not subject that declaration to formality. It might be well that it should. If we did that, however, we should be making a new departure. A declaration without prescribed formalities has been deemed sufficient under the existing legislation.

MR. VIEN: It may be a verbal declaration.

MR. DOHERTY: I realize there is a value in the suggestion that there should be a definite form, and I shall be prepared to ascertain what is the proper form in which the declaration should be put.

MR. CANNON: Last year in the course of the discussion of the Electoral Act, my hon. friend from Waterloo (Mr. Euler) raised certain questions as to amendments which he desired to have introduced into the law, and at that time it was declared by the Government that certain arrangements had been come to between the Imperial authorities and the overseas Dominions as to having a uniform law of nationality or citizenship.

MR. DOHERTY: Not citizenship.

MR. CANNON: I meant to say naturalization. The right hon. gentleman who was Prime Minister at the time (Sir Robert Borden), said if I remember rightly, that no amendment could be introduced or assented to unless the Imperial authorities were consulted. We had that official declaration in the House last year. Does this new legislation interfere in any way with the arrangements made at that time and still existing between the Imperial authorities and the Canadian Government?

MR. DOHERTY: This legislation does not touch the question of naturalization at all. It leaves it absolutely where it was before any one talked about this Bill, or where it would be if this Bill were never passed. As to the arrangements which the hon. gentleman speaks about, it might be well to have the circumstances in regard thereto stated clearly. There is no more arrangement that we must do as the Imperial Parliament wants on the subject of naturalization, than there is that the Imperial Parliament must do what we want. The arrangement that was come to was that, because there was something that this Parliament could give which no one else could give, and because there was something else that the British Parliament could give which neither we nor any one else could give, we would make this agreement, that so long as our laws were identical, our naturalizations, which of their own force did not apply in the United Kingdom, would by reason of this arrangement be effective there, and vice versa, so long as our laws were identical we would recognize the home naturalization laws as effective in this country. To that extent there is an understanding. It is as desirable that our naturalization should be effective throughout the Empire as it is that the naturalization of the United Kingdom should be effective here; and because constitutionally the Parliament of the United Kingdom could not naturalize a man in Canada we agreed that it was necessary to have this arrangement, just as because we could not naturalize a man in the United Kingdom it became necessary to secure a similar undertaking on their part. The agreement was one on a footing of perfect equality.

MR. CANNON: Is it possible for a man to be a Canadian national in Canada, that is, a Canadian citizen, and not be a British subject in any other part of the British Empire?

MR. DOHERTY: A man to be a Canadian national must be a British subject.

MR. CANNON: In Canada?

MR. DOHERTY: Yes.

MR. CANNON: Can he be a Canadian national and a British subject in Canada and not be a British subject in another part of the British Empire?

MR. DOHERTY: If he has the good fortune to be naturalized under Canadian law he is a naturalized British subject in Canada and will be a naturalized British subject in the United Kingdom. He may not be one in Australia or in New Zealand, because they have not as yet passed the necessary legislation, and that is unfortunate. But I see no inconsistency in a man's being a Canadian national though he is not a British subject in Australia.

MR. CANNON: What would be the case of a man who was born in the United States, naturalized a British subject under Canadian law, and now lives in England? Is he a Canadian national?

MR. DOHERTY: If a man was born in the United States and now lives in England, having been naturalized in Canada—if these are all the facts and you have nothing else to suggest—he would not be a Canadian national because he was not born in Canada. When he was naturalized in Canada he was made a British subject, but in addition to being a British subject, if not born in Canada, he must have acquired a Canadian domicile.

MR. POWER: There is, I presume, a law defining a United Kingdom national?

MR. DOHERTY: Not that I know of.

MR. POWER: The Bill refers to a national "of that kingdom." I presume that refers to the United Kingdom. So there is such a thing as a United Kingdom national.

MR. DOHERTY: I know of no Act defining one. There are lots of things that are law though they are not in Acts, and if there be no Act or law now there may be one in the future. But I think there would be a little difficulty in ascertaining who were "ressortissants" in the United Kingdom.

MR. POWER: Am I to understand that Canada is the first of the self-governing colonies to have nationals of its own?

MR. McMASTER: So much the better.

MR. DOHERTY: I think they all have, but we are the first, so far as I know, to make the definition.

MR. McMASTER: Why should we not be?

MR. DOHERTY: I think that is our proper place, first in the line and first all the time.

MR. POWER: What would be the position of a gentleman in West Africa who lives under a mandatory power? What kind of a national would he be?

MR. DOHERTY: I think it would take a very wise man indeed—wiser than I can pretend to be—to define the position of the inhabitants of countries who are under mandates. I have not had the advantage of seeing the terms of the mandates, I do not know that they are settled, and I am afraid I will have to say that I cannot answer the question; I do not know anybody that could just now.

MR. VIEN: The Minister has spoken of an agreement which was come to, probably at the Imperial Conference in England, as to the identity of our laws on naturalization. What was the nature of that agreement? Was it written and where can it be found?

MR. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman will find it in the Canadian Statute dealing with naturalization. He will likewise find it in the statute of the United Kingdom dealing with the same subject.

MR. VIEN: That is an enactment; my question had reference to the agreement.

MR. DOHERTY: Perhaps "agreement" is not a proper word. I might say this to the hon. gentleman: The agreement, so far as we can talk about an agreement, was reached at the Imperial Conference at which Sir Wilfrid Laurier represented Canada.

MR. VIEN: What year, please?

MR. DOHERTY: In 1911. Now what was agreed there was that it was desirable that we should have a common naturalization, and that the way to do that was to pass similar laws of naturalization in both countries. Then we passed similar laws, and out of that there arose the necessity of our keeping our laws similar. It was not peculiar to our Parliament that it was said: We cannot very well deal with the question because we have no understanding that the United Kingdom will deal with it and we want to keep our laws similar. If the hon. gentleman will look at the debate on the Naturalization Act in the House of Commons of the United Kingdom he will find numerous suggestions with respect to which the Minister in charge of the Bill said: "I think that is a good suggestion but you see we have not consulted with the Dominions and we want to avoid getting our laws different." It was not a question of the United Kingdom telling us what we must do any more than a question of our telling them what they must do. It was a question of two peoples who wanted to keep their action in line to attain a common purpose. Therefore, on their side they tried to communicate with us before final action, and we tried to communicate with them. But the origin of the understanding that was come to that a general naturalization was desirable and that the way to do it was by uniform legislation is to be found—although it had been talked about earlier—in the Imperial Conference of 1911. The hon. gentleman will see there what in substance is the understanding that was come to which was carried out by the British Act of 1914 and the Canadian Act of 1914.

MR. VIEN: I understand then that it was an agreement reached by all those self-governing Dominions that took part in the Conference in 1911?

MR. DOHERTY: Yes.

MR. VIEN: I understand further that Canada and the United Kingdom are the only two parties that have acted in conformity to that agreement?

MR. DOHERTY: Yes, that is my latest understanding.

MR. VIEN: Has any information been received by the Government as to the reasons why, after the period of ten years which has elapsed since 1911, the other self-governing Dominions did not act in accordance with the agreement that was reached at the Conference?

MR. DOHERTY: No. I cannot possibly tell the hon. gentleman. I may tell him this: By way of carrying out the understanding or agreement, and when I say "agreement," I do not want to be misunderstood—

MR. VIEN: It was a resolution of the Conference.

MR. DOHERTY: Everybody came to an agreement that if it was a desirable thing to have a naturalization that would go all over the Empire the best way to do it was by uniform legislation. I do not say that anyone sat down and said "I will do it," but that was what was agreed to be the best thing to do. Carrying that out the British authorities drafted an Act which they claimed carried out the understanding, or which purported to do so. That Act was circulated throughout the Dominions and they were all asked if it was acceptable to them. All of them except Canada said that it was acceptable. Now I do not want to indulge in anything in the nature of criticism at all, but the draft had come to this country shortly before the change of Government. I do not think it had been considered by the Government that preceded the Borden administration. When we came into office we found it there and we said: "No, that never was the understanding of the agreement and we will not submit to it." That was an Act which purported to make the United Kingdom Naturalization Act effective in Canada, so that by virtue of their legislation people would find themselves entitled to have their naturalization recognized in Canada. We took the position that we would not submit to that; that whoever was to be recognized in Canada as properly naturalized must be so under the enactment of the Canadian Parliament. It took us two years and a trip to England to get that acknowledged. Finally, it was acknowledged and now our legislation stands. The position we took was the validity of a naturalization in Canada must be accepted because it complies with all the provisions of the law of the Parliament of Canada, and not as resting on any other law. If the hon. gentleman will refer to the Naturalization Act he will see that was carried out.

MR. EULER: It certainly was my impression that when two years ago the question of the naturalization of certain aliens, introduced by myself, was before the House the then Prime Minister and the Acting Solicitor General (now Minister of Militia) stated that the Canadian Parliament was not competent to grant naturalization according to its own wishes because it conflicted with the wishes of the British Parliament or with the terms of the British Act. I am very strongly of the impression that was so stated in the House of Commons by the then Prime Minister and also by the then Solicitor-General. We remained under that impression in the session of 1919 and it was accentuated during the session of 1920. It was only at the last moment, when the Act was changed, that the admission was made that there never was ground for stating in this Parliament that the British Government was trying to dictate to us in any shape or form, that we always had that power. We were delayed for two years because members of the ministry, including the then Prime Minister, were under a wrong impression as to the law.

MR. DOHERTY: I suppose it will be conceded that this discussion is not very relevant to the Bill we are now discussing.

MR. EULER: But I would like a statement from the minister.

MR. DOHERTY: I shall be very pleased if I can to remove the misapprehension which is in the mind of the hon. member. I am quite sure that there is a misapprehension there but I am not certain that I can succeed in removing it. What was stated by the Prime Minister of the time of which the hon. gentleman speaks, and also by the Solicitor-General, was just what I pointed out a little while ago—that in order to maintain the Empire-wide quality of our naturalization the Parliament of the United Kingdom must see to it that its law was the same as ours, and we on our side must see to it that our law was the same as theirs. It was not for lack of authority, but it was because the Imperial Parliament had passed certain provisions and there was a mistaken impression that those provisions had been embodied by the draftsman in that portion of the Act which it was necessary should be identical with the British Act. It was in that the mistake consisted. The clauses referred to were not included in that portion of the Act which was required to be identical. I may say that as it happened—and I am not saying this to glorify myself—when I took up the statute and read it two things became apparent to me. That there had been a mistake; but from the form in which the statute was drafted it was not at all to be wondered that the draftsman had fallen into confusion. Let me tender my congratulations to the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). I know it makes him so happy, and I would hate to detract from his happiness. I admit that we made a mistake. Oh, joy, that there was once a Government composed of members of this party that made a mistake. I hope that through the years to come the hon. gentleman will be able to hug that delightful thought to his bosom, and I feel some happiness in so far as I have contributed to the mistake which has brought that very great happiness to the hon. gentleman. Now I would like to get back to our Bill if I might.

MR. EULER: Just one moment. The minister perhaps takes almost as much pleasure out of the last part of his oration as he hoped I was taking.

MR. DOHERTY: That is impossible.

MR. EULER: My object in making the statement I did a few moments ago was possibly because of misapprehension of what the minister had said. I understand him to say that this Government could not have enacted naturalization legislation without reference to the British law, and that it took this Government two years to induce the British Government to change its attitude. If that is not what he said I misunderstood him.

MR. DOHERTY: Certainly you did.

MR. EULER: I know that the mistake, which never should have occurred and which gives him so much pleasure to dwell upon, was not the fault of the minister himself but some one else's entirely.

MR. DOHERTY: From what the hon. gentleman says I must have conveyed an entirely erroneous impression. We must be fair to everybody. The mistake was exactly the mistake I referred to in taking the Act up here. As the hon. gentleman will have occasion sometimes to refer to that Act he will find that it is divided into two parts.

MR. EULER: I know all about that.

MR. DOHERTY: Part two of the Act is essentially the part to keep identical. When the British Parliament came to amend the Act they made certain amendments to part two by inserting certain words in the section here and there, and I think in some places they substituted sections; then they enacted three additional sections, making new substantive dispositions, and finally they put a clause at the end to say—I do not recall it at the present moment, but it was one that would convey to one the impression at first glance that all of these preceding amendments were amendments to part two; but when you looked at them closely you could see that that was not correct, and that the last two or three dispositions were perfectly distinct and not intended to amend part two. To be perfectly fair to the British Government, they never pretended that those articles did amend part two; the mistake was on this side entirely. In fact, it is apparent very early in the correspondence that not only had the British Government not fallen into error, but that when they found the discussion that was going on here they took occasion to cable calling our attention to the fact that we were making a mistake. So the hon. gentleman must not have any idea that it was any attempt at imposition of authority on the part of the British Government. We make mistakes sometimes. I made one the other day and was admonished by my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) and it is always a delight to him when he is able to talk of our blunders.

MR. MCKENZIE: He would be talking all the time.

MR. VIEN: I understand the right hon. gentleman to say that when the Government undertake to enact naturalization laws they confer with the British Government so as to obtain some similarity between their laws and ours. Is that conference taking place also with the other self-governing Dominions so as to try and obtain that similarity with their laws?

MR. DOHERTY: The practice has been to transfer suggestions to the other Dominions. For instance, if the British Government made suggestions to us they would make them to the other self-governing Dominions too, and if we transmitted suggestions to the British Government that Government would submit them to the Parliaments of the other self-governing Dominions. Why the other self-governing Dominions have not acted I have no reason of knowing.

MR. VIEN: As to that—

AN HON. MEMBER: Let us get to bed.

MR. VIEN: Everybody who wants to go to bed is free to go.

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. VIEN: Was the proposed Bill discussed at the League of Nations?

MR. DOHERTY: No.

MR. VIEN: Was it suggested at the Peace Conference?

MR. DOHERTY: No.

MR. VIEN: And was it discussed as between Canada and the United Kingdom?

MR. DOHERTY: No.

MR. VIEN: It is purely on the initiative of Canada?

MR. DOHERTY: Yes.

MR. VIEN: And without any understanding that any other part of the British Empire will take the same action?

MR. DOHERTY: Exactly; we have no understanding as to whether any other part of the British Empire will think proper to define its nationals or not, and with all respect I think it is none of our business. Equally so, I like to believe that other parts of the Empire fully recognize that this is no concern of theirs. We are defining our own Canadian nationals. Some other of the self-governing dominions may deem it wise to define their nationals—Australia, for instance—but Australia will do exactly what she likes about it. I do not think the Canadian Parliament would feel that we had to go and ask anybody else's leave to define who we are. It is for us to recognize who is a Canadian and who is not.

MR. CANNON: I understand that after this Bill is passed Canada will, at future meetings of the League, always be represented by a Canadian national.

MR. DOHERTY: I should think so.

MR. CANNON: Or might Canada be in the same position as South Africa was at the last meeting of the League, when she was represented by Lord Robert Cecil? In view of the passage of this Bill will it no longer be possible for the Government to delegate their powers, for instance, to someone else of his standing?

MR. DOHERTY: I should not like to answer for what may happen in the future—when, for instance, my hon. friend becomes a member of the Canadian Government. I should think, however, that any Canadian Government would always be able to find Canadian nationals competent to represent Canada in the Assembly of the League of Nations. I do not want to enter upon any discussion of what General Smuts thought it proper to do in regard to South Africa; that is a matter for South Africans to settle. All hon. gentlemen will agree that on some odd occasion it might happen, when there was nothing important to be done and ornamental representation only was required, you might ask somebody on the spot to be good enough to act as Canada's representative.

MR. MCMASTER: I hope the minister does not infer that the people in the British Isles or in any other part of the Empire would be more ornamental than Canadian nationals?

MR. DOHERTY: Not more ornamental, but, you see, "quand on n'a pas ce qu'on aime, on aime ce qu'on a." When you do not have a Simon-pure Canadian national, then, if occasion requires, you might utilize somebody who was not quite so good-looking.

MR. VIEN: It has been found difficult so far to get a Canadian national to represent us at Washington; it may be difficult to get a Canadian national to represent us at the League of Nations.

MR. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman should not pile all our troubles on us at the one moment. When he sees whom we shall select, he will agree that the waiting was worth while.

MR. CANNON: Especially if, as the press reports suggest, my hon. friend himself is appointed to the position.

MR. VIEN: Will the right hon. gentleman tell us what has been the cause of the delay?

MR. DOHERTY: Waiting for the numerous suggestions that we gather in day by day and night by night. It would have been a pity if opportunity had not been given for the valuable advice that that wait has given rise to.

MR. MCKENZIE: I understand that the British flag is the only flag recognized on Canadian ships by foreign nations. Will the adoption of this measure bring about any change in that respect?

MR. DOHERTY: It will not affect our ships in the slightest; we will keep on land for the time being.

MR. MCKENZIE: Then our flag will still not be recognized in any foreign country.

MR. DOHERTY: When we get a flag I suppose we will attend to its recognition.

MR. BALLANTYNE: The hon. member knows well that on the Canadian merchant ships we fly the red ensign the same as the British ships, except that we have the Canadian coat-of-arms on it.

MR. VIEN: Is it recognized abroad?

MR. BALLANTYNE: Yes.

MR. VIEN: Internationally?

MR. BALLANTYNE: I believe so.

MR. VIEN: I understand that a few years ago our Canadian flag—a British ensign with the Canadian coat-of-arms—was hauled down in the harbour of New York or Boston because it was not internationally recognized. Has this status been changed?

MR. COPP: After this Bill passes will it be possible for a person to be a Canadian national and also a national of some other overseas Dominion or the United Kingdom?

MR. DOHERTY: So long as a person who is a Canadian national did not, even though he became a national of some other Dominion, make the declaration contemplated in the Bill, he would continue to be a Canadian national. If a British subject in the United States had a son born to him, that son would be a British subject and an American citizen. I mentioned instances earlier in the evening of men born in this country who were both British subjects and French citizens. I know of no way of avoiding that unless we come to some convention in the matter. It might be desirable at some time that some convention in that regard should be arrived at between the Dominions and the Mother Country. We have a provision here to enable a man to choose which one he will adhere to if he should happen to find himself in that position.

MR. COPP: But if he is a national of Canada and also of another Dominion or the United Kingdom and does not choose to make any declaration, which must he take?

MR. DOHERTY: This Bill does not undertake to say what his relationship is to any other country. According to the law of this country, if he was born, say, in Canada, and makes no declaration, he will continue to be a Canadian national.

MR. COPP: He can exercise all the privileges of being a Canadian national, irrespective of whether he is also a national of another country?

MR. DOHERTY: Yes, just as a man born in Canada, though his father, being a Frenchman, was a French citizen, may enjoy all the privileges of a British subject either in this country or in the United Kingdom.

MR. PARENT: Under the Indian Act I understand that an Indian is not a "person." Will he become a Canadian national under this Act?

MR. DOHERTY: Well, I must confess that I have not given consideration to the question of the Indian. However, I have no reason to doubt that under the disposition of this Act an Indian would be a Canadian national if he was born in Canada.

MR. VIEN: When is the minister going to bring down that definition of the declaration?

MR. DOHERTY: I think I can take it that these clauses are adopted. I was going to move that the committee rise and report progress.

MR. FIELDING: And let the Bill remain in committee?

MR. DOHERTY: Yes, for the purpose of the declaration.

MR. MCKENZIE: It would seem to me that sub-section (b) of section 2 more properly belongs to the Naturalization Act. I do not think we have any right to declare here how any man can throw off the responsibility of having become a British subject.

MR. DOHERTY: The question is not one of throwing off British citizenship; it is purely limited to his Canadian nationality, and that is what he is throwing off. The British Nationality Act, which we have enacted also, provides how a man can throw off his quality of British subject. This Act does not touch that in the slightest. A man would lose his Canadian nationality when he threw off his quality of British subject, but his merely throwing off his quality of Canadian national does not affect his quality of British subject at all.

MR. MCKENZIE: What will he be? He is not a native of Canada; he is not a native of any other country. What on earth is he?

MR. FIELDING: Nothing at all.

MR. DOHERTY: Let us take a very simple case. A man was born in England of a father who was a Canadian national. That man would be a British subject and a Canadian national. He would have two qualities. By-and-by he thinks he would rather be a national or ressortissant of the United Kingdom. He says: "I want to renounce my Canadian nationality," and that is all he renounces; he remains just the same British subject he was before. It will depend upon what the laws of the different portions of the Empire are whether or not he becomes a national of one of those countries. It is not essential that he should be a national of any thing at all when he is living in any part of the Empire which does not deem it necessary to define its nationalism. He may be in the unfortunate situation of being a national of nothing in particular; but he will always be a British subject, and under those circumstances, I presume he would be a national of the United Kingdom.

MR. FIELDING: And yet a man born in the United States of a father who was a British subject, would be at the same time a citizen of the United States and a Canadian national?

MR. DOHERTY: And a British subject.

MR. FIELDING: By reason of this Bill only.

MR. DOHERTY: He would be a British subject without this Bill.

MR. FIELDING: This Bill makes him a British subject.

MR. DOHERTY: It makes him a Canadian national. But before a man can be a Canadian national, he has to be a British subject. Supposing this Bill was never passed, a man born in the United States of a father who is a British subject is both an American citizen and a British subject. I know this sounds anomalous, and there is a provision in the British Nationality Act to enable a man, just as we provide here for throwing off the mere national, to throw off the quality of British subject where a man, under those circumstances by reason of his father being a British subject, is a British subject. Under that provision—I have not the text of it—that man may make a declaration of alienage and cease to be a British subject, or he may refrain from making that declaration and continue to be a British subject. There are in the world any number of people who are in the anomalous position of being subjects of two countries.

MR. CANNON: Will this Bill, from an international viewpoint, receive any application so far as Canada is concerned, outside of our territory?

MR. DOHERTY: No law has any application outside of the territory of the country that made it, but I think I am safe in saying that it is the universal international custom to accept a country's own definition of who its citizens or subjects are unless some other country disputes it. If somebody gets disputing over some of our most distinguished citizens, I can readily comprehend we may have serious disputes between different parts of this Empire as to who is entitled to claim some of the distinguished gentlemen I see in front of me. If such dispute should arise, I would not contend that our law should govern anywhere outside of Canada, any more than a British law saying that a man is a British subject governs anywhere outside of the British realms. Such laws have to depend upon international comity for any recognition outside. It would be just as absurd for me to say that this law will govern outside of Canada as to our nationality, as it would be for the British Prime Minister to say that when the Parliament of Great Britain passes a law, defining a British subject, that makes people in France say: That man is a British subject. People in France say so on account of international comity, but they are not bound to do so; they might legislate and say: That man is a French citizen, and that is the law of France.

MR. CANNON: As I understand my right hon. friend, the question is not one of law, but of courtesy, and this law is passed so as to secure representation by a Canadian national at future meetings of the League. Those meetings are held generally outside of Canada, so that the law would never apply except through courtesy.

MR. DOHERTY: I am sorry, but I cannot make for Canadians a position that does not belong to anybody in the wide world. When a British man, say Mr. Balfour—nobody will doubt his identity as a British subject and statesman—arrives at the Assembly in France and says "I am a British subject," there is no law to entitle him to recognition as such; it is not because the law of Great Britain says he is a British subject that in France he is a British subject. He is a British subject in France because France recognizes the fact. But if France chose to legislate and say that everybody born in England should be a French citizen, every one of those men, the moment he stepped into France, would be a French citizen. No country in the world can legislate to make a man its citizen outside of its borders, because no country's laws govern outside of its limits; but it is the universal practice of countries to define who are their citizens, and it is the usual practice of civilized countries to accept each country's definition of who is its citizen, until some other country puts in a claim to such people and then you may have a dispute.

MR. POWER: They may enforce their right.

MR. DOHERTY: Yes. We may pass laws until we are blue in the face: but we cannot prevent outside countries from passing laws contrary to ours, and we can never make our laws govern in a foreign country.

CANADIAN NATIONALS DEFINITION ACT.

HOUSE again in committee on Bill No. 17 to define Canadian Nationals, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

THE CHAIRMAN: When this Bill was last before the committee clause 1 as amended, had been adopted and clause 2, also. The Bill was allowed to stand for further consideration.

MR. DOHERTY: The reason for the Bill being allowed to stand was in order that consideration might be given to a suggestion for which I am indebted to the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's. My hon. friend pointed out that in connexion with clause 2, which was passed, it would be desirable that a form of declaration should be provided, and on looking the matter up, I find that he is quite right in that regard—there should be such a form. The explanation given for the omission was that the clause was taken from the provisions of the Nationalization Act, and that there a form is not provided, the reason being that under that statute there exists power to make regulations under which the form could be defined. As there are no regulations to enable such a thing to be done in the case of the present measure, the form ought to be provided in the statute itself. I beg therefore to move:—

That Clause 2 be amended by striking out the words "and on making such declaration shall cease to be a Canadian National" in the two last lines thereof and substituting the following:—

"Such declaration may be made before a notary public or other person authorized to administer oaths in the locality in which the declaration is made, and may be in the form set out in the schedule to this Act. The declarant shall transmit his declaration to the Secretary of State of Canada and upon the Secretary of State being satisfied of the sufficiency of the declaration and that it has been duly executed it shall be filed of record, whereupon the declarant shall cease to be a Canadian National, and a certified copy of the declaration shall be forwarded to the declarant with an endorsement thereon that the original declaration has been filed of record."

MR. ARCHAMBAULT: May I ask the minister if copies of this amendment have been distributed?

MR. DOHERTY: No. As I explained, the matter was discussed when the Bill was before the committee, and the proposal which is now being made is to carry out the suggestion of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) that there should be provided a form of declaration to be made when a person renounces his Canadian nationality.

MR. ARCHAMBAULT: Surely, Mr. Chairman, we cannot discuss the amendment which has just been read by the Minister without having had an opportunity of reading and considering it. I would like to take cognizance of this amendment before casting a vote.

MR. CASGRAIN: So would I.

MR. DOHERTY: I acted under the apprehension that the matter had already been before the committee and that the sole question was whether we should carry out the suggestion made by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's. If the hon. gentleman thinks there is any danger in accepting that suggestion, and that he would like to have an opportunity to further consider the amendment, I am quite willing to meet his convenience.

MR. ARCHAMBAULT: I would suggest that the minister give us an opportunity to read the amendment. I move that the Bill stand.

MR. DOHERTY: I would regret that we should be delayed in getting this Bill through committee, but I must leave it to the judgment of the hon. gentleman. If he thinks it is really important and desires to insist on his objection, I would not refuse to yield to that insistence. But perhaps he might give a moment's thought as to whether the matter is of sufficient importance to warrant this delay.

MR. ARCHAMBAULT: As I said before, I have not read the amendment which the Minister has just presented, and therefore I cannot intelligently discuss it. My right hon. friend may be able to do that; I cannot.

MR. CASGRAIN: He has had more experience, he is an ex-Judge.

MR. DOHERTY: Perhaps the hon. gentleman might read the amendment now.

MR. ARCHAMBAULT: Some other members might like to read it too.

MR. CASGRAIN: They are here to protect the people.

MR. MURPHY: I do not wish to delay the passage of the Bill, not even by making a suggestion, but may I point out to my right hon. friend (Mr. Doherty) that while the original title of the Bill is "An Act to define Canadian Nationals," the amendment which he has just introduced when added to section 2 makes that section the most important part of the Bill, and that it deals with the action by which a person can rid himself of his Canadian nationality. Under the circumstances might it not be well to amplify the title, if not to make some other changes in it?

MR. DOHERTY: If I understand it rightly, the question of the title will come up after the third reading.

MR. MURPHY: I am suggesting it now.

MR. DOHERTY: I would be glad to consider the desirability of adding words to cover what the hon. gentleman suggests.

MR. ARCHAMBAULT: On looking at my file I find that Bill No. 17 contains only one section, which is as follows:—

1. The following persons are Canadian Nationals, viz.:—

(a) British subjects domiciled in Canada.

(b) British subjects who ordinarily reside in Canada although not domiciled there.

The amendment states: that section 2 of Bill 17 is amended by striking out the words "and on making such declaration shall cease to be a Canadian national" in the two last lines thereof and substituting the following, and then follows the amendment. I do not see any section 2.

MR. DOHERTY: My hon. friend overlooks the fact that when the Bill was in committee it was amended to contain two clauses, and those clauses were both adopted, subject to consideration of the suggestion of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's. So the hon. gentleman is going back to the Bill as it was originally introduced.

MR. MURPHY: There is a reprint of the Bill on file.

MR. POWER: While I have the highest respect for the Minister of Justice and for the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault), I would point out that there appears to be an amendment which has been submitted only to the Minister of Justice and to the hon. member. Surely other hon. members who are being asked to vote ought to know what is going on.

MR. ARCHAMBAULT: I quite agree with my hon. friend.

MR. DOHERTY: As I have said already, this amendment is to meet the suggestion which came from the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's and which I thought the committee fully apprehended when it was made and discussed. However, if hon. gentlemen think that it is of sufficient importance that they should have a further opportunity to read this amendment, I do not desire to persist. I only venture to suggest that under the circumstances perhaps on further consideration hon. members might not think it necessary to insist; but if they do insist I do not.

MR. GAUVREAU: Mr. Chairman, may I suggest a middle course? If I understand well, this amendment has been brought down at the suggestion of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's. Therefore if it is satisfactory to him, I do not see why we should delay its acceptance by the committee.

MR. FIELDING: I suggest, if it is not unacceptable to the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Gauvreau) that we might let the Bill go through and wait for its third reading, the minister assuring us that ample time will be given before the third reading is moved.

MR. DOHERTY: I certainly would agree to that.

On the title:

The CHAIRMAN: I may say that the title cannot be changed in committee. The custom is that the committee suggest to the House any change in title which it desires to have made, and then the change is made by motion which follows the third reading of the Bill.

MR. DOHERTY: I think the suggestion of the hon. gentleman would be met if the title were altered by adding thereto the words: "and to provide for the renunciation of Canadian nationality." Then we shall have covered the two items.

CANADIAN NATIONALS DEFINITION ACT.

Third Reading

On motion of Hon. Hugh Guthrie (Acting Solicitor-General), Bill No. 17, to define Canadian Nationals and to provide for the renunciation of Canadian Nationality was read the third time and passed.

THE HOUSE OF COMMONS OF CANADA.

BILL 17.

An Act to define Canadian Nationals and to provide for the Renunciation of Canadian Nationality.

As passed by the House of Commons, 15th April, 1921.

HIS MAJESTY, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

1. The following persons are Canadian Nationals, viz.:—

(a) Any British subject who is a Canadian citizen within the meaning of The Immigration Act, chapter twenty-seven of the statutes of 1910, as heretofore amended;

(b) The wife of any such citizen;

(c) Any person born out of Canada, whose father was a Canadian National at the time of that person's birth, or with regard to persons born before the passing of this Act, any person whose father at the time of such birth, possessed all the qualifications of a Canadian National, as defined in this Act.

2. (a) Any person who by reason of his having been born in Canada is a Canadian National, but who at his birth or during his minority became under the law of the United Kingdom or of any self-governing Dominion of the British Empire, a national also of that Kingdom or Dominion, and is still such a national, and,

(b) Any person who though born out of Canada is a Canadian National; may, if of full age and not under disability, make a declaration, renouncing his Canadian nationality. Such declaration may be made before a notary public or other person authorized to administer oaths in the locality in which the declaration is made, and may be in the form set out in the schedule to

DEBATES OF THE SENATE.
Tuesday, 19th April, 1921.
CANADIAN NATIONALS BILL.

First Reading.

BILL 17, an Act to define Canadian Nationals, and to provide for the Renunciation of Canadian nationality.—Hon. Sir James Loughheed.

Thursday, 21st April, 1921.
CANADIAN NATIONALS BILL.

Second Reading.

HON. SIR JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 17, an Act to define Canadian Nationals, and to provide for the Renunciation of Canadian nationality.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, this Bill consists of two sections—one dealing with the definition of Canada Nationals, and the other making provision for the renunciation of Canadian nationality. We have entered into the League of Nations, which, as honourable gentlemen know, is constituted of most of the nations of the world. Terms are used that must necessarily be made common to all the members of the League. This term "Nationals" has been used, and, inasmuch as there are certain rights and privileges growing out of membership in the League, it is very desirable that there should be a clearly-defined interpretation placed upon the terms that are used in the League. Hence it is desirable that we should legislate upon this subject.

We have upon our statute books two laws, the Immigration Act and the Naturalization Act, which deal with citizenship, or practically the term that is before us; but there is no definition given to this particular term in those Acts. This definition is peculiarly needful owing to the many self-governing entities which make up the British Empire and which have the right to legislate upon these questions. Without the definition there might be confusion, and it has been thought desirable to legislate as proposed in the Bill.

I may explain to honourable gentlemen that this in no way cuts down or invades the citizenship rights of a British subject. It simply defines what shall constitute a Canadian National, in the event of the question arising in connexion with the League.

HON. MR. TURRIFF: Would it not be more suitable if that definition were put in as an amendment to the Immigration Act or to the Naturalization Act?

HON. SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: No; because it has not necessarily to do with the Immigration Act. That is to say, the Immigration Act deals with the subject of immigration, and the definition placed in that Act upon citizenship has to do only and entirely with the question of immigration. This definition deals with an entirely different subject, and to embody it in another Act might lead to confusion. My honourable friend might suggest—and it would be more pertinent—that the Naturalization Act should be amended.

HON. MR. TURRIFF: Yes.

HON. SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: But that Act has to do with an entirely different subject from this. This is practically a new subject that has arisen from the League of Nations; it is therefore desirable that it should stand by itself.

HON. MR. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Does this amendment in any way affect the question of the deportation of undesirables?

HON. SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: No; it in no way affects the Immigration Act.

HON. MR. BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen, it is somewhat difficult to understand exactly what is the meaning of a Canadian National. I noticed in reading the discussion that took place in another chamber that apparently no very definite conclusion was reached as to what was really meant by this term. I do not think that the members of this House wish to oppose the principle of the Bill if the Government think it necessary to define the term in this way for the purpose of dealing with the question which apparently has been raised by the Treaty; but I hope that when we go into Committee my honourable friend will be able to give us a full explanation of what really constitutes a Canadian National and what are his rights.

HON. MR. LYNCH-STAUNTON: And why.

HON. MR. DANDURAND: There was a time, honourable gentlemen, when there were to be found in Canada men who thought they possessed Canadian nationality or citizenship because they had obtained naturalization papers under a Canadian Federal Act. I recall the case of prominent Americans who came here and renounced their United States nationality, to adopt another nationality, called the Canadian. It was found that on leaving Canada they were nationals, or citizens, of no country at all. Our Naturalization Act did not give to those gentlemen any status in the outside world. When they travelled outside of Canada they were disowned by American consuls and ambassadors; yet they were not recognized by British representatives abroad. They had an acquired nationality only when they were within Canada. Without mentioning names, I will simply draw the attention of the Chamber to very prominent men who came from the United States to develop our railway system. If in the past we had Canadians who were nothing outside of Canada, we shall henceforth have in Canada Canadians who will be known by many different names: there is the Canadian citizen under the Immigration Act; there will be under this Act the Canadian National; there will be the British Canadian. Under the Census Act we are not Canadians; we are British Canadians, or English Canadians, or Scotch Canadians, or French Canadians. In the census that was taken last there was no column for Canadians; they were non-existent; they were anything but Canadians. Under the Census Act, if I remember rightly, we were obliged to say where our parents came from, in order that we might be described. But now, as I say, we have Canadian citizens, we have Canadian Nationals, and we have Britishers purely and simply, who, roaming about the Dominions, feel at home and call themselves British; and there are some among us who think that they are Canadians. I wonder if we could not simplify the situation considerably by defining a Canadian. My honourable friend may be able now to explain to me the necessity of defining a Canadian National. When I attend the League of Nations shall I be obliged to say, if I am asked what I am, or from what country I come, "I am a Canadian National?" I confess I would prefer to say simply, "I am a Canadian." Will not this Act preclude me from calling myself a Canadian if by this Act the official definition of what I am is a "Canadian National?"

HON. SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: It is wonderful, the difficulties against which my honourable friend has been struggling for years past. I wonder that he has flourished so prosperously as he has done. He seems to have entirely overlooked the fact that we have departed from the Naturalization Act which we had on the statute book some years ago.

HON. MR. DANDURAND: I know that.

HON. SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: And the difficulties which he has so graphically pointed out have been overcome by the Naturalization Act which is in operation throughout the Empire. Of course, it must have been quite apparent to my honourable friend that until that Act was passed we would have had no authority to pass legislation which would give effect to naturalization outside of Canada. But, as my honourable friend very well knows, that difficulty, about which he has said nothing, has been overcome long ago.

HON. MR. ROCHE: Honourable gentlemen, I think the honourable Minister in his explanation might have assured us whether the purpose of this Bill was to expand or to restrict the present regulations concerning naturalization in Canada, and especially with regard to its effect upon citizens of foreign nations who may wish to make their domicile in Canada. I do not know what this will effect. Lately Great Britain has entered into relations with foreign countries under the League of Nations. If there is anything in this Act that would restrict the privileges or rights of citizens of foreign countries, partakers in the League with Great Britain, they would immediately call upon Great Britain as being allies under the League of Nations to control and restrain the Act of the Dominion Parliament so that all those would have access to the dependencies or colonies of Great Britain, and, under the League of Nations, they being allies, they would be entitled to the very best treatment. If there were any Acts of ours to restrict those rights or privileges, Great Britain would be called upon to restrict those Acts.

HON. MR. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Before this Bill passes, may I ask what is a "Canadian National?"

HON. SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: It has grown out of the use in the treaty of the term "Nationals." My honourable friend's attention must have been directed to that. Consequently it becomes necessary for us to define what a "National" is. It is necessary for Canada, it will be necessary for Australia, and it may be necessary for all countries which are members of the League, to do this. It is simply owing to the use of a word which will be applied in common by all the members which form the League. It is apparent that it is very desirable to do that. We have adhered as strongly as possible to the substance of what has always constituted British citizenship in Canada. There is no distinction; it does not create a new status of citizenship.

HON. MR. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Is a similar Act being passed by the other Dominions?

HON. SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: I could not say; but I should think it would be desirable on account of the use of the term. Let me illustrate. My honourable friend has been following the deliberations of the League of Nations. He will observe at the present time, for instance, that there is being discussed the organization of a Court of International Justice, and provision has been made in the constitution of that Court that any member of the League may have one of its own representatives a member of that Court. The word "National" is used. The question then might arise, in the election of a member who would be entitled to sit on that Court, as to whether he would come within the term "National." For instance, you could not take the term "Canadian citizen under the Immigration Act" and say that a Canadian citizen under the Immigration Act would possess all the qualifications of British citizenship necessary for that office, because a restricted meaning is given to the term in certain statutes which have in view a particular object. Possibly if we slumber on it we may be able to make it more illuminating.

HON. MR. DANDURAND: I would ask my honourable friend to be prepared to give us, when we go into Committee, the distinction between a Canadian citizen and a Canadian subject.

HON. SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: It will depend upon the statute that uses the term.

HON. MR. DANDURAND: I once suggested to a very prominent American who had many dealings in Canada that he should take Canadian nationality as he had thrown in his lot with us. He struck an attitude and said, "Abandon my American citizenship to become a subject?" and he said it with such an appearance of indignation, that I began to pinch myself to see to what extent I felt my enslavement, and I had to explain that it was but a term, a form of speech, and that I was as proud of my Canadian citizenship as he was of his American citizenship. But I find that we have moved away from subjection to become Canadian citizens according to the Act.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

22nd April, 1921.

CANADIAN NATIONALS BILL.

Considered in Committee and Reported.

ON motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 17, an Act to define Canadian Nationals and to provide for the Renunciation of Canadian Nationality. Hon. Mr. Taylor in the chair.

ON section 1—Canadian Nationals defined:

HON. SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: I hope my honourable friend from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) has seen light since we discussed this matter yesterday.

HON. MR. BOSTOCK: I thought my honourable friend was going to give us some further information as to what a Canadian National really is.

HON. SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: I rather flattered myself that I fully explained this yesterday on the second reading of the Bill, notwithstanding the doubt expressed by some honourable gentlemen on the subject.

HON. MR. BELCOURT: I am not going to go into that question, because I am afraid that nobody can answer it satisfactorily, not even my honourable friend with all his sagacity and readiness. But what is the occasion of this Bill?

HON. SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: The occasion of the Bill is this: that in the League of Nations Treaties the word "National" has been used, and it is a term that has been made common to those who would represent what I might call the citizenship of the different members of the League. The term is what might be called a peculiarly European term. It is largely used in France, and it is used in Germany; but the interpretation from the French into English of the word used in the Treaties is somewhat difficult.

HON. MR. BELCOURT: Is it the translation of the French word "ressortissants"?

HON. SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, and the English word used is the word "National." As honourable gentlemen know, we have not used that word in any of our statutes in defining citizenship; consequently it is necessary to define what constitutes a national. A national in Canada would be a British subject in Canada, and it is desirable to so express it. On the other hand, we have used the word "citizenship" in the statutes in accordance with the particular object of the statute that deals with the term. We have used it in the Immigration Act, and a certain meaning is placed upon it, in that Act, and may be placed upon it in any other Act, because we have in view the application of the law to the citizenship so mentioned. There is nothing in this Bill to cut down the citizenship of a British subject in Canada, or the citizenship of anyone entitled to naturalization in Canada, once he is naturalized.

HON. MR. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I have been told that the necessity for this definition is that before the League of Nations Canada stands on her own feet—that a person from this country appears before the League's tribunals, not as a British subject, but as a resident of Canada, because if he appeared as a British subject he would necessarily be represented by the persons who represent the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. But we have an independent representative or representatives at the League of Nations—

HON. MR. ROCHE: Who are they?

HON. MR. LYNCH-STAUNTON:—and the people who are behind our representatives cannot appear under the name of British subjects, because if they did they would be at once told: "You are represented by the representation from the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland." So an expression must be coined for all the Dominions so that there may be an Australian National, a South African National, a Canadian National, or a British National, for the purpose of placing him behind his representation. I am told that that is the meaning of this clause: but, although I looked casually at the debates in another place, I did not see it laid down in that way. But there must be some real reason for this definition of a subject. "Les ressortissants," as I think my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) called them—the people who are entitled to the protection of the country—are those who are covered by this definition, and I cannot see that it affects our Immigration Act, either to increase or decrease, or extend or narrow, one's status. If that is the meaning of it, I should be glad to know. I am curious to understand what the real meaning of this legislation is.

HON. MR. BOSTOCK: Can the honourable gentlemen cite a case in which, for instance, anyone from Canada would appear before the League of Nations as a Canadian National? Would Sir Herbert Ames hold his position because he is a Canadian National?

HON. MR. LYNCH-STANTON: No, but when our representatives are there they may be asked, "For whom do you appear?" We do not appear for the subjects of the British Empire; we appear for a section of the subjects of the British Empire. That is all I understand from it.

HON. SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend is perfectly right in the reasons which he has given. Perhaps I can better illustrate the position in this way. It is proposed to establish an International Court of Justice, or a Court of International Justice, and it is proposed that that Court shall be made up of eleven members and, I think, four assistant members; but it is immaterial what number constitutes the Court. There is a provision that any member of the League may be appointed to this Court, but he must have a majority of the Council and a majority of the Assembly. But, Canada being an entity and a member of the League as fully as Great Britain itself, if a Canadian is elected a member of that Court of International Justice, how would you define him? What would you call him?

HON. MR. BELCOURT: A Canadian citizen.

HON. SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: Well, how would you determine that he is a Canadian? There is no such word in the statutes as a Canadian.

HON. MR. LYNCH-STANTON: Or in international law.

HON. MR. BELCOURT: Yes, the Immigration Act defines "Canadian citizen."

HON. SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: The Immigration Act simply provides for those who come within that Act.

HON. MR. BELCOURT: Oh, no; it does not provide only for them.

HON. MR. LYNCH-STANTON: But this is international, not domestic law.

HON. SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: Of course, we are taking the meaning that is in the Immigration Act, but we are passing a Bill which will be limited to the definition to be applied to "Canadian National."

HON. MR. FOWLER: Why not say "Canadian" instead of "Canadian National"? I object to having anything tacked on the name.

HON. SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: Because that is the language of the League.

HON. MR. FOWLER: I do not care anything about the language of the Treaty.

I object to being called a hyphenate. I am a Canadian. My family have lived in this country for 150 years—145 odd years—and I consider that I am a Canadian. I am no hyphenate of any sort.

HON. SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: How many hundred years did my honourable friend say he lived in this country?

HON. MR. FOWLER: I said my family have lived in this country nearly 150 years, and I think I am entitled to be called a Canadian, without anything being attached to the name.

HON. SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend overlooks the fact that we are dealing with language which is found in the Treaty, and the question is how we can meet that language and come within it.

HON. MR. FOWLER: We have helped to make that Treaty as Canadians, and I think that name is good enough.

HON. MR. BELCOURT: May I draw attention to the Immigration Act, in which will be found the definition of "Canadian citizen."

Canadian citizen means:—

(i) A person born in Canada who has not become an alien;

(ii) A British subject who has Canadian domicile; or

(iii) A person naturalized under the laws of Canada who has not subsequently become an alien or lost Canadian domicile.

It seems to me that is a complete definition, and I do not see the need for this definition unless it is for the purpose of getting a term which is exactly the same as what is used in the Treaty. But "Canadian citizen" is well defined in our statutes now.

HON. SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, yes; but it is not said there that a Canadian National, using the term in the Treaty, is the same as a Canadian citizen. We have to pass some statute to couple up those terms.

HON. MR. BELCOURT: That may be so, but I do not think there is any distinction whatever—

HON. SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: No, there is no distinction.

HON. MR. BELCOURT:—between the word "ressortissant" in French, or the word "national" in English, and the word "citizen." I do not think there is the slightest difference in the meanings of these terms; I think they are synonymous. That is why I do not quite see the necessity for this statute.

HON. MR. ROCHE: It seems to a layman that the explanation of this Bill presupposes conditions that do not exist. Canada is not national. It has not been demonstrated that it is a nation. This measure seems to be the thin edge of the wedge to have Canada recognized as a nation, when it is not one. It would give the title of "national," although every Canadian at present is only a dependent of the British Empire, and Canada is represented in the League only by allowance, and not by its own volition. It seems to me that there is involved a question which is far wider than what is implicated in this Bill.

HON. MR. BELCOURT: My honourable friend from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) said a moment ago that this Bill neither added to nor subtracted from the persons who are citizens.

HON. SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

HON. MR. BELCOURT: Yes, you are adding paragraph b. That is entirely new.

HON. SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: I was under the impression that paragraph b came within the Naturalization Act.

HON. MR. BELCOURT: That may be. I would not be sure.

Section 1 was agreed to.

On section 2—declaration renouncing Canadian nationality:

HON. MR. BELCOURT: What is meant by "any person who though born out of Canada is a Canadian national?" I do not know what that means. Perhaps it may be the case which is provided for in subsection c of section 1.

HON. MR. BOSTOCK: Exactly.

HON. MR. BELCOURT: "Any person who though born out of Canada is a Canadian national," refers to paragraph c of section 1?

HON. SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: That would come within the Naturalization Act.

HON. MR. BELCOURT: That would be the case under sub-section c?

HON. SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, I fancy that is what it means.

Section 2 was agreed to.

The schedule, the preamble, and the title were agreed to.

HON. MR. BELCOURT: I wonder how the representatives who attended the last two or three meetings obtained their qualification.

HON. SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: On the credentials of this Government, I fancy.

HON. MR. WATSON: The new "National Government."

The Bill was reported without amendment.

FOREIGN OFFICE to COLONIAL OFFICE.

[Answered by No. 53.]

Sir,

Foreign Office, S.W.1, 6th June, 1921.

WITH reference to your letter of 12th May last,* relative to the Canadian Nationality Bill, I am directed by Earl Curzon of Kedleston to state, for the information of Mr. Secretary Churchill, that, as this Bill would appear merely to give a definition of "Canadian nationals" without affecting in any way the status of such persons as British subjects, it does not affect the questions of British nationality, of the protection of British subjects abroad, of the issue of passports, etc., with which this Department is particularly concerned.

2. His Lordship has noted the statement of the Canadian Minister of Justice regarding the position of the British Empire as a member of the League of Nations, but as the whole position in regard to this question is somewhat obscure, he considers that no useful purpose could at present be served by any comment upon Mr. Doherty's statement.

3. Lord Curzon is unable to express a considered view on the first point raised in the fifth paragraph of your letter until he has received the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown. Meanwhile, however, His Lordship would observe that, if a distinction is to be made between British subjects connected with one part of the Empire and other British subjects, the existence of the double qualification of "Canadian citizen" and "Canadian national" is likely to cause complications.

4. The same consideration applies to the point raised in the sixth paragraph. In this case, however, it is improbable that serious difficulties will occur in practice, since the United States Government will presumably be indifferent to the precise quarter from which representations are made to them on behalf of any particular British subject—whether from the Canadian Minister or from His Majesty's Ambassador at Washington.

5. As regards the position of Canada under the Air Convention, His Lordship does not see what bearing the Bill can have other than to provide an absolute definition of those persons who are exclusively entitled to own aircraft in Canada and not entitled to own them in the territory of any of the other States signatories of the Convention.

I am, &c.,

R. H. CAMPBELL.

[Answered by No. 54.]

Home Office, Whitehall, 22nd June, 1921.

Sir,

I AM directed by Mr. Secretary Shortt to refer to your letters of the 12th and 21st May,† and 10th June,‡ forwarding a copy of a Bill "to define Canadian nationals and to provide for the renunciation of Canadian nationality," and copies of reports on debates on the Bill in the Canadian House of Commons and Senate, and to say that he has given very careful consideration to the Bill and desires to make the following observations.

Mr. Shortt understands that Clause 1 of the Bill, has been thought necessary by the Canadian Government in consequence of the admission of the Dominion of Canada as a member of the League of Nations, and in order to explain or facilitate the operation of the Convention relating to the Court of International Justice, and, so far as this may be the case, it does not appear to him that the clause in itself and by itself is open to much, if any, objection.

Clause 2 of the Bill, however, stands, in Mr. Shortt's opinion, in a different position. He finds it extremely difficult to realize the effect of clause 2 (a) which includes such a phrase as "a national . . . of the United Kingdom"; but, so far as this clause has any significance, it seems to embody a principle which is inconsistent with, and possibly destructive of, that Imperial nationality which it has been the object of recent legislation to establish, even though the Bill does not in terms purport to interfere with the status of a British subject under that legislation. It is to be observed that sub-clauses (a) and (b) of clause 2 are based upon, and to some extent copy, the phraseology of section 14 (1) and (2) of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914, and consequently carry the implication that the nationalities denoted by the words "national of the United Kingdom" (assuming that such a nationality exists now or at any future time) or "national of a self-governing Dominion" are in relation to Canada the nationalities of foreign States. Such a conception is, in Mr. Shortt's opinion, not one that the Home Government, or indeed the Governments of other parts of the Empire, should readily accept, and he thinks it highly undesirable that any such phrase as "national of the United Kingdom" should obtain statutory recognition for the first time in a Dominion statute.

It is to be observed that clause 2 was not in the Bill as originally introduced; and it does not seem to Mr. Shortt that it is necessary for the purpose which the Bill was intended to, or will properly, serve.

Mr. Doherty, in the debates on the Bill, indicated that he had in mind in connexion with it the proposals which have been put forward as to extra-territorial effect for Canadian legislation, and Mr. Shortt cannot but feel that in this or some other connexion the present Bill, and particularly clause 2, might form a precedent or a foundation for inconvenient developments.

If it is possible to take any steps, either by way of discussion of the question by the Prime Ministers in their present Conference or otherwise, to avoid the dangerous consequences which Mr. Shortt feels may result from provisions such as those in clause 2 of the Bill, he recommends that every endeavour should be made to this end.

I am, &c.,

JOHN PEDDER.

Sir,

WITH reference to your letter of the 10th instant,* transmitting a copy of the new Canadian "Act to define Canadian nationals," I am directed by Earl Curzon of Kedleston to transmit to you, herewith, the draft of a circular on this subject which, subject to Mr. Secretary Churchill's concurrence, His Lordship proposes to address to His Majesty's Consular Officers abroad.

Enclosure in No. 52.

(Draft.)

Sir,

Foreign Office, June, 1921.

ON 23rd May, 1921, the Governor-General of Canada assented to a Bill which had been passed by the Canadian Parliament, entitled "An Act to define Canadian nationals." A copy of the Act† is enclosed.

2. In case misapprehension may arise with regard to the effect of this Act, I have to inform you that the Act is understood to have been passed in order to regulate certain matters arising out of the position of Canada as a member of the League of Nations, and that, while defining Canadian "nationals" for this purpose, it in no way affects the status of such persons as British subjects. It consequently does not affect their treatment as regards questions of British nationality, of protection abroad, or of the issue of passports.

COLONIAL OFFICE to FOREIGN OFFICE.

Sir, Downing Street, 15th September, 1921.

I AM directed by Mr. Secretary Churchill to acknowledge the receipt of your letters of the 6th June, and of the 23rd June,* relative to the Canadian Act "to define Canadian nationals and to provide for the renunciation of Canadian nationality," and to transmit to you, for the information of Marquess Curzon of Kedleston, copies of correspondence† with the Home Office on the subject.

2. With regard to the fourth paragraph of your letter of the 6th June, I am to explain that it had not been intended to suggest by the sixth paragraph of the letter from this Department of the 12th May,‡ that any difficulty would occur with the United States Government. The question that appeared to arise was rather whether there would be any risk of confusion between His Majesty's Ambassador at Washington and the Canadian Minister if the latter expected to act for all persons coming within the definition of Canadian nationals under the Act.

3. With regard to the third paragraph of your letter, it is observed from your letter of the 21st July [? 20th July],§ that Lord Curzon would now favour the drawing up of future commercial Treaties in such a manner as to exclude British subjects connected with a non-adhering Dominion from the benefits conferred by the Treaty on British subjects generally. It is to be hoped that this step will not be necessary, but should matters come to such a pass, the question would have to be considered whether the Canadian Act affords a suitable method for ascertaining what Canadian British subjects are so to be debarred in consequence of the non-adherence of Canada.

4. The last paragraph of your letter would appear to be based on the view that the British States under the Air Convention are contracting States inter se. This view is not being adopted in this country. For example, all British subjects will be entitled to own aircraft registered in the United Kingdom, and it is not proposed in the event (which has now again become possible) of Canada having to stand out of the Convention, to regard Canadian aircraft as being debarred from flying over the British Islands under Article V. There has been no indication that the Canadian Government intend to confine the ownership of Canadian aircraft to "Canadian nationals" as defined in the Act, but if that definition includes British subjects who may be permanently connected with other parts of the Empire, it is not understood how such persons could be regarded as not entitled to own aircraft out of Canada. On the other hand, it is clear that if a corresponding definition were adopted in the British Islands for determining who is entitled to own aircraft registered in the British Islands a large number of Canadians would be so entitled.

I am, &c.,

HENRY LAMBERT.

Sir, Downing Street, 15th September, 1921.

I AM directed by Mr. Secretary Churchill to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 22nd June,|| relative to the Canadian Act "to define Canadian nationals and to provide for the renunciation of Canadian nationality."

2. Mr. Churchill notes the view taken by Mr. Secretary Shortt of section 2 (a) of this Act, but the question arises whether, if any observations offered by His Majesty's Government relative to the Act were confined to this particular provision, the inference might not be drawn that the Act was regarded by His Majesty's Government as not giving rise to difficulty in any other respect. It seems desirable therefore that before anything is said to the Canadian Government with regard to section 2 (a) a clear understanding should be reached that no reference need be made to the other provisions, especially the definition of Canadian nationals in section 1.

* Nos. 50 and 52. † Nos. 48, 51, and 54. ‡ No. 48. § No. 151 in Dominions No. 81.

3. That definition includes:—

- (a) British subjects born in Canada.
- (b) British subjects not born in Canada but having "Canadian domicile" as defined by the Immigration Act.
- (c) Children born of such fathers out of Canada.

4. In practice, occasion not infrequently arises to determine what classes of British subjects should be regarded as belonging to one part of the Empire rather than another. It is for consideration therefore whether the Canadian definition might not include British subjects permanently associated with other parts of the Empire, and further whether there would not be risk of considerable overlapping if the United Kingdom, for example, were to adopt a similar definition. The large majority of the population of the Dominions is, of course, Dominion born. It is not at present possible to state what proportion of the Dominion born would be children of fathers born in the United Kingdom, but the percentages at the Census of 1911 of persons born in the United Kingdom were:—

Australia, 13.5.

New Zealand, 22.65.

Union of South Africa, 14 (European population).

Mr. Churchill would be glad to receive any further observations which Mr. Shortt may have to offer.

5. I am also to enclose copies of correspondence* with the Foreign Office on the subject and to inquire whether Mr. Shortt concurs in the terms of the circular which the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs proposes to issue to Consular officer with regard to the Act.

6. I am further to enclose extracts from the Cape Times, of the 10th June and 7th July, from which it will be seen that the question of the Union of South Africa passing similar legislation has been raised in the Union Parliament.

Enclosure in No. 54.

(Extract from Cape Times, 11th June, 1921.)

Union House of Assembly, 10th June, 1921.

DEALING with the census returns, Dr. Malan expressed gratification that the Department of the Interior had provided a column in which the person filling in the form could describe himself as being of South African nationality. He complained, however, of the confusion between race and nationality on the forms. He asked that the example of Canada should be followed so that a clear definition should be given of what was South African nationality. A Canadian going abroad was always a Canadian, and he desired the same to apply to South Africans.

STATEMENT BY MR. DUNCAN, MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR, IN UNION HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY, 6TH JULY, 1921.

(Extract from Cape Times, 7th July.)

South African Nationality.

IN regard to the question of South African nationality, he had not been able to find the Canadian law to which Dr. Malan referred, and in which he said that Canada had defined Canadian nationality.

DR. MALAN: It was passed this year.

MR. DUNCAN: I will look into the matter. I hope next year to be able to introduce a Naturalization Act for the Union, and I will look into the Canadian Act and see how far we can adopt what has been done there.

[Answered by No. 57.]

SIR, Home Office, Whitehall, 18th October, 1921.
I AM directed by Mr. Secretary Shortt to refer to your letter of the 15th ultimo* and previous correspondence relative to the Canadian Act to define Canadian nationals and to say that he has the following observations to offer as regards the further points raised by Mr. Churchill.

While he fully concurs with Mr. Churchill's view that any practical difficulties to which section 1 may lead—including the points referred to in paragraph 4 of your letter—should not be lost sight of in any representations which are made to the Canadian Government on the subject of this Act, Mr. Shortt is inclined to think that the substantial basis for any criticism of the measure as a whole is to be found in the considerations put forward in his letter of 22nd June last.† Indeed it appears to Mr. Shortt that the unfortunate consequences of the precipitate action of the Canadian Government in passing an Act of this character without previous consultation with His Majesty's Government and the Self-Governing Dominions are well illustrated by the anomalous character of the provisions of Section 2. As Mr. Churchill is aware that section was introduced into this Act as an after-thought during the Committee stage in the Canadian House of Commons in order (inter alia) to make it possible for a "Canadian national" to discard his Canadian "nationality" by reason of his residence outside Canada or by reason of the acquisition by him of the "nationality" of some other Dominion in the Empire or of the United Kingdom. It is indeed evident that Mr. Doherty, who was in charge of the Bill, foresaw and endeavoured to obviate by means of Section 2 the risk of overlapping in the event of the adoption of similar legislation in other self-Governing Dominions (see especially Mr. Doherty's reply to Mr. Copp, Report of Debate page 26‡ (top).

The prospect of the adoption of a similar Act by the Union Government of South Africa, as indicated in the extracts from the Cape Times which accompanied your letter, lends, in Mr. Shortt's view, additional force to the considerations urged in his previous letter and increases the importance of emphasizing the view that this Act is prejudicial to the essential unity which it has been the object of recent Imperial nationality laws to establish.

I am to add that Mr. Shortt thinks it very desirable in any correspondence with Canada or any other Dominion not to suggest the existence of any likelihood that the Home Government will seek to define by legislation what constitutes a "national" of the United Kingdom. So far as Mr. Shortt is aware, there is no necessity for any such measure and he hopes it may never come to pass.

Mr. Shortt suggests for Mr. Churchill's consideration that it should be indicated in any representations made to the Canadian Government on the subject of the Act that it is emphatically a matter which could usefully be discussed at an Imperial Conference with a view to arriving at an agreement (in consultation with the other Self-Governing Dominions) as to a form of definition which would be free from the objections which have been raised to the present Act.

I am to add that Mr. Shortt concurs in the terms of the circular§ which the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs proposes to issue to Consular Officers with regard to the Canadian Act.

FOLLOWING telegram from your Prime Minister was brought to me to-day by Perley.

Begins:—Confidential. From many sources it has been made clear to the Government that a special Canadian representative at Washington should be immediately appointed. Lord Northcliffe is strongly of this opinion, and urged it in most emphatic terms. War conditions have brought about the necessity of prompt and immediate communication with the United States Government in respect of our affairs. The multiplicity of Departments and Commissions at Washington leads to disastrous delay if negotiations are conducted through the Embassy, which is overwhelmed with a multitude of important matters not directly concerning Canada. I propose, therefore, to appoint Hazen, and to give him the designation of High Commissioner or some suitable title. In matters that may concern the whole Empire he will, of course, consult with the Embassy, but in matters solely touching our affairs he would communicate with the United States Government and its various Commissions. As the appointment will be made without delay, I shall be glad to receive immediately any observation of the Colonial Secretary.—Ends.

Question brought by me before Cabinet this morning. Full importance of it, of course, realised by them. I understand, however, that the appointment is only for the War, and that future arrangements will still be open to consideration. I suggest that it would be desirable in the interests of the Dominion, as well as ours, and especially having regard to what passed between your Prime Minister and myself during his recent visit, that Mr. Hazen should be attached to the Embassy in Washington, while, of course, full control over him would be retained by the Dominion Government.—LONG.

19TH OCTOBER. Your telegram, 16th October,* as to Canadian representation at Washington. Prime Minister says that conference during his recent visit contemplated appointment of an official who might properly be attached to Embassy, rather than an important representative in the Government, who should have recognized diplomatic status in respect of matters directly and solely concerning Canadian interests. Prime Minister fears that having regard to Hazen's position during past three years, as member of Cabinet, his attachment to Embassy would be liable to misconstruction, and that there is every reason to believe that it would not be congenial to Hazen himself. As under the conditions which you suggest it would be most difficult, and probably impossible, having regard to public opinion in this country, to secure services of any person possessing the necessary status, Prime Minister earnestly hopes that you will accept this view of situation. Proposed appointment is for period of the War, after which whole question must be carefully reconsidered. Prime Minister would be grateful if purport of above could be communicated to High Commissioner for Canada.—DEVONSHIRE.

SECRET. Canadian Commissioner. It is essential in a matter of such importance there should be no misunderstanding as to what is proposed, and, on reflection, I think there may possibly be misapprehension on both sides due to difficulty of discussion by telegraph. On the one hand, I read Prime Minister's proposal in your telegram, October 19th,† for a Canadian representative at Washington with recognized diplomatic status, but not attached to Embassy, as meaning that such representative would be both technically, and in practice, independent of Embassy. But any political unit can have only one Embassy, however it may be composed, at a foreign capital, and if this were the correct meaning of the Prime Minister's proposal it seemed to me to be incompatible with the unity of the British Empire in its relations with a foreign State. If such a step were taken in respect of Canada it would almost certainly be followed in regard to other Dominions, and resultant position would be, I think, equivalent to a break up of the Empire as at present constituted. I am convinced that Borden would scout any action likely to produce such a result, and I think it quite possible that he has misunderstood the word "attach" in my telegram October 16th,† and on supposition that I contemplated putting the

* No. 58. † No. 59.

Commissioner in the position of an ordinary "attaché" was indicating the objections to that course. That was not at all the idea of the Cabinet here. They recognize, as I have long done, that it is desirable that Canada should have a representative at Washington who could settle with that Government matters of local interest, and their only point was that he should be regarded as part of His Majesty's Embassy, thereby preserving Empire unity in a foreign State. It should not be difficult to arrange this consistently with giving a marked status to the Commissioner, and it occurs to me that this could best be settled by personal conference with our Ambassador if he could find time for a visit to Ottawa. If this commends itself to Borden, I would try to arrange accordingly.

If, however, the above does not meet with his views, I should be greatly obliged if he would telegraph an exact statement of what he proposes both as to the status of his representative and the mode of accrediting him to the United States Government. Pending his reply I will defer a further reference to the Cabinet, as they can hardly give proper consideration to the matter until they have information before them.

Please communicate this telegram to Borden.—LONG.

1ST NOVEMBER. Your telegram, Secret, of 26th October,* Canadian Commissioner. Prime Minister communicates following:—

Begins:—For many years questions of great importance between Canada and the United States respecting disputes as to management of international fishery waters, the delimitation of international boundary waters, and many other subjects have been disposed of with excellent results by Commissioners appointed by the two Governments or by conferences between the United States and Canadian officials. Canadian Food Controller, Fuel Controller, and Board of Grain Supervisors at present confer directly with corresponding Boards in United States, and quick and efficient co-operation is secured thereby. I am not aware that any constitutional objections have been, or could be, urged to these methods of procedure. They have developed naturally by adopting direct and businesslike means of communication and ignoring old forms which have lost their meaning. It is vitally important that such development should continue. Canada has now practically same population as inhabited British Isles during early Napoleonic Wars, and double the population with which United States commenced national career. Her relations with United States are of most important and intimate character, and commercial and business relations between the two countries are naturally closer than those between United Kingdom and United States. Lord Bryce told us that in his time three-quarters of work of Embassy related to Canada, and this ratio will probably be maintained. Yet Canada has hitherto had no representation on Embassy nor in any permanent direct way. Her interests have thus sometimes suffered from lack of information or oversight. Obviously this situation cannot continue. My proposal involves a suitable and dignified status for Canada's representative, but there is no desire that anything in the nature of a separate Embassy should be created. After discussion with Ambassador, who is in Ottawa, I am convinced that there will be no insurmountable difficulty in accomplishing this. Hazen will probably visit Washington in immediate future, and before appointment. The Ambassador informs us that owing to needs of United States Departments and Commissions provision of suitable accommodation will be very difficult. Ends.—DEVONSHIRE.

3RD OCTOBER. My advisers have arrived at conclusion that distinctive representation of Canada at Washington should be delayed no longer, and they refer to correspondence which has taken place since 13th October, 1917.* If my advisers are correctly informed, the consideration of questions between the United States and Canada and necessary action thereon constituted two-thirds or three-quarters of the work at the Embassy prior to the War. After the conclusion of peace the same condition will probably arise in most cases; these questions concern purely Canadian interests, and often they were approached without the exact information which should have been available. Selection of personnel of the Embassy's staff has always been without consultation with Government of Canada, and apparently with no special regard to their acquaintance with Canadian interests or conditions. A strong feeling has thus arisen in this country that effective steps should be taken to safeguard more thoroughly Canadian interests in Washington. The two countries adjoin upon a boundary line nearly 4,000 miles in length, and commercial and social intercourse are increasing constantly. My advisers refer, as an illustration, to trade conditions during five years periods from 1900 to 1919 inclusive. During first period total trade between United Kingdom and Canada was 836,000,000 dollars, between the United States and Canada 932,000,000 dollars, and between all South American countries and United States 765,000,000 dollars. Corresponding figures in the second period were 1,967,000,000 dollars, 1,262,000,000 dollars, and 1,114,000,000 dollars. Figures in the third period were 432,000,000 dollars, 2,318,000,000 dollars, and 1,639,000,000 dollars. The figures in the fourth period are 3,273,000,000 dollars, 4,483,000,000 dollars, and 3,585,000,000 dollars. The total trade between United States and Canada exceeds, it will be observed, that of United States and all South American countries, and also by a considerable margin exceeds total trade between the United Kingdom and Canada. My advisers have no doubt, having regard to these facts, as to the necessity for distinctive representation. They are desirous of accomplishing it upon lines which will maintain, and even emphasize, the solidarity of the Empire, but which give to this country the distinctive representation which constitutional development in recent years both sanctions and demands. They therefore propose that such representation should be established upon the following lines, which express conclusions to be embodied in Order in Council:—

* See Nos. 58 to 62.

Begins.—1. Dominion of Canada shall be represented by diplomatic agent in United States, duly accredited to the President of the United States, to reside at Washington in the character of Envoy Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary for Canada.

2. Canadian Minister shall be appointed by, and be directly responsible to, the Canadian Government. He shall receive his instructions from, and shall report to, Secretary of State, External Affairs.

3. Subject to an agreement to be made with the United States Government, Canadian diplomatic establishment at Washington, under direction of the Canadian Minister, shall constitute a part of the establishment of His Majesty's Embassy. —1

4. In matters between United States and His Majesty in respect of the Dominion of Canada, Canadian Ministers shall conduct negotiations and be channel of communication at Washington.

5. In all matters between His Majesty's Embassy and the Canadian Government Canadian Minister shall hereafter be channel of communication.

6. With the object of promoting the most complete co-operation and unity of purpose effective arrangements to be agreed upon between Canadian Minister and His Majesty's Ambassador shall be made for continuous consultation in all important matters of common concern, and for such necessary concerted action (?) after consultation as they may determine. They shall refer to their respective Governments for settlement any matter which they may be unable to adjust by consultation between themselves.

7. In particular such forms and mode of procedure shall be agreed upon as will prevent embarrassment or confusion on the part of United States Government in respect of channel of subsequent communication.

8. Further negotiations at Washington of matters now pending between United States and Canada shall be conducted by, and through, Canadian Minister.

—Ends.

The matter is somewhat urgent, as the Canadian War Mission at Washington has been practically closed. My advisers hope that they may be favoured with views of His Majesty's Government with as little delay as possible.

Your telegram 3rd October.* Proposal of your Ministers has been most carefully considered by Cabinet. We recognize fully that demand for distinctive representation of Canada in His Majesty's Embassy at Washington is justified by importance of Canadian business at Washington, and closeness of relationship between States and Canada. At the same time we cordially reciprocate your desire that such distinctive representation should take a form which would maintain and emphasize solidarity of Empire and provide well-balanced protection of Canadian and Imperial interests in United States.

We think it very desirable from this point of view to secure the position of the representative of Canada as part of establishment of Embassy, and to preserve closest connexion between him and Ambassador, so that there may be constant interchange of views on matters of common concern. The most convenient and suitable method of carrying out this object would be, in our opinion, for Government of Canada to recommend, and for His Majesty to appoint, a Minister Plenipotentiary who would be next in rank in Embassy to the Ambassador, and have charge of Canadian affairs, and conduct them with the Government of United States acting upon instructions from, and reporting direct to, Government of Canada. He should take his place at the Embassy as Minister in charge of Canadian affairs, and

* No. 63.

Government of United States should be formally apprised of his appointment by official letter from Secretary of State accrediting Canadian Minister and empowering him to conduct Canadian affairs with Government of the United States direct. In absence of Ambassador, Embassy would be in charge of Canadian Minister. Solidarity of Empire would in this way be maintained and emphasized, which could hardly be the case if diplomatic agent for the Dominion of Canada were accredited to President of United States independently.

It would be essential, in order to carry out this policy, that Minister should reside at and have his office within precincts of Embassy, and that his Canadian staff, appointed like himself on the recommendation of the Government of Canada, should have diplomatic status and be regarded as part of diplomatic staff of His Majesty's Embassy, with rank equivalent to that of their British colleagues of corresponding grades. It will be necessary to find another site upon which suitable buildings can be raised, as the present Embassy House is inadequate for the purpose.

We confidently hope that above proposals will meet the views of Dominion Government. Should, however, experience show necessity for further modifications to meet altered conditions and new status of Dominions, there will be an opportunity for full discussion of this subject at the contemplated conference to be held next year on the Constitution of the Empire. Meanwhile, a beginning could at once be made by establishment of Canadian branch of Embassy at Washington, as above suggested.—MILNER.

19TH DECEMBER. My advisers have given careful consideration to your telegram of 28th October,* and they observe that so far as practical result is concerned, namely, adequate representation of Canadian interests at Washington under the control of the Canadian Government, your proposal does not differ in substance from that put forward in my telegram of 3rd October.†

Regarding the question of form, my advisers point out that they were simply concerned that in the diplomatic corps in Washington Canadian representative should have precedence on the same basis as the Ministers of other countries resident there. They now understand from formal [informal] conversations at Embassy that this result will follow under the arrangement proposed in your telegram.

Also considered that some method should be devised whereby Canadian Government would participate formally and directly in the issuance of the letter accrediting Canadian Minister Plenipotentiary to the United States Government. This purpose might be accomplished by a letter from Secretary of State for External Affairs of Canada, accompanied by a covering letter from Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. On this point my advisers would be glad to have views of His Majesty's Government.

Subject to these observations they will be glad to proceed on the lines suggested, but before making an appointment they request an answer to the points above raised.

My advisers agree entirely with your suggestion that the proposed arrangement should be regarded as open to review if experience should disclose necessity for alteration to meet new status of the Dominion.—DEVONSHIRE.

There will be no room, therefore, for a letter from either the Canadian or British Secretary of State, but the King's letter might state that he has judged it expedient to confer the rank of Minister-Plenipotentiary upon X. (this being the formula usual in such cases), and go on with a phrase inserted ad hoc and running "and to attach him to our Embassy to the United States of America with the especial object (or duty) of dealing with matters affecting the interests of our Dominion of Canada." 23RD FEBRUARY. Your two telegrams, 5th February,* regarding Canadian representation at Washington. We cannot help thinking with regard to phrase proposed by your Ministers for insertion in the King's letter accrediting new Minister that this would suggest an inherent division in the representation of the policy of the British Empire which your Government are as anxious as ourselves to avoid, and which would be hardly consistent with the arrangement agreed upon whereby with a view to emphasizing the unity of the Empire for diplomatic purposes the Canadian representative is not only a member of the Embassy but, in the Ambassador's absence, actually takes control of it and of the whole representation of Imperial policy at Washington. Your telegram of 2nd February,* my telegram of 30th December [20th February],† Canadian representation at Washington. Following is statement Canadian Government wish to be made in Canadian and British Parliaments simultaneously. Subject to your suggestions they propose statement should be made as soon as United States Government have formally agreed to new arrangement.

Begins.—"As the result of recent discussions an arrangement had been concluded between British and Canadian Governments to provide Canadian diplomatic representation at Washington. Need for this important step has been fully realized on both hands for some time. For a good many years there has been direct communication between Ottawa and Washington, but the constantly increasing importance of Canadian interests in United States had made it apparent that, in addition, Canada should be represented there in some distinctive manner, for this would doubtless tend to expedite negotiations, and naturally first-hand acquaintance with Canadian conditions would promote good understanding. In view of peculiarly close relations that have always existed between people of Canada and those of United States it is confidently expected as well that this new step will have the very desirable result of maintaining and strengthening the friendly relations and co-operation between British Empire and United States.

"Accordingly it has been agreed that His Majesty, on the advice of his Canadian Ministers, shall appoint a Minister Plenipotentiary who will have charge of Canadian affairs and conduct them direct with the United States Government, acting on instructions from, and reporting direct to, Canadian Government. He will be accredited by His Majesty to the President with the necessary powers for the purpose. In order to preserve closest connexion between him and the Ambassador, Canadian representative will be part of establishment of Embassy, so that there may be constant interchange of views on matters of common concern. To this end also Canadian Minister will reside, and have his office, within the precincts of Embassy, and his Canadian staff, appointed, like himself, on the advice of Canadian Ministry, will have diplomatic status and be regarded as part of diplomatic staff of His Majesty's Embassy, with rank equivalent to that of their British colleagues' corresponding rank. In the absence of Ambassador, Canadian Minister will take charge of whole of Embassy and of representation of Imperial as well as Canadian interests.

"As the present Embassy is not adequate for the purpose it will be necessary to find another site on which suitable buildings can be raised.

"It is understood that this arrangement will be regarded as open to review if experience should disclose necessity for alteration.

"It need only be added that, in accordance with usual rule in such matters, United States Government has been consulted and that it has given the proposal a cordial welcome."—Ends.

With reference to my telegram 24th February* regarding Canadian representation at Washington you will now have received from Mr. Lindsay copy of his telegram of the 4th March, No. 172, to Foreign Office.† I should be glad to receive your Ministers' observations on the suggestion of the Acting Secretary of State of United States as reported in that telegram.

The following is the text of two Foreign Office telegrams to which Mr. Lindsay's telegram replies:—

First telegram begins: No. 208. Please make following communication to Government of United States:

In view of importance of relations between United States and Canada, His Majesty's Government have been in communication with Canadian Government for some time with the object of providing for more complete representation than has hitherto existed of Canadian interests at Washington. In view of constant increase, which will no doubt be maintained in future, in commercial and social intercourse between Canada and United States, such a development seems clearly desirable. To meet this situation a representative with the rank of Minister Plenipotentiary, selected by the Canadian Government, is about to be appointed to deal with Canadian affairs: he will be a member of the Embassy staff. That the introduction of this system, designed as it is to facilitate the transaction of business between the United States and Canada, will be acceptable to Government of United States His Majesty's Government have no doubt. It is proposed to announce at an early date introduction of new system both in Ottawa and here. End of first telegram.

Second telegram begins: No. 209. In explanation of my immediately preceding telegram No. 208, you may add verbally that introduction of new system will not denote any departure, either on the part of Canadian Government or of His Majesty's Government from principle of diplomatic unity of British Empire. New Minister will rank immediately after the Ambassador in Embassy, and will take charge in latter's absence. He will, however, be ordinary channel of communication at all times in matters of purely Canadian interest. He will receive credentials from the King direct as in case of His Majesty's Minister at Paris.

Statement on this subject will have to be made shortly in Parliament, and as a matter of courtesy to Government of United States we should be glad to receive their concurrence as soon as possible. End of second telegram.

† The terms of this telegram were as follows:—

No. 172. Canadian representation at Washington. Your telegrams No. 208; and No. 209.† I have addressed Note to State Department in sense of above telegrams.

Acting Secretary of State spoke to me to-day on Canadian representation in a purely private manner. He felt sure that from practical point of view it would be most valuable and welcome to State Department. He himself was most anxious to do all he could to facilitate it. One difficulty he foresaw was that other British Dominions would presumably require same privileges, but that was our, and not his, difficulty. More serious was the question of giving a corresponding status to American representative in Canada. He could understand that objections might be raised to that, but anticipated that it might cause difficulties. He thought that special credentials of Canadian representative might cause questions to arise, but he did not lay stress on it, understanding that there are precedents, and that point is one of (gr. undec.) importance. He was inclined to think proposal might be started more easily if United States Government were not formally asked to give their approval, and if Canadian representative were to arrive in America and be presented in his rank and status by Ambassador. I said I would ask your views on this point. Please instruct.

On point of precedence, that is, that Canadian representative should rank after Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary but before other Chargés d'Affaires and Counsellors of Embassy not having rank of Minister, he did not anticipate any difficulty.

His observations were purely personal, and he is not yet ready to give an official answer, but he made it clear that he was most anxious to be helpful.

WITH reference to your telegram 16th March* regarding Canadian representation at Washington, in view of what is stated in Mr. Lindsay's telegram 12th March, No. 191, to Foreign Office as to desirability of reaching early settlement it is suggested by Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs that Government of Canada may think it advisable to send at an early date responsible statesman to Washington to discuss matter with Mr. Polk and Mr. Lindsay with a view to arriving at a procedure satisfactory to all parties for announcing the new appointment.

* No. 75. † No. 69.

No. 191. My telegram No. 172. I asked the Acting Secretary of State about the question of Canadian representation. He said that he had been thinking of it and had not yet even submitted it to the President. He was more than before inclined to think that the best course would be to send representative and not ask for the approval of State Department. He was anxious to avoid committing Department to approval of any action which could be construed by anyone as involving principle of a separation in the representation of the Empire. He foresaw that they would press here on United States Government to send diplomatic representatives to other Dominions, and very possibly, too, to Ireland. To some extent these difficulties concerned only His Majesty's Government, but he feared they might give rise to situation which would affect the good relations between the two Governments.

I asked him, as a personal suggestion, how it would be if Embassy were to inform State Department that a Minister was about to be appointed to the Embassy under the Ambassador (group undecipherable) Canada and who (group undecipherable) naturally would take charge of Canadian affairs: that a statement to that effect was about to be made in Parliament, and inquiring whether State Department would object to this procedure. He replied that this was a different thing to what was contained in my Note to him based on your telegram No. 208 and your telegram No. 20 (29)† in which concurrence in proposed appointment of the United States was requested. He did not commit himself to any view, but said he would have to refer such a Note to the President.

I think it would be advisable to get this matter settled as soon as possible. Appointment of Mr. Colby as Secretary of State has not yet been confirmed by Senate, but I do not think action by them can be postponed indefinitely. It is likely that Mr. Colby would be less inclined than Mr. Polk to avoid Anglo-American (?difficulties).

No. 79.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE to THE ACTING GOVERNOR-GENERAL.

(Confidential.)

SIR,

Downing Street, 22nd March, 1920.

WITH reference to the Governor-General's telegram of the 5th February,* I have the honour to transmit to Your Excellency, to be laid before your Ministers, the accompanying documents which have been prepared at the Foreign Office in connexion with the proposed appointment of a Canadian Minister at Washington.

A. Draft of credentials.

B. Draft form of letter notifying the new Minister of his appointment.

C. Suggested points of instructions for the new Minister.

2. Draft A would be prepared for the King's signature, and the first paragraph has been drafted in accordance with the understanding reached with your Government on the subject. The second paragraph is in the usual form.

3. Drafts B and C would be issued by your Government. In the ordinary course a Minister is simply notified of his appointment, as indicated in draft B. The letter continues by informing the Minister of the salary and allowances attached to his post, and, in ordinary circumstances, concludes by calling attention to the regulation under which the appointment may not exceed, though it may be less than, five years. It is not known what salary and allowances are proposed by your Government, nor whether they intend the contemplated appointment to be for a fixed period.

As regards draft C, this paper contains the principal points on which it is thought that your Government may consider it desirable to issue formal instructions to the new Minister. There is no regular form which would be suitable in the present case, but it is thought that the suggestions made might be of use to your Government in preparing any general instructions to the Minister which they may desire to issue.

I have, &c.,

L. S. AMERY.

Enclosure 1 in No. 79.

A: DRAFT CREDENTIALS.

GEORGE, by the Grace of God, etc., to the President of the United States of America, Sendeth Greeting!

Our Good Friend!

We have judged it expedient to confer the rank of Minister Plenipotentiary upon and to attach him to Our Embassy to the United States of America with the especial object of representing the interests of Our Dominion of Canada.

We request that you will give entire credence to all that Mr. may represent to you in Our Name, especially when he shall assure you of Our esteem and regard, and of Our hearty wishes for the welfare and prosperity of the United States of America.

And so we commend you to the protection of the Almighty.

Given at Our Court of St. James, etc.,

Your good friend,

GEORGE R.I.

(Counter-signature of Secretary of State.)

Enclosure 2 in No. 79.

B: DRAFT FORM OF LETTER NOTIFYING HIS MAJESTY'S MINISTER AT WASHINGTON OF HIS APPOINTMENT.

SIR,

I HAVE to inform you that the King has been graciously pleased to appoint you to be His Majesty's Minister Plenipotentiary at Washington, and to attach you to His Embassy to the United States of America with the especial object of representing the interests of His Dominion of Canada.

[The letter would continue by stating the salary and allowances attached to the post, and the duration of the appointment, if for a fixed term of years.]

* No. 69.

K

Enclosure 3 in No. 79.

C: SUGGESTED POINTS OF INSTRUCTIONS FOR HIS MAJESTY'S MINISTER AT WASHINGTON.

In the case of an appointment of a special nature, such as the present, special instructions are usually given. In the case under consideration, the main points which it seems desirable to cover are the following:—

1. Nature of Appointment and Powers.—The instructions would begin by informing the appointee of his position (Minister Plenipotentiary), and of his special duties, the representation of the interests of the Dominion of Canada. It is understood that the Dominion Government contemplate the issue of an Order in Council defining these points. If this is done, reference to the Order might be made in this part of the instructions, and a copy annexed thereto. It would probably also be desirable to add that the Minister will be attached to His Majesty's Embassy at Washington.

2. Relations with the United States.—A paragraph should be inserted to the effect that the Minister will be expected to do all which may be convenient and proper to strengthen and improve the friendship and good relations at present happily existing between the British Empire and the United States.

The remainder of the instructions might properly be devoted to drawing the attention of the Minister to points of special interest to the Dominion Government. The principal matters of general interest falling within the ordinary duties of a Minister are the following:—

3. Treaties.—The Dominion Government should be kept informed of any proposals on the part of the United States for entering into new Treaties or other engagements with other countries, or for altering or extending old ones. Copies of all Treaties, etc., entered into between the United States and other countries should be sent to Canada.

4. General Policy.—The fullest information obtainable with regard to the external policy and internal politics of the country of residence should be regularly forwarded.

5. Relations with the Diplomatic Corps.—Formal instructions might contain a paragraph with regard to the desirability of maintaining friendly intercourse with the Ministers of other countries resident in Washington.

6. Commerce.—A paragraph might be inserted instructing the Minister that the promotion of commerce constitutes one of the objects of his mission, and that he should give due support and assistance to Canadian British subjects trading with or residing in the United States.

7. Finance.—Regular reports should be forwarded on public finance, in the same way as on matters of general policy.

8. Communications.—The general instructions would ordinarily contain directions as to the Departments of the Dominion Government to which the Minister is to report, and, if reports are to be sent to more than one Department in what way the division is to be made.

9. Matters of Immediate Interest.—In the event of the Minister being required to undertake special negotiations on any particular subject, which is not of a nature permanently falling within his duties, such negotiations might be referred to briefly in the general instructions, with an intimation that special instructions on the subject would be given. This might apply to, e.g., any pending questions relating to fisheries.

10. Accounts.—The general instructions might state shortly to what Department the Minister is liable for rendering his accounts.

CANADIAN representation Washington. With regard to form of public announcement suggested in your telegram 4th March* Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs asks that words "reside and" in paragraph 2 and whole of paragraph 3 may be omitted. It would be quite impossible in fact for the new Minister to reside in the present Embassy, and if there is to be any hope of buying a new site at a reasonable price it will be advisable that all reference to question of residence or necessity of building new Embassy be omitted.

As regards the remainder of the statement other than the last paragraph, we think that the following alterations, if acceptable to your Government, would be improvement. For phrase "to provide for Canadian diplomatic representation at Washington" read phrase in Foreign Office telegram No. 208 of 26th February† to Washington, viz.: "to provide for more complete representation of Canadian interests at Washington than has hitherto existed" and instead of the phrase "conduct them direct with United States Government" read phrase in Foreign Office telegram No. 209 of 26th February‡ to Washington "will at all times be the ordinary channel of communication with the United States Government in matters of purely Canadian interest." It is also suggested for the consideration of your Government that it would be well to add sentence as to maintenance of the principle of diplomatic unity of Empire in the sense of the remark made in Foreign Office telegram to Washington No. 209 of 26th February.†—SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES.

understanding is that Canadian Minister who is to be appointed Minister Plenipotentiary should, in accordance with his rank as Minister Plenipotentiary, have precedence in diplomatic corps. Analogous cases are Saxony and Bavaria before the War, since these States maintained Ministers at European Courts concurrently with Ambassadors of the German Empire.

If State Department should not wish to make formal ruling giving precedence to Canadian Minister with the Ministers of other countries they could in the last resort perhaps reach the same result by intimating that they would, as a matter of practice, accord such precedence without calling special attention to it. In view, however, of question being possibly raised in future by Ministers of other countries, it would be much preferable to have formal agreement.

These cases were, however, really survivals from a state of previous political separation and Legations were entirely separate from, and unconnected with, Embassy. These German States also retained foreign representatives at their capitals. 7TH MAY. Questions which have recently been raised in your House of Commons and other public speculations regarding Canadian representation at Washington have a tendency to suggest that the Canadian Minister will be subordinate to the Ambassador. In order to prevent misunderstanding in the future Canadian Government accordingly consider it desirable to make clear their understanding of the effect of the arrangement.

It is true Canadian Minister will be next in rank to the Ambassador in the sense that in diplomatic body he will be a member of a lower class or rank; but it is obvious that he cannot be a subordinate taking instructions from Ambassador since he will be responsible to, and take his instructions from, the Canadian Government.

* See No. 88. † No. 85.

As indicated in my telegram 3rd October,* and yours of 28th October,† the two representatives will work together through methods of consultation and constant interchange of views, and any matter which they may be unable to adjust by this method will be referred for settlement to their respective Governments, though this it is anticipated need rarely happen.

You will have seen from Mr. Lindsay's telegrams|| of 4th April and 5th April to Foreign Office that some difficulty was encountered in Washington on the question of precedence dealt with in my telegram of 1st April,‡ and in previous correspondence. You will see from my telegram of 20th December§ that Canadian Government accepted proposal of His Majesty's Government of 28th October as not differing in substance from Canadian proposal of 3rd October, and on clear understanding that the Canadian Minister should have precedence on same basis as Ministers of other countries resident at Washington. My Ministers do not consider it necessary to make further representations of this to Washington at the moment, as they do not anticipate that any real difficulty will arise in actual practice, but in order that there may be no doubt, should question arise in the future, they do think that it would be wise that it should be stated now.

* No. 63. † No. 64. ‡ No. 82. § No. 66.

No. 245. Your telegram No. 296. I arranged a conference between Mr. Rowell, Canadian Minister, and Mr. Polk, of State Department. After hearing Mr. Polk's views announcement is proposed which is given in my immediately succeeding telegram.

Phrases omitted from draft announcement as approved by you have been cut out at Mr. Polk's suggestion, as being either implied in first paragraph or as being matters of domestic arrangement which he thought had better not appear in formal announcement.

Before this announcement is made Mr. Polk will take matter up informally with Secretary of State, and I expect will be able to give me assurance that such an announcement will not be unacceptable to United States.

Only point upon which there appears to be real difficulty is that of precedence. Canadian Government is very strongly of view that Canadian representative should have such a rank as would entitle him to precedence according to date of appointment with Ministers of other countries. Mr. Polk's view is that Canadian representative as Minister plenipotentiary would be entitled to precedence only after ministers of other countries, as these ministers are all envoys extraordinary as well as ministers plenipotentiary. He also suggests there might be technical difficulties on State occasions, such as inauguration, in recognizing more than one representative of British Empire, but feels that in actual practice probably no difficulty would arise, and his view is that it is better not to cross bridges before we come to them, and that, if new Minister entered upon performance of his duties, present apparent difficulties would probably vanish.

Polk is still of opinion that it would be better if we did not formally request United States Government to approve arrangement. He will therefore treat my Note of 27th February as a verbal communication returning text of it to me, and after taking matter up with Secretary of State and President, will let me know whether principle of Canadian representative at Washington is agreed to.

Mr. Rowell will report present situation to Canadian Government, who will inform Colonial Office of course of procedure which, in their opinion, ought now to be taken.

Mr. Rowell is cabling Mr. Christie, who is now in London, with reference to matter, and he is requesting him to discuss points raised in this cable with you and Secretary of State for the Colonies.

No. 246. As a result of recent discussions an arrangement has been concluded between British and Canadian Governments to provide more complete representation at Washington of Canadian interests than has hitherto existed. Accordingly it has been agreed that His Majesty, on advice of his Canadian Ministers, shall appoint a Minister plenipotentiary who will have charge of Canadian affairs, and will at all times be ordinary channel of communication with United States Government in matters of purely Canadian concern, acting upon instruction from, and reporting direct to, Canadian Government. In absence of Ambassador, Canadian Minister will take charge of whole Embassy and of representation of Imperial, as well as Canadian, interests. He will be accredited by His Majesty to the President with necessary powers for that purpose.

This new arrangement will not denote any departure either on the part of British Government or of Canadian Government from principle of diplomatic unity of British Empire.

Need for this important step has been fully realized by both Governments for some time. For a good many years there has been direct communication between Washington and Ottawa, but the constantly increasing importance of Canadian interests in United States had made it apparent that Canada should be represented there in some distinctive manner, for this would doubtless tend to expedite negotiations, and naturally first hand acquaintance with Canadian conditions would promote good understanding. In view of peculiarly close relations that have always existed between people of Canada and those of United States, it is confidently expected as well that this new step will have very desirable result of maintaining and strengthening friendly relations and co-operation between British Empire and United States.

No. 251. My telegram No. 245. I understand Colonial Office suggested to Canadian Government that question of Canadian representation should stand over until arrival of Ambassador. I think, however, it was as well that Canadian Minister came here immediately. As things have turned out, the matter was not so much a negotiation with United States Government as an opportunity for a Canadian Minister to hear the unofficial views of Mr. Polk, and, in view of latter's approaching resignation, there is no certainty of such an opportunity occurring three weeks hence.

As to terms and method of announcing decision arrived at between His Majesty's Government and Canadian Government, all Mr. Polk's (? view) was in direction of urging that statement to be made should, so far as possible, make it appear that Canadian Members of (? Embassy) are to be undistinguished from British staff, or, at any rate, such that State Department should be able to maintain that, so far as they were concerned, such was the case. My own language to Mr. Rowell was openly and avowedly in same sense. Mr. Rowell quite appreciated the reasons for this point of view, but (? from his omitted) knowledge of Canadian public opinion was naturally unable to accept (? all his) suggestions. Text we finally telegraphed to you was acquiesced in by Mr. Polk, who will, after consulting Secretary of State and President, inform me semi-officially whether United States Government have any objection to procedure indicated. Statement does not, in my opinion, entirely obviate the danger of intrigues being started here to have a United States Minister appointed at Ottawa, or otherwise to bring about a schism in the Empire or its representation, but, judging by Mr. Rowell's full appreciation of these dangers and his anxiety to avoid them, I imagine it to be not less than the minimum that would satisfy Canadian opinion.

On question of precedence of Canadian representative there was great difficulty. Mr. Polk was very frank on the difficulty the United States Government would have in according him the rank accorded to Envoys representing independent States, though he was quite willing to examine any precedents to enable him to receive higher precedence than that accorded to Ministers Plenipotentiary, that is, immediately after Envoys Extraordinary. Doubtless you will discuss with Mr. Christie how far position of Bavaria before the War affords a precedent. Mr. Polk's recommendation was that no attempt should be made now to arrive at a hard and fast decision, but that Canadian representative should come to Washington, and that we should trust to process of evolution to find some way out of the difficulty. Mr. Rowell appreciated this point of view, but felt strongly that Canadian public opinion would, with difficulty, tolerate an arrangement under which their representative should on all occasions rank below the representatives of Central American Republics. You will learn direct from Canadian Government whether they can accept Mr. Polk's suggestion.

Addressed to Foreign Office. Repeated to Canada.

I enclose cuttings† from the Montreal Gazette and the Ottawa papers commenting on the announcement.

Enclosure in No. 91.

CANADIAN MINISTER PLENIPOTENTIARY AT WASHINGTON.

ANNOUNCEMENT THAT HIS MAJESTY WILL ACCREDIT A CANADIAN PLENIPOTENTIARY TO THE UNITED STATES.

RT. HON. SIR GEORGE FOSTER (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a statement which, from the importance of its character, I shall read, with the permission of the House. It has reference to negotiations which have for some time been going on between the British and the Canadian Governments in respect of Canadian representation at Washington. The negotiations have been concluded, and to-day a statement will have been made in the House of Commons in London, and I desire that the House of Commons here shall have cognizance of the matter at the same time. [Here follows statement printed in No. 89.]

HON. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): Inasmuch as the right hon. Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster) has asked the permission of the House to make a statement, I should like to ask the House to give me permission to say a word with reference thereto, if not now, then on the first appropriate occasion.

MR. SPEAKER: I feel sure that the House would be only too happy to give the hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) an opportunity to give expression to his views on the memorandum just read, but I do not think it is desirable that there should be any general debate on the subject unless there is some specific motion before the House. Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. the leader of the Opposition shall have liberty to speak.

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Carried, carried.

HON. MACKENZIE KING: I wish to ask my right hon. friend if he will be good enough to see that all the correspondence in reference to this matter is laid on the Table at the earliest possible moment. My purpose in rising now is not to refer at the moment particularly to the far-reaching and important step the Government has taken but rather to express surprise that Parliament has not been acquainted with the correspondence in reference to this matter before the whole matter was finally concluded. If I understand the announcement which my right hon. friend has just made, it is to the effect that the whole transaction is finally settled as between the British Columbia Government, the Canadian Government and the United States Government, and Parliament has had no opportunity whatever of giving any consideration to the matter in its far-reaching inter-Imperial and International bearings. I think that is not the course which the Government should have taken. Parliament should have been fully apprised of and given opportunity to discuss the essential matters relating to this far-reaching step before the Government came to any final decision in connexion with it.

SIR GEORGE FOSTER: As this is not the time for discussion I do not propose to enter into the second part of the question raised by my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King). I would merely say that all the available papers in connexion with the negotiations will be brought down as quickly as possible and presented to the House.

No. 92.

EXTRACT FROM DEBATE OF THE CANADIAN HOUSE OF COMMONS.

17th MAY, 1920.

MINISTER PLENIPOTENTIARY OF CANADA AT WASHINGTON.

ON motion of Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden (Prime Minister) for Committee of Supply.

HON. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queens): Mr. Speaker, I avail myself of this motion to invite the attention of the House for but a few minutes to what I regard as a question of large importance. I refer to the negotiations which seem to be in progress respecting the representation of Canada at Washington.

During the War a number of business men were sent to the United States, appointed to what was called a War Mission, whose business in that country was to endeavour to obtain for Canada a share in the large volume of contracts that were being made for munitions of war and for supplies. I believe that the Mission discharged that duty in a way that brought a great deal of business to Canada, and that its work in that respect was eminently successful. At the last session of Parliament an appropriation of $50,000 was asked for that Mission, and associated with that in the item was, "Representation of Canada at Washington." I am inclined to think that what was contemplated by the Government at that day must have been materially different from the larger project of which we know a little, but very little, at the present stage.

Let me say frankly that my own observation and my own experience in relation to transactions of public business between Ottawa and Washington lead me to entertain great doubt as to the wisdom of the step that the Government are taking. I am afraid that it means that at a time when everybody is talking of the need of economy—at a time when many worthy projects are turned down because the Government say they cannot find the money for them—at such a time I am afraid that the Government are plunging into a form of expenditure which promises but little substantial good for Canada, but which is full of possibilities of future trouble. But while I give that in passing as my own impression, I wish it to be distinctly understood that I give it only as an impression and one for which I alone am responsible. I realize that the question of representation at Washington is one on which there may be differences of opinion, not unlikely on both sides of the House. I take it for granted that at a later day opportunity will be afforded for a wider discussion of the question. I do not propose at this moment to enter into the wider question of whether or not it is expedient to have representation for Canada at Washington. I quite realize, as I have said, that there are differences of opinion on that subject, and I myself feel that for lack of information we should all be disposed to reserve a final judgment until we are better informed. I do not ask the House to associate itself with the impression I have given. But I do think there is a point upon which the House might well take strong ground, and that is that in a matter of such large importance this Parliament is entitled to be furnished with more information than it has received in this connexion.

There has been a great deal of talk from time to time of what is called government by Order in Council. More than once during this session, and not on this side only, members have expressed the view that there was too much government by Order in Council. There is, I am afraid, a tendency in our Parliamentary system—I believe that students of English politics have found the same there—to magnify the power of the Cabinet and to minimize the power of Parliament; and that is a tendency which we should guard against. The Cabinet, after all, is only a Committee of Parliament, and beyond that we should not be prepared to give it unlimited power. There are times, I know, when a Government must determine things promptly. An emergency may arise; a crisis comes; the Government must act promptly; it must come to a decision and trust to Parliament to justify it later. There is another set of circumstances under which a Government may be justified in feeling that they have public opinion behind them. After a question has been discussed for a long time in Parliament, on the platform and throughout the country, a Government may feel that they have a clear knowledge of public opinion which will enable them to reach conclusions without taking Parliament into their confidence until a later stage. But there are no such conditions here. There is no emergency; there is no crisis; there is nothing in connexion with this Washington business so far as Canada is concerned which could suffer if it were delayed for a week, a month—aye, for a year; and the Government by Order in Council which might have been justified in time of war cannot be justified in time of peace.

Then, as to the second point. I have said that there may be occasions when a Government is justified in making up its mind that it has public opinion behind it, after there has been a long discussion, perhaps an agitation—debates in Parliament, discussions on the platform. All these conditions, I say, which may create a ground upon which a Government may feel that it has public opinion behind it. But there is no such condition here. There has been practically no discussion of this Washington business, beyond a brief reference to it in the last session; there has been no debate at all. There has been no resolution of this Parliament setting forth that we were dissatisfied with the present state of affairs. There has been no discussion on the public platform. No candidate has presented himself to the electors of Canada on the ground that he wants a definite representation of Canada at Washington. In all these respects, then, there is nothing to justify the Government in coming to a hasty conclusion. Nevertheless it would seem from the little information that we have, that the Government are disposed to reach a conclusion without taking Parliament into their confidence.

I have said that it appears that the project the Government now have in hand is larger than was in their mind a year ago. When the item of $50,000 was voted, to which I have referred, the Minister in charge, the President of the Privy Council (Hon. Mr. Rowell) stated that they were about winding up the business of the War Mission, but that it was intended to have a permanent representative at Washington whose range of duties would be somewhat wider than that of the Mission. Then the question of expense was mentioned, and he said that the cost of the War Mission had been from $4,000 to $5,000 a month. I quote my hon. friend's words:

The present expenditure in connexion with the Mission is between $4,000 and $5,000 a month. We do not anticipate that the permanent representation will exceed that amount.

So it was evident that at that time a very modest project was in the mind of the Minister. But what do we find to-day? Not only do we find a much larger scheme, indicated by the memorandum read the other day by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster); we find that the modest appropriation of $50,000 last year has already jumped to $80,000 in the Estimates of the present year. I venture to say that if the project be carried out it will be found at no distant date that much more than $80,000 will be needed to meet the expenses.

Now, I have stated, Sir, that my own impressions of this matter are not favourable, but I want to emphasize the fact that I am not asking the House to join me in that. I am reserving these impressions for consideration at a later day if that be necessary. But I want to urge very strongly that in a matter of so much importance Parliament is entitled to have received in a larger degree the confidence of this Government. I say that in a matter of so much gravity, for the Government to withhold information and proceed to commit the country to this new scheme at Washington, is a step which Parliament ought to look upon with very grave suspicion. It is a matter of large importance. It is of financial importance, for I am satisfied that even the $80,000 which is asked this year will be found quite inadequate to the maintenance of the proper dignity of Canada's representative as proposed at Washington. But it is important in another respect; it is important in its relation to our communications with the United States. It is important in its bearing on our relations with the Mother Country. It is important in every respect; it comes nearer to being a constitutional change than any of the various matters which have recently been brought to the attention of the House. For all these reasons, on an important matter, on a matter which is not urgent nor pressing, on a matter which affords every opportunity for preliminary consideration and reflection, it would be a wise policy for the Government to halt in their proceedings, and, before they go further, to bring the whole matter fully before the Parliament of Canada, in order that we may be able to exercise sound judgment on the subject. For that reason, without dwelling on the matter further, and with the full understanding that at a later stage on the main question, if necessary, I shall be permitted to discuss this matter further, confining myself at present entirely to the question of Parliamentary procedure, I move:

That all the words after the word "that," to the end of the question, be left out and the following words be inserted instead thereof:

"This House desires to record its opinion that before any arrangement respecting the permanent representation of Canada at Washington is consummated, the House should be fully informed concerning the negotiations between the Canadian, Imperial and United States Governments, and all correspondence and Orders in Council on the subject should be submitted to the House."

HON. N. W. ROWELL (President of the Council): I am sure hon. members have listened with interest to the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) who has moved this amendment. I may congratulate my hon. friend on one point of his remarks at least—that is that, after persistently denying for a year and a half or two years in this House and in the press that Canada's status had been modified in any degree whatever, he to-night acknowledges the fact that there is some modification and improvement in our status, as shown by the step that has been taken.

My hon. friend's criticism of the action of the Government appears to be based on three grounds: First, that there is no occasion for such an appointment, that no conditions exist which call for it; second, that there is no public opinion in the country behind such an appointment; and, third, that before any arrangement is consummated, all the facts should be submitted to the House.

Dealing briefly with these points in the order in which they are raised by my hon. friend, let me say with reference to the first, that my hon. friend and the other members of the House have only to recall conditions existing between two great countries, having a boundary line 4,000 miles in extent, and in which for many years the chief work of the British Ambassador at Washington related to Canadian affairs, to realize that Canada has important and vital interests which require the attention of a representative of Canada. My hon. friend has conceded that during the period of the War Canada required representation at Washington, and that we were represented by business men who did a fine piece of work for Canada. I am sure my hon. friend realizes the fact that the largest part of the external trade of the Dominion of Canada is with the great nation to the south. Does he realize that the great nation to the south has a larger trade with Canada than with all the republics of Central or South America? We are one of the very largest customers of the United States, and the United States is the country with which we in Canada have the largest trade. There are not only the conditions of trade, but other questions do and must invariably arise between two nations geographically so closely and intimately related as the peoples of our two countries, calling for the attention of a Canadian minister.

What are the objects of having a representative at the capital of another state? To safeguard and protect the interests of the people of the country concerned. Does any hon. member doubt that a Canadian, possessing the intimate knowledge which a Canadian should of Canadian affairs and trade conditions, is better qualified to look after Canadian interests than a man who has not that knowledge or experience? Surely no hon. member will question that fact? That being so, I do not think hon. members will question that it is in the interests of Canada that we should have in the great capital of the neighbouring nation a Canadian to look after our rights and interests there. I do not wish to mention questions that are coming up. Hon. members have only to recall questions that arise from week to week and from month to month which are provoking discussions in the press of the United States and in the press of Canada, to realize how important it is that we should be in a position to communicate directly with the American Government, to represent the views of the people of Canada to that Government through our representative at the capital at Washington in order that the rights and interests of the people of this country may be properly guarded and protected in the premises. In saying this, I have nothing but words of appreciation for the conduct of the different British Ambassadors at Washington. They have sought to place themselves in touch with Canadian matters; they have put forth every effort to represent fully and adequately our views so far as it has been possible for them to do so. In what I have said about the importance of Canadian representation, I do not wish that any implication should arise that the British Ambassadors who have been present at Washington have not put forth every effort to look after Canadian interests there.

My hon. friend's second contention was that there is no public opinion behind this change. The difficulty with my hon. friend in this respect is that he has such an incurable obscurantism on all matters concerning Canada's status, that he is unwilling to see the evidence of public opinion in this country on this matter. I could turn to the press of Canada and the Canadian newspapers from the Atlantic to the Pacific, with the possible exception of the journal so ably edited by my hon. friend, have been discussing this matter for the past year and a half. My hon. friend says that there is no public opinion behind this change. Let me draw attention to one of the leading newspapers of Western Canada about which I know, because the matter has been drawn to my attention, and I am not sure that what I say of this one paper is not equally true of other newspapers in Western Canada. Every one recognizes the influence of the Winnipeg Free Press as an exponent of public opinion in Western Canada, whether one agrees or disagrees with it. From the time this question was raised that paper has been explaining and expounding the question, urging that the time had come when such a representative should be appointed, and stating that it was the duty of Canada to see that such a representative should be appointed. Let me instance the leading papers of Ontario, the Toronto Globe, the Mail and Empire, the Star. I am not sure about the Telegram.

MR. CASGRAIN: Are they your newspapers?

MR. ROWELL: The Toronto Globe, the Mail and Empire, and the Star have all been strongly advocating the appointment of a Canadian representative. I am not sure but what the same thing is equally true of the World, although my attention has not been called to the position of that particular paper, while it has been called to the position of the other papers. Although I have not gone through the press with a view of getting at the facts, I am quite sure if you examine the newspapers of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific, you will find that this question has been discussed for a year and a half at least, and that the overwhelming expression of opinion, as voiced through the press, has been strongly in favour of the proposal which the Government has now consummated.

Then my hon. friend says: There is no public opinion, public opinion has had no opportunity to register itself. In that respect I should just like to draw my hon. friend's attention as to what has actually been placed before the Parliament of Canada. In the first session of last year the Estimates were laid on the table of the House on the 19th of March. An item was included providing the sum of £50,000 for the Canadian War Mission and representation at Washington. That estimate came up for the consideration of the House on the first day of April.

MR. FIELDING: A suitable day.

MR. ROWELL: My hon. friend says "a suitable day," because he has such an idea of Canada, of her position and her future, that he has not yet been able, since these discussions arose, to take the broad-gauge view of Canada's position and her place in the Empire. I appeal to my hon. friends: Have faith in your country, have faith in her people, have faith in their ability to look after their country's interests when the need arises.

MR. BUREAU: Legislate them good.

MR. ROWELL: It would take a good deal of legislation to make my hon. friend good.

MR. BUREAU: Don't use your own yard-stick in judging others.

MR. ROWELL: Turning again to the question of public opinion, this matter came up in this House on the first day of April, and my hon. friend who was then leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) suggested that the matter should stand over for further consideration. On that occasion my hon. friend the member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) asked the question of me—I was in charge of the estimate—whether it was the intention of the Government to appoint a representative at Washington.

MR. LEMIEUX: Be careful there.

MR. ROWELL: I will read my hon. friend's words.

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Question, question.

MR. ROWELL: I do not wonder that my hon. friends are getting a little impatient, because they should know that on this matter the Government is carrying with it, without a shadow of doubt, the judgment of the people of Canada. This matter came up on the 1st of April, and my hon. friends will find a reference to it on page 1074 of Hansard. In answer to the question that it should stand, I stated:

It is an item that involves an important principle and will stand some discussion.

Then my hon. friend the member for Maisonneuve asked for information on it, although it was agreed that it should stand over. He asked:

Has there been any correspondence exchanged between this Government and the Imperial authorities with regard to representation at Washington?

Then he goes on to say that the question came up while Sir Wilfrid Laurier was in power, and that Sir Wilfrid Laurier had the idea of appointing a representative at Washington, but that the matter had dropped.

MR. LEMIEUX: A representative at Washington?

MR. ROWELL: What my hon. friend stated was:

as Commissioner at Washington, having the same status as our Canadian Commissioner at London.

MR. LEMIEUX: Hear, hear.

MR. ROWELL: Then he goes on to say that the proposal did not eventuate, and he asked what the situation then was. Though it was agreed that the matter should stand over, I stated that the item in the Estimates was to make provision:

For a permanent representative at Washington. The exact form which that representation will take is a matter of consultation between the Prime Minister and the Imperial Government. . . . The intention is to continue the present Canadian War Mission in existence until the arrangements are made for a permanent representative. The moment those arrangements are concluded the War Mission will go out of existence, but we do not consider it expedient that there should be an interregnum between the end of that Mission and the appointment of a permanent representative. That is the object of inserting this item in the Estimates.

My hon. friend then made a suggestion as to who would be a good representative, and congratulated the Government on the proposal.

That announcement, Mr. Speaker, was passed from one end of Canada to the other through the public press. It also went over to England and was the occasion of certain questions being asked in the English House of Commons. At the request of the then leader of the Opposition, as I have already intimated, it stood over for consideration and discussion, and it was not called up again for five weeks, until the 5th of May. So if any hon. members desired to formulate any views in reference to this matter, they were given an abundant opportunity to do so; they were given nearly five weeks in which to consider the matter before the question was again called up. Did hon. members on that occasion protest against the necessity of appointing a representative at Washington? According to my recollection not one member on the other side of the House raised a protest. The matter was before the House all through the spring session, and unless I am mistaken my hon. friend the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) said not a word about it from the beginning to the end of the session. Other members on the Opposition side did, but generally speaking, their words were words of congratulation on the action which the Government proposed.

Lest there should be any misunderstanding, I was asked specifically on that occasion what was involved in the appointment. I think it was the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) who asked whether the Canadian representative at Washington would have diplomatic standing, and whether he would be entitled to conduct negotiations direct with the American Government, and my answer was that I believed that so far as concerned purely Canadian affairs he would conduct negotiations direct with the American Government, and so far as concerned matters that were not purely Canadian, they would be dealt with in co-operation with the British Ambassador. That was the effect of my statement made on that occasion, on the 5th of May, 1919. That is the exact effect of the statement made to the House by the Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster) on Monday last. The principle was clearly laid before the House last year, before the Government asked the House to vote the amount in supply. If hon. members did not appreciate its significance, the Government and members on this side of the House are not responsible for that. If hon. members did not take advantage of that occasion to express their views on the matter, if they had any criticism to offer, hon. members on this side of the House are not responsible. The Government had every reason to believe that they had not only the people of Canada behind them, but a united Parliament, in the action they were about to take.

My hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) has said: But you should not have done this by Order in Council. When my hon. friend says that we should have submitted something further to the House than we have submitted I confess I am at a loss to understand just what he has in view. We have passed no Order in Council in connexion with this matter. Nothing so far has been done by Order in Council in connexion with this matter. The Government's legislative section and authority to take action during the year was the estimate voted last session; the Government's legislative sanction and authority for action now will be the item contained in the Estimates this session. The item last session passed the House, was concurred in, and formed part of a Bill of Supply which was passed unanimously, and the Government had the full sanction and authority of Parliament for continuing the negotiations in order to reach a conclusion on the matter.

Not only was the matter up then. It came up a few days later, on 8th May, 1919, when my hon. friend for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), referring to a despatch which appeared in the papers reporting a question asked in the Imperial House of Commons, inquired in reference to the appointment of a Canadian representative at Washington, and then suggested that possibly as that representative would only be a commercial representative or agent, it was not necessary to consult the Imperial Government with reference to the appointment. My reply to his question will be found on page 2202 of Hansard of 8th May, 1919, and is as follows:

The Canadian representative at Washington will be very much more than the Canadian agent. His status will be very different from the status of the Canadian representative in Paris or London. Therefore there is consultation with the Imperial Government with reference to the appointment. I stated the other evening that confidential communications had been held between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Imperial Government in reference to this matter, but that these were not yet concluded, and that when they were the House would be advised of the whole purport of them.

Could there be any clearer statement made to the House as to the character of the negotiations that were being carried on? And yet not one member on the Opposition side of the House questioned our proceeding with the negotiations along the line I have indicated, and the spring session of 1919 concluded with not a real word of criticism or of protest after that date. Can my hon. friends, after the matter having been submitted to Parliament as I have mentioned, and after their having failed to offer any real opposition to it or any real criticism of the Government for continuing and concluding the negotiations, with any degree of fairness, now seek to criticize the action of the Government in doing what the Government then intimated they were about to do?

The Government continued the negotiations and concluded them. At what date, Mr. Speaker, would my hon. friend say that the Government should have brought this matter again before the House and asked the sanction of Parliament? How could we bring it before Parliament any further than we did until an understanding was arrived at? In confidential negotiations of that kind we could not bring down a partial understanding. The negotiations were necessarily confidential between the British Government and this Government, particularly as they affected representation at another court. It would have been just as reasonable if my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) had been criticized in 1911 and told: "You should not have concluded an agreement at Washington until you first submitted your proposals to the House and had the sanction of Parliament." My hon. friend did what was the reasonable thing to do if the Government of the day was prepared to take the responsibility for it. He went ahead and concluded the agreement and then submitted it to Parliament, as that agreement had to be submitted, for it affected the changes in the tariff. That is exactly what the Government did in this case, but they did more—they brought the matter down a year ago while the negotiations were in the early stages and laid the principle of it before the House, they took a vote of the House in respect to it, and there being no opposition they had the mandate of the House to go on with the negotiations.

The Government have now concluded an understanding embodied in the statement made to the House by the Acting Prime Minister, and the House will be asked to give its legislative sanction to that understanding when it is asked to vote the item in Supply which will come up in due course. What arrangement could be fairer? How could the Government take the House more fully into its confidence than it has done in a matter of this kind? I submit that my hon. friend's criticism is wholly beside the mark and does not touch this grave and important step in Canadian representation and constitutional development.

One word more, Mr. Speaker, I am sure my hon. friend must realize, if he is a student of constitutional history, that the conduct of foreign affairs is the especial prerogative of the Crown; and when I use the word Crown, I am using it in the sense in which it is used under our constitution: the Crown advised by its constitutional advisers. It is the duty of the Government to carry on these negotiations and to reach a conclusion on them, and there is no obligation to consult the House before they reach a conclusion; in fact, the conduct of foreign relations would, I submit, be impossible, if the Government went further than they have done in the present case. They laid the principle before Parliament; they had parliamentary approval of it; they went on and negotiated an understanding; they have informed Parliament of the nature of that understanding; they have submitted an estimate to the House in order that Supply may be voted to maintain and support the representative thus established.

The Government has followed true constitutional practice and precedent in the course it has taken. My hon. friend's criticism of the Government's course, I submit, is unfortunate in this respect; it may give rise to the impression that there is a real difference of opinion among Canadian people upon this question. I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that there is any real difference of opinion in Canada upon this question. I believe that the overwhelming mass of our people are in favour of the proposal and look upon the step taken by the Government as one distinctly in the interests of Canada, and, I believe, also in the interests of the British Empire. It means that Canadian affairs at Washington in future, when the representative is appointed, will be conducted by a Canadian direct with the American Government. And I can only repeat that I am sure that is a step that our people desire to have taken. We cannot always remain in a dependent position having our affairs looked after and managed by other people.

MR. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

MR. ROWELL: My hon. friend says, "Hear, hear." I hope he will say, "Hear, hear" with equal emphasis when I say—that we are not going to change our settled allegiance to the King and cut the tie that binds us to the Mother Country in order to obtain the management of our own affairs.

MR. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

MR. ROWELL: We are going to do two things—manage our own affairs and maintain the unity of the British Empire. We believe that we are entitled to manage our own purely Canadian affairs within the British Empire, and that is what this policy implies and involves. In so far as it does involve a constitutional departure—and I agree with my hon. friend that it does involve a constitutional departure—it is the logical and inevitable development of what has been taking place in this country for the past five, ten, twenty, thirty years; it is the logical and inevitable development of the work of our soldiers overseas, of our status under the Peace Treaty, and of the present position of Canada within the British Empire and in the world.

In the course the Government has taken, just as at the Peace Conference, the Government are carrying out not only the judgment of Parliament but the judgment of the people of Canada. For, whatever my hon. friend may say to the contrary, Canada is to-day associated with the Mother Country and the other Dominions in a great League of Nations under a common sovereign—the strongest and most influential factor for the preservation of the world's peace that exists to-day. And it is of vital moment that good relations should be preserved between Canada and the British Empire as a whole and the United States, the other great branch of the Anglo-Saxon race. Good relations between these two countries are not only important so far as they affect Canada and the Mother Country, they are important so far as they affect the future peace of the world. There is no better way to maintain a good understanding than by being able to meet men face to face, to talk over problems in which you are both interested, and to supply full information, for the majority of international, as well as personal, misunderstandings, spring from a lack of knowledge and a lack of appreciation of the viewpoint of the other. I believe that a Canadian representative in Washington, meeting and talking with representatives of the American Government and dealing with problems common to both, will make for strengthening the good relations that now exist between the two countries, will make not only for their maintenance in the future, but should help to remove some of the misunderstandings that from time to time arise between some people in the United States and some people in the Mother Country. The whole effect should be to strengthen and bind together nations having so much in common in their history, in their traditions, in their ideals and in their common love of democratic government and free institutions.

MR. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), namely, that all the papers concerning this change should be brought before Parliament and that the question should be fully discussed before a final decision is taken. My hon. friend the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) has certainly not given all the details that are necessary to enlighten the House as to the meaning of the change that is being made. We are just as much at sea as ever after the speech delivered by my hon. friend. We were told in the official statement that was given to the House a few days ago that this change is practically no change at all. Here are the words of the statement:

This new arrangement will not denote any departure either on the part of the British Government or of the Canadian Government from the principle of the diplomatic unity of the British Empire.

Yet, we are told that this appointment to Washington involves a very important change—the President of the Privy Council having used the words "very important departure." The language is certainly ambiguous, as all diplomatic language is, and I think I am within the mark when I say there are not five members of this House who really know the meaning of the change that is being made by this proposal.

My hon. friend says that Parliament was consulted last year when an estimate was voted for a certain amount, and that my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) at that time approved of the step. The very few words uttered by my hon. friend from Maisonneuve indicate that he understood, as we all did at the time, that the proposal was to appoint a trade commissioner at Washington. The President of the Privy Council at that time said that it was to continue the work done by the trade commission which had been in Washington during the War, and my hon. friend from Maisonneuve said that it was even more important to have a commissioner in Washington than in Paris or even in London. Will the President of the Privy Council say that it is only a trade commissioner that is going to be appointed to Washington?

MR. ROWELL: I stated then clearly that it was a great deal more. If my hon. friend will turn it up in Hansard he will see it.

MR. LAPOINTE: But my hon. friend will admit that it was understood by the House at that time that the work of the representative was to continue the operations of the trade commission in Washington. Surely the voting of that sum did not mean that Parliament had decided on such an important question as this. As far as I am concerned, I will readily admit anything that looks like national self-assertion, anything which advances Canada along the road of nationhood, appeals to me. As General Smuts said last year, in a figurative way: "The British Empire ended in July or August, 1914," that is, that all the countries under the British flag are sister nations, the word "Empire" meaning a dominant state with subordinate states. But we must know exactly where we are going, because the body that is responsible to the Canadian people for any such important step as this is the Canadian Parliament and not the committee of the Privy Council. If we are to accept the words of the official statement that was made to the House this may be a very important change although later on it is said there has been no constitutional departure. This statement reads:

Accordingly, it has been agreed that His Majesty, on advice of his Canadian ministers, shall appoint a Minister Plenipotentiary who will have charge of Canadian affairs and will at all times be the ordinary channel of communication with the United States Government in matters of purely Canadian concern, acting upon instructions from and reporting direct to the Canadian Government. In the absence of the Ambassador the Canadian minister will take charge of the whole Embassy and of the representation of Imperial as well as Canadian interests. He will be accredited by His Majesty to the President with the necessary powers for the purpose.

There is no better constitutional authority than Professor Keith, and here is what I read in his work "Responsible Government in the Dominions," page 1133 volume 3:

It would be a completely different thing to approve direct communications on political matters or the direct negotiation of treaties proper, and it would clearly be in theory a termination of the existing unity of the Empire, and the fundamental alteration of its constitution.

The same author in his recent work "Imperial Unity and the Dominions" speaks as follows, page 297:

It would be hopelessly expensive for any Dominion to duplicate the system of consuls, and even if the men were appointed they could not receive any consular status, as the right to appoint consular officers is one which appertains only, and is accorded in treaties solely, to the sovereign power in the Empire. If it were desired to give them consular status, this could indeed be done by securing their appointment by the Crown as His Majesty's consuls for Canada, or whatever other Dominion was concerned, but such an appointment would mean that the holders of office were appointed on the advice of the Imperial Government, and would have to be subjected to the control of the Imperial Government, since that Government would be responsible for them vis-à-vis the foreign Government, as it is not now responsible for mere commercial agents.

The same result can be attained more effectively and easily and much more cheaply, by the use of British consuls by the Dominions, who can pay if necessary any extra clerical expense caused by their employment. The same consideration, it may be added, applies to the representation of the Dominions by diplomatic officers in the foreign capitals: These officers could not, as long as the Empire is constituted as at present, be other than appointees of the Crown on the authority of the Imperial Government.

Mr. Curtis, who is a great Imperialist, in his important book, "The Problem of the Commonwealth" takes the same position, and says:

For, when trying to protect their subjects against disorder, the British Government would be obliged to say that Canadians were no longer included in that description. It would have to declare that Canadians had ceased to be British subjects, and the Canadian Government would have to admit that declaration. These consequences are such as no human ingenuity can change or evade. For all British subjects control of their foreign relations must rest in the hands of one Government only. Any section of British subjects who transfer that final authority to a government special to themselves and different from the government which decides those issues for other British subjects, in doing so renounce their status as such. To reconcile a common citizenship with allegiance to two different states is no more possible than to construct a triangle of which two sides are together less than the third.

This method, therefore, of completing the achievement of responsible government by the Dominions, so much in harmony with the process already followed, and so simple in its inception that it needs but a few strokes of the pen, is one which involves the least moderate change in the condition not only of the Dominion itself, but of all its citizens. It leads not merely to reform but straight to disruption of the Commonwealth—to consequences of the most revolutionary kind; and that, no doubt, is the principal reason why no Dominion Government has ever attempted to follow it. To argue whether they should follow it or not is beside the purpose of this inquiry. The people of the Dominions must settle that for themselves. Here we are simply concerned to discover the most moderate reform which will give them the same responsibility for their foreign affairs as the people of Britain, and to show that this particular method, though simple in appearance, involves revolution and not reform is enough for that purpose.

MR. DEVLIN: On what page is that to be found?

MR. LAPOINTE: At page 130. Mr. Curtis, recognizing the natural desire on the part of citizens of the Dominion to have a voice in the control of their own affairs, even foreign affairs, indicates only two methods of arriving at that solution. He says, first you must have either an Imperial Council, or an Imperial Cabinet, composed of ministers of the different Dominions as well as of the Mother Country. The other solution he indicates is an Imperial Parliament—all the apostles of Imperial Federation have advocated the same scheme—and he says it is the only solution for the Dominions, if they want to have a voice in foreign affairs. The only other alternative is independence, and, of course, he deprecates this mode of arriving at a solution of the question. Now if men, able men, students of constitutional affairs, men who desire a solution of the constitutional relations between the Mother Country and the various parts of the Empire, state that the only way for the Dominions to have a voice in their foreign affairs—if they do not desire independence—is the establishment of an Imperial Parliament which will have the control of all those representations in the foreign country, I say that such a step as the one which has been adopted should have been submitted to Parliament for full discussion before it was entered into. That is specially the case when we have been told for the last two years that immediately after the War an Imperial Conference would be called for the purpose of considering, studying and settling all the constitutional changes which are desirable in the relations between the Mother Country and the various Dominions of the Empire. Why did not the Government wait until this conference had been held before taking a step that may be very important, because when this conference takes place some people may come and say: Here is an accomplished fact; the Dominions have already a voice in their foreign affairs; and that being so they must agree to some Parliament or council or cabinet to which those diplomatic representatives shall be responsible.

Further, Mr. Speaker, it is said that the Canadian representative at Washington will automatically replace the British Ambassador when he is absent. If that representative is appointed by us, surely we will be responsible for his actions. Will the people of Canada be responsible for all the actions of that representative when he acts in the capacity of the British Ambassador in the absence of the regular ambassador? Another question I wish to ask is this: If the Canadian representative acts as British Ambassador surely the British Parliament or the British Government will have something to say in the selection of that representative, and he cannot be selected or appointed on the recommendation of the Canadian Government only? I could not believe that the British Government would agree to be represented by, and held responsible for the actions of, a man in the selection of whom they would have no voice whatever. Again I say Parliament should be given all particulars, all details about this appointment: Upon what conditions the British Government have agreed to the appointment of a Canadian representative at Washington? What is the real status of that officer? To what extent will the Canadian people be held responsible for his actions when he acts as British Ambassador? To what extent will the Imperial Government or Parliament have responsibility for the appointment of that officer? Then, and then only, shall we be able to discuss the question, and then only shall the Canadian people be in a position to decide as to the merit or the demerit of the constitutional change effected by this policy.

RT. HON. SIR ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): It is sometimes said of a policy that it is damned by faint praise. I think it may be said of this proposal to appoint a Minister Plenipotentiary at Washington, that hon. gentlemen opposite have praised it by very faint condemnation.

My hon. friend (Mr. Lapointe) has referred to certain constitutional authorities and has pointed out the grave apprehensions entertained by those authorities if such a course should be pursued. I do not propose at this moment to enter into the great question of the future constitutional relations of the Empire. As my hon. friend has said, that subject will be discussed at a great constitutional conference, not called, I assume, this year, but perhaps next year; and I hope at that conference both sides of this House, whatever party may be in power, will be represented. I believe that as foreign relations in the United Kingdom are lifted beyond the petty controversy of party politics, so the relations of Canada to our Empire may be lifted beyond the petty controversy of party politics in this country. As I have already said in this House, if I should be Prime Minister of Canada when that conference is called, I should certainly invite hon. gentlemen on the other side to participate with us in the discussions which will take place. I am not going to enter into that question now; I have just this to say: that he would be a bold man who would undertake to set forth the precise lines upon which constitutional changes in the future will be worked out and upon which the constitutional relations of the different nations of the Empire to each other and to the Mother Country will be based in the future. On the other hand, I think he would be a timid man who is not confident that the problem is not insoluble and that those relations will be worked out in such a way as to give to every nation of the Empire its adequate voice and place within the Britannic commonwealth.

I should like to point out to my hon. friend that when in days gone by, forty or fifty years ago, the question was raised of handing over to the Canadian people and to the Canadian legislature the control of their public domain, the control of their fiscal policy, the control of all their domestic affairs, the same grave apprehensions were expressed as to the effect which those just and merited concessions would have upon the solidarity of the Empire. My hon. friend need have no apprehensions as to the effect of this proposal. What does it amount to, after all? It amounts to this and only this: that a country like Canada, with eight and a half to nine millions of people, bordering the great republic to the south for four thousand miles and far more intimately associated with that country than with any other country outside the British Empire, should have its representative in the Embassy at Washington which represents the whole Empire. Is there anything startling or novel in that? Is there any reason why it should not be carried out? Does my hon. friend know what the Government did of which he was a supporter? He raises grave constitutional difficulties as to who shall appoint this minister and who shall be responsible for him. Does he know that the Government which was in power before 1911 concluded a treaty with the United States under which three Canadians were appointed to act with three men appointed by the United States Government in respect to all matters under the control of the International Joint Commission? What are these men but ambassadors, in a sense—ambassadors charged also, it is true, with the duty of settling differences between the two countries by judicial determination? When my hon. friend the then Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) went to Washington in 1911, what was his position, to all intents and purposes? He was an ambassador sent on behalf of Canada to the United States for the purpose of negotiating a treaty. If that is good constitutional practice for three, four or five months, where do you find any violation of the constitution in appointing a permanent representative to do the same thing and to deal with matters of precisely the same or more varied character?

My hon. friends on the other side seem to be strangely alarmed about this proposal. The hon. member (Mr. Lapointe) says that he is very happy to support any assertion of the dignity and status of the Canadian people, or words to that effect. He does not seem to be very happy in his support of the proposal this evening. I hope that his mind will be reassured after this debate has taken place and that he will come to a more illuminating and happier view of the proposal which has been placed before the country.

The hon. gentleman is strangely alarmed as to the terrible consequences which will ensue to this country if the Canadian Minister at Washington, in the absence of the British Ambassador, should venture to carry on negotiations with the United States Government, and he wants to know to what extent the people of this country will be responsible. They will be responsible to precisely the same extent as if the British Ambassador himself had carried on the negotiations; no more and no less. I should have thought that that answer would have occurred to my hon. friend before he propounded that rather curious question.

Well, let us look a little at some of the observations which the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) has made. In the first place, in connexion with his demand that all the correspondence and Orders in Council should be laid on the table of the House. I should like to say just this: the correspondence has been conducted on the one hand with the Government of the United Kingdom and on the other hand with the Government of the United States. The correspondence does not tell the whole story, because there have been many oral interviews in which the subject has been discussed on many occasions during the past three years. I had the correspondence examined very carefully; I myself examined it carefully. I must say to my hon. friends on the other side of the House that in my judgment it cannot be brought down with any advantage to the public interest—more than that, without detriment to the public interest. The negotiations with the Mother Country were naturally of an exceedingly confidential character. That is equally true—and I will emphasize this fact—with regard to the negotiations with the Government of the United States. My hon. friends on the other side are well aware, no doubt, that no country has the right to demand that any other country shall receive its Minister. Every country must grant that in response to a request, and it is not obliged to grant any such request. Therefore, while the consultations with the British Government were of a highly confidential nature, whether they were written or oral, so on the other hand, the consultations and the correspondence with the Government of the United States are confidential to an even greater degree and cannot be disclosed in this House. All that has been arranged so far, with the exception of some minor details, perhaps not yet fully consummated, has been placed before the House in the statement read by the Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster) just a week ago to-day, I believe. As regards taking the initiative in this matter, I accept, at once and with the greatest possible grace, the fullest responsibility for the part that I have taken. It would make no difference whether I accepted the responsibility or not, that responsibility would rest upon me. I began these negotiations with the Government of the United Kingdom more than three years ago by oral discussion with the then Secretary of State for the Colonies and with the then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. The matter rested for a time, and then it was taken up again in the autumn of 1917; but on account of war conditions and by reason of the enormous pressure of business affairs between the two countries, the conclusion then reached was that the purpose for the time being during the War would be better served with the appointment of a Canadian Trade Commission. That Trade Commission was appointed, and the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) has borne worthy and true testimony to the fact that members of that Commission did splendid, unselfish, patriotic service for the country which they represented. Later on, and after the Trade Commission had about completed its work, the subject was further discussed. While I was abroad last year it was discussed, not only with members of the British Government, but with some members of the other Dominions of the Empire, notably with the Prime Minister of Australia. The matter stood then until October last, when it was taken up in a more systematic form. Negotiations have been carried on ever since, and they have resulted in the announcement which was made in this House just one week ago, and which has been received with great favour, not only in this country, but in the United States. What reasons are there for appointing a Canadian representative at Washington? I need only emphasize them, as the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) has dwelt upon this phase of the argument.

Let me pay a tribute to every British Ambassador with whom I have been associated as Prime Minister, Lord Bryce, Sir Cecil Spring-Rice, Lord Reading. I found every one of them eager and anxious to do everything within his power to maintain the interests of this country; but Lord Bryce himself said to me that three-quarters of the work transacted by the Embassy at Washington had relation to the interests of Canada. We all know perfectly well that the staff of the British Embassy at Washington was never selected, so far as we could observe, with any special purpose of placing thereon persons specially familiar with the ideals of the people of this country and with conditions in Canada. I felt many a time during the past nine years that we should have a representative at Washington, and I am confident that such was the view of Sir Wilfrid Laurier during the latter years of his tenure of office as Prime Minister. I should greatly doubt whether his proposal merely suggested the appointment of a commercial agent at Washington. Why should you appoint a commercial agent at Washington?

MR. FIELDING: The Prime Minister says "his proposal." What proposal does he refer to? Where does he find the evidence of such a proposal?

SIR ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) alluded last year to a proposal.

MR. FIELDING: Not to any proposal. The hon. member for Maisonneuve said that he understood it was the desire of Sir Wilfrid Laurier to make an appointment, but I am free to say the Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier never made any proposal on the subject.

SIR ROBERT BORDEN: I know they never made any definite proposal. I was speaking of proposal in another sense. If my hon. friend is sensitive as regards the word "proposal," I will substitute "idea" or "thought," if he finds fault with my language. I know perfectly well that his idea was not put into execution, but I am certain that he had some such idea in his mind and that he did not intend to send a commercial agent to Washington. Why should he send a commercial agent to Washington? If he wanted to send a commercial agent to the United States, he would send him to some of the great commercial centres, such as New York or Chicago. He surely would not send a commercial agent to Washington, because a commercial agent would be practically useless there.

I have spoken of the tremendous interests of Canada at Washington and of the great volume of work in the Embassy relating to the interests of this country. I have spoken also of the absence of any person distinctly Canadian in his ideals or knowledge who might have afforded necessary assistance in dealing with these questions. The condition as it existed before the War in respect of relations between the United States and Canada will continue in the future, and I anticipate great advantages from the proposal which the Government have announced.

Criticism has been made that we should have come to Parliament with these negotiations. We could not come to Parliament with these negotiations because they were of a highly confidential character from first to last. Every gentleman familiar with constitutional procedure should know that in respect of such matters it is absolutely essential that the Government shall take the initiative and that the result of any proposal which they may formulate shall be announced to Parliament afterwards. I should say to the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) that when we announced last year that we proposed to send a diplomatic representative to Washington, we said about everything that could be said on the subject. That involved everything, because the practice of diplomacy is an ancient one and is governed by a great body of rules, conventions and understandings that have grown up, so that the sending of a diplomatic agent is perfectly intelligible to any one who cares to study the subject. Further than that, the whole matter under British constitutional practice has always been regarded as peculiarly within the sphere of the prerogative of the Crown, and that means, under our constitutional practice, within the discretion of executive government. Instead of the view that this infringes in some way upon the rights and privileges of this House, I should like to point out to the hon. member for Quebec East, who is a constitutional student, that the exercise of a prerogative of this kind in this way gives to the House of Commons a greater control of the whole question than it could get if legislation were introduced. Let me read to him the words of a great constitutional authority on that subject. Dicey, than whom no man stands higher in the discussion of constitutional questions, points out this:

He points out that the survival of the prerogative, conferring as it does wide discretionary power on the Cabinet, involves a consequence which constantly escapes attention. It immensely increases the authority of the House of Commons, and ultimately of the constituencies by which that House is returned. Ministers must in the exercise of all discretionary power inevitably obey the predominant authority in the State.

As the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) has said, the Cabinet is only a committee of the House of Commons, and it can continue to act as such only as long as it has the support of a majority of that House. Then Dicey continues:

Now that the House of Commons has become by far the most important part of the sovereign body, the ministry in all matters of discretion carry out or tend to carry out, the will of the House. When, however, the Cabinet cannot act except by means of legislation other considerations come into play.

In the Mother Country the power of the House of Lords is sometimes interposed. In this country we sometimes find our benevolent efforts frustrated by the action of another body. A very good example which is given by Dicey is this: During Queen Victoria's reign the House of Commons passed a Bill for the abolition of purchase in the army. The Bill was rejected by the Lords. The object, however, was achieved by Royal Warrant under the prerogative. Dicey sums it up in this way:

The prerogatives of the Crown become the privileges of the people.

Now every one who is at all familiar with constitutional questions knows that the Sovereign has prerogatives in respect to foreign relations. Those prerogatives must be exercised upon the advice of the Sovereign's advisers. When, therefore, we undertook to deal with this matter we dealt with it as advisers of the Crown by confidential communication. When those communications had eventually reached an understanding, when matters were ripe both in the United Kingdom and in the United States for an announcement to be made to this Parliament, the announcement was made. So the Government accepts, as of course it must accept, full responsibility for the course which it has taken, and that responsibility is one which we shall bear very lightly, because we believe that the time has long since been ripe when this great and growing nation should have its own direct representative at Washington. Instead of cavilling at the idea that a Canadian Minister sitting at Washington should represent the whole British Empire when the Ambassador is absent, I am inclined to think that the people of Canada will be proud and glad that that duty and that responsibility rests upon a Canadian sent to Washington by the Government of Canada.

Further than that, the intimate association between the people of the United States and Canada has led to a very perfect understanding between the peoples of the two countries. Perhaps there are no two nations in the world between whose peoples a more perfect comprehension exists at the present time than that which does exist between the people of Canada and the people of the United States. Thus, I venture to think, as my hon. friend the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) has well said, that this proposal to have a Canadian at Washington acting, not in opposition to, but in co-operation with the British Ambassador, will tend not only to the good of this country but to a more perfect understanding and better relations between the Empire of which we form a part and the great Republic of our kinsmen to the south.

HON. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as this is the first opportunity I have had the privilege in this House of addressing my right hon. friend as Prime Minister, may I avail myself of the occasion to say to my right hon. friend that I am pleased to see him so restored in health as to be able again to resume the very onerous duties of his high position.

I am sure it will come somewhat as a surprise to the people of this Dominion when, on reading the debates of this House to-morrow, they discover that in this new and far-reaching step which the Government is about to take, if, indeed, it has not already been taken, the only word the Government has to give to the people of Canada is, to all intents and purposes:—this is not a matter on which we can give you any information one way or the other; this is not a matter on which you are entitled to know anything one way or the other; it is a matter so secret that the Government itself must deal and settle with it without any knowledge of the people or the people's representatives in Parliament. That is the main question in the motion which is before the House this evening. The hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the other side of the House, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) and the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), have dwelt at considerable length on the reasons why Canada should have a permanent representative at Washington. There is nothing in the motion before the House to-night referring to the wisdom or unwisdom of having a permanent representative at Washington. My hon. friend the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) in introducing this resolution took particular care to point out to the House that that was a question which might well be discussed at another time or upon another occasion: that what he wished to do by this resolution was to bring concretely before this House and the country the question of the supremacy of Parliament or the autocracy of the Cabinet. That is all that is involved in the resolution before the House. Let me read the resolution:

This House desires to record its opinion that before any arrangement respecting the permanent representation of Canada at Washington is consummated, the House should be fully informed concerning the negotiations between the Canadian, Imperial, and United States Governments, and all correspondence and Orders in Council on the subject should be submitted to the House.

Is there an hon. member of this House representing a constituency in this country who will say that that is not what his own constituents demand of him? I, for my part, cannot see how any member of this House can go before his constituents or before the people of this country and say he is prepared, in regard to any transaction, I do not care how small or how great, to defend any action of a ministry which cannot be openly disclosed before the people's representatives in this House.

When, a week ago, the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), at that time the Acting Prime Minister, announced in the House the matter which we are discussing this evening, I asked my right hon. friend if he would at a very early date lay on the table of the House all the correspondence relating to this matter, and he replied in these words:

I would merely say that all the available papers in connexion with the negotiations will be brought down as quickly as possible and presented to the House.

That was the promise given to us a week ago, that all the available papers in connexion with the matter would be brought down as quickly as possible and presented to the House. My right hon. friend at that time evidently anticipated that it was going to be possible to give the representatives of the people in Parliament at least some information in regard to this far-reaching matter. But to-night the Prime Minister says to us: I have had all the correspondence carefully gone over, I have examined the papers myself, and hon. members of the House of Commons shall not see one of them. That is what we are now told, that the file has been gone through by the Prime Minister himself, and that having been looked through, the people's representatives in Parliament are not to have any access to the papers or any of the correspondence. Well, Sir, all I can say is, it is a mighty bad beginning in a new departure if our foreign policy—because this is a venture in foreign policy—is to be bound up with secrecy from the start. We are driving right into the very vortex that created the whole situation in Europe, going against the very thing which the allied nations have been urging so strongly—namely, that diplomacy should not be secret, but that it should be open and above board. Why, Sir, if in a matter which concerns the relations between the different parts of the Empire, between different nations, we start off by informing the people's representatives in Parliament that they cannot be told one word in regard to the conditions which have brought about their all-important change, what may we expect as the result of such diplomacy?

Now, my hon. friend the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) said that this matter had been discussed in this country back and forth, and that there was no doubt about the voice of the press in regard to it from the Atlantic to the Pacific. He spoke particularly of one paper, the Winnipeg Free Press, and he said that we would all recognize that paper as the exponent of public opinion in the Middle West. Well, I have in my hand the latest editorial on this very subject in the Winnipeg Free Press, and I will read it to my hon. friend, and to the House, because apparently while the President of the Privy Council is not willing to listen to anything that may be said by the people's representatives here, he attaches great importance to the press generally, and to this organ in particular. What the Winnipeg Free Press says in its editorial is what my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) has said in his motion. Under the heading, "Our Minister at Washington," the Winnipeg Free Press of 12th May has the following:

The appointment of a Canadian Minister Plenipotentiary at Washington is an interesting innovation about which it will be possible to comment intelligently when more information is available than was supplied in the very guarded statement read to the House of Commons on Monday by Sir George Foster.

And that is all the information we have.

Mr. King, the Opposition leader, expressed the view that before the arrangement—whatever it might prove to be—was made, Parliament should have been given the opportunity to discuss and consider it. However this may be, it is beyond dispute that it will be the duty of Parliament to submit the arrangement to very keen scrutiny to make sure that it is all that is being claimed for it. It will be within the right of Parliament to object, if it does not approve of what is being done; and any such recorded objection would bring the whole thing to the ground.

Meanwhile the need is for full and explicit information.

Does the hon. President of the Privy Council hear that statement?

MR. ROWELL: Yes.

MR. MACKENZIE KING: That is exactly what my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) is asking, that before this matter is consummated we get full and explicit information.

It is intimated that our Canadian Minister will deal with all matters arising between Canada and the United States which are exclusively Canadian in character; the Imperial Ambassador will participate in the negotiations only when Imperial interests are involved. Very well; but what happens if a disagreement should arise—which might easily happen—

Those are questions which any hon. gentleman sitting on the other side might reply to later in the evening, so that the country may get light on this subject as speedily as possible.

—between the Canadian Minister and the British Ambassador as to whether a question is, or is not, exclusively Canadian? Even in the exclusively Canadian matters, about which there is no dispute, will the Canadian Minister carry negotiations through to the end, or will it be necessary, in the final resort, to call in the British Minister to do the actual signing?

Our representative is to be known as a Minister. Will he be accepted as a Minister by the State Department at Washington? Will he be a member of the diplomatic corps, having all the rights, powers, immunities and privileges enjoyed by the Ministers of all other countries represented at Washington? Will he be the equal in diplomatic statute of, let us say, the Minister from Venezuela? Or will his position at Washington be actually undefined with a mere courtesy status? Parliament and the country will need conclusive answer to these and similar questions; and not until this information is supplied will it be possible to say whether this is a step forward or backward.

It is asserted in certain quarters that this marks an enlargement of Canadian powers and that it is another step forward on the road to nationhood. The Government at Ottawa no doubt believes that this will be the effect of the innovation. But we regard with some trepidation formal arrangements entered into three years after the adoption of a declared policy of equality of status between all the British nations, by which it is possible that Canada may accept, ratify and confirm a status of admitted diplomatic inferiority, formally putting her name to documents that confirm this subordination. If the Canadian Minister at Washington is only a camouflaged chief clerk or a commissioner it would be better to have no Minister there.

Those are not the words of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House; they are the words of the Winnipeg Free Press, which my hon. friend the President of the Privy Council so highly values.

MR. MURPHY: A Government authority.

MR. MACKENZIE KING: The article continues:

If his position there is by courtesy, if Canada cannot endow her representative with all the powers which other Ministers enjoy, then Canada should send no one to Washington until she can invest him with the true prerogatives of office.

Information upon these extremely important points is lacking; until it is forthcoming any conclusive judgment upon the wisdom or otherwise of the Government's action is not possible. But the matter is of great importance, and Parliament should regard it as one of its prime duties to see that the matter is fully discussed from all angles and in the light of full knowledge.

It is unnecessary to point out, Mr. Speaker, that that is exactly what we on this side of the House are asking should be done. In this resolution we are asking that Parliament should be informed in as much detail as possible in regard to this transaction before it is finally consummated.

But we have not only the views of our Canadian press. Since this announcement was made, there has been time for word to come from other parts of the Empire, and what do we find? In Great Britain, in Australia, and in the other Dominions we find expressions of opinion questioning the wisdom of this arrangement without any light or information upon it. Let me read from another leading daily, an organ of the present Government, the Montreal Star. That paper has a well-known correspondent in England, whose cables, published under the name of "Windermere," are read with interest in all parts of this country. And I should mention to the House that those who know "Windermere" know him to be a member of the British House of Commons. If one looks at the Montreal Star of 12th May one will find a despatch relating to the announcement which was made in this House on this subject and to a similar announcement made in the British House on the evening of the same day. That despatch was cabled by "Windermere." Omitting a few preliminary remarks, it says:

There is, nevertheless, widespread sympathy among Parliamentarians—Those are the members of the British Parliament.

—with the view recorded from Ottawa that so momentous a departure might well have been calmly and fully debated in Parliament, so that a momentous departure setting a precedent for a revolution in the whole machinery of British diplomacy in all countries could have been reviewed in all its aspects before the change was made. As it is, the change seems to the public as having been rushed.

Then referring to the Australian view, "Windermere" says:

An Australian of high rank whom I consulted assures me that Australia is now certain to demand that she also have full rank with an Australian Minister at Washington. New Zealand and South Africa should, he declared, follow suit, with the result that ultimately, not alone Washington, but every other great foreign capital, and certainly Paris, Rome, Berlin, Petrograd, and Tokio, will have its circle of fully-accredited British Empire Ministers among whom the British Ambassador will be first, perhaps, but first among equals. He added: "If the Canadian Minister at Washington is to be the fully-authorized British Ambassador in the absence of the British representative, we assume that the Australian Minister will be singled out for the same distinction in some equally important European capital, or, say, Japan."

"You Canadians claim that this is the national prayer and, indeed, the inevitable sequel to Canada's new national status as accorded at the Peace Conference. Very well! we as Australians throw up our hats with you, but don't run away with the notion that you have not perhaps unwittingly taken on far-reaching new responsibilities which every Dominion within the Empire will wish to take too, and which carries the seed of vital changes in the whole structure of an Empire."

"There was some cheering in the British Commons when Bonar Law announced the change. Most English public men welcome every sign of increasing power and influence of England's younger partners overseas, but I can quite understand the feeling of many long-sighted Englishmen and perhaps some Australians that before making this plunge into the unknown at the bidding of the Canadian Ministers, who, perhaps, only half appreciate its ultimate significance, it would have been wiser to discuss the whole subject round the friendly family table of the Imperial Conference. We could have all had our say then."

Will any one, viewing the affair of the British Empire from the point of view from which they are likely to be regarded by representatives of the British Isles and of the different Dominions, find anything unreasonable in a request of that kind? If our action in failing to discuss this matter openly and freely is going to create some unrest in Australia, South Africa and New Zealand, and some concern in England, surely we are not helping to bring about the closer relations between the different parts of the British Empire which it ought to be the object of every free Parliament within the Empire to bring about. There are very strong reasons why a transaction that is fraught with so many possibilities should not have been finally consummated until Parliament had had a full opportunity to discuss it in all its bearings.

When hon. members have referred to the debates that have taken place in this House they have spoken about a permanent representative at Washington. That is a subject upon which we might all be very much united, and it might well be that there might be no difference of opinion as to the propriety of having a permanent representative at Washington. If there were differences of opinion, surely it would be worth while having those differences discussed in Parliament and the case considered upon its merits. But what the Government have consummated in this transaction is something far different from a proposal to establish a permanent representative of Canada at Washington. It is not only a permanent representative that is proposed, but a Minister Plenipotentiary is to be appointed who, to all intents and purposes, is to be the British Ambassador at Washington during the time when the British Ambassador may be away from the country or absent from duty. No one can say how long a time that will be; no one can say what questions will come up while the Canadian plenipotentiary is acting as British Ambassador at Washington. Is there any one here who believes that a step of that kind is going to be free from all kinds of possible danger? What is it that has brought about the desire to have our own representative at Washington? It is that time and again we have taken exception to what British diplomatists at Washington have done on our behalf. Is our representative likely to be so perfect that he will always satisfy British opinion? Why not let British diplomatists manage British affairs and let us manage our own affairs? Then we will not get into those mix-ups and troubles that on occasions we have had reason to doubt the wisdom of British diplomatists voicing Canadian interests in matters between the United States and ourselves. Is it to be supposed that the time will never come when the people of Great Britain will not have reason to feel that their interests as watched by the Canadian Plenipotentiary acting as British Ambassador will not have been guarded in as satisfactory a way as they could have wished?

There are two extreme views that may be taken in regard to a matter of this kind. One is that the affairs of Canada should be managed exclusively by the British Embassy; the other that the Canadian representative should manage the British Embassy, as is here proposed, for part of the time. What seems to be the more rational course is the middle one, that in matters between Canada and other countries Canada should manage her own affairs, and that in matters between Great Britain and other countries, Great Britain should manage her own affairs, always when necessary with co-operation and conference between the two. At the present time, when the British Ambassador is absent, the British Charge d'affaires is responsible for the business of the Embassy. My right hon. friend had something to say about responsibility. Let us go into this matter a little. Sometimes it is necessary to recall an Ambassador. Let us assume that the British Minister is away and that it happens that the Canadian plenipotentiary has been acting when, perchance, a mistake is made. Whom are the British Government going to recall? Are they going to recall the Canadian Minister at Washington? They cannot do that: he does not belong there; he belongs here. Are they going to recall the British Ambassador? He is not responsible; he has had nothing to do with the transaction. These are complications which suggest themselves. Are these things not worth considering; are they of no concern to the future of the British Empire? They surely ought to be considered here as being matters intimately bound up with our relations with the Mother Country. We should have co-operative relations, relations by conference and discussion, but when it comes to so vital a matter as that of taking on the responsibilities that must come from the larger and vast considerations involved in this departure as proposed, I do not believe that, proud as the Canadian people are of their status as a nation, they would wish to have any representative of this country go to Washington and deal with questions that affect all parts of the British Empire in their relations with the United States, questions which may relate to the different countries of Europe, questions which may grow out of conflicting matters that come to the fore in connexion with the League of Nations, of which the United States is as yet not a member and may not be a member for some time to come.

I do not believe the Canadian people wish to launch too deep into experiments in foreign policy at the present time. All matters of government, and particularly matters affecting diplomatic relations, are matters of constitutional evolution. If we are going to advance, by all means let us proceed along the line of evolution; but let us take one step at a time. Do not let us begin with the extreme step that is being taken in this arrangement without any reference to the views of the representatives of the people. I submit to my right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden) that at this of all times it would have been fitting and in accordance with the rights of this Parliament, as it was owing to the supremacy of parliament and its position as a great deliberative assembly, before concluding anything, to have brought before this House a resolution expressing the opinion of the Government that Canada should be represented at Washington by a Minister Plenipotentiary and to have given hon. members an opportunity of deciding upon that question here. If the Government wished to go a step further and to say they desired that the Canadian Minister Plenipotentiary should be also the British Ambassador at Washington, for the time being, they might well have presented that view also in the form of a resolution and have given us an opportunity of discussing it here. That would not be ignoring Parliament, that would be leaving it to the Canadian people through their representatives to say what they wished to have done, but the Government has not done that; the Government has brought forward no resolutions. It has done all of its own volition.

The President of the Privy Council says: "We will give you a chance when it comes to voting the money." That is about the only time this Government ever comes to Parliament in regard to anything. We have had one measure after another during this session in regard to which we have been told: "No, the transaction is already settled, an Order in Council has been passed and all we want is that you should vote the money." That is all we have a chance to do. We have had Orders in Council and agreements placed on the Table and we have been told "we want you to ratify." Why? Because they cannot put these things into effect without money: money is needed, and they have to ask Parliament for it. But there is no chance for the people's representatives to discuss the merits of the transaction; everything is signed, sealed, and delivered; as it was with the Grand Trunk agreement, and as it is with this transaction. The only thing left is to vote the money. The Government simply says to its supporters: "You vote the money, you support the agreement, or we will go to the country and you will be out of your seats for good." The right hon. the Prime Minister smiles, but he knows perfectly well that he can go away for months and months and that when he comes back he will find his followers responding to every crack of the whip. The Government say: "You give us your support, or if not we will go to the country, and out you go." I think the time has come when the Government should recognize its responsibility to the people, and bring before this Parliament every transaction that has any bearing upon the future relations of Canada with other countries or that has to do with payments which our people will have to make.

Mr. Speaker, I might refer to many other points, but I think that what I have said will, perhaps, be sufficient to indicate that all we are asking in this resolution is that the supremacy of Parliament in matters that pertain to the well-being of the people shall be recognized and that is a wise request. It does not matter how far this transaction has gone at the present time; we still ask that this Parliament be given full information, and that it be given enough correspondence to let us see that at least there is something in writing about the matter. We do not know at the moment that the Government have even got a signed agreement as between the British Government and the Government of Canada, or as between the United States and this country. The Prime Minister says that we are to have nothing. Well, how this Parliament is to ratify or act upon nothing is a mystery that it is going to be difficult to explain; and until we get something that can be concretely seen and regarded not only by Parliament but by the people of the country we are justified, I think, in taking any course calculated to secure to the people their rights in this matter.

Now, in regard to the secrecy of this kind of diplomacy, the inability to bring down any correspondence, let me remind the House in regard to one subject that was mentioned here this evening—the Reciprocity agreement. My right hon. friend referred, I think, to the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's as having negotiated that treaty, and he compared the action of the Minister going to Washington on that occasion with the kind of action which will be expected of this Canadian Minister permanently resident at Washington. But what position did the Government of that day take in regard to the reciprocity agreement? Did they come and say to this Parliament: "We have made an agreement with the United States. It is signed, sealed and delivered; there is nothing for the Canadian people to do but to accept it, and vote whatever money is necessary to carry it out?" I think my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) will bear me out when I say that the ink on that agreement was not dry before he brought into Parliament the agreement itself and all the correspondence that related to it—laid before Parliament all the documents necessary for free discussion—and from Parliament the issue was carried to the people for their consideration, and was settled by the vote of the people themselves. That is parliamentary government, under the British system: recognizing the rights of Parliament and the rights of the people; and all that we ask in regard to this particular measure—which may have consequences more far-reaching and serious than any that have taken place in connexion with any of the measures referred to this evening—is that upon the present occasion a similar course shall be adopted. As it is, we are establishing a new precedent, and surely, in so doing, we should have all the information that we can possibly obtain. This is a question that relates to inter-Imperial and international relations, matters of foreign policy; and on such questions—even more than on matters of home policy—we should have the fullest information. We are entitled, for example, to know the status of the Minister in regard to all of these questions that have been raised in the editorial of the Winnipeg Free Press to which I have referred. The people, being called upon to pay the expense of this new office and position, are entitled to know how much it is going to cost and to what it is going to lead. Finally, let me say, Mr. Speaker, that we are entitled at this stage, of all times in the history of the world, in matters respecting our relations with other countries, to end secret diplomacy once and for all, and have our diplomacy open and above board or not have it at all.

RT. HON. SIR GEORGE FOSTER: Mr. Speaker, some time in the history, I believe, of every man it occurs that what seemed to him golden in the heated moment of discussion appears to him very much like lead when, an hour or two afterwards, he has cooled off. So, in the best of good spirit, I would suggest to my hon. friend who has just taken his seat, that when he reads his speech to-morrow, after he has cooled off, and looks at it coldly as it appears on the printed page, I doubt if he will be very proud of that speech. And I might also carry that suggestion a little bit further, and apply it to those hon. gentlemen who so valiantly applauded him—as to whether, reading the speech over in cold blood, they will think of it in exactly the same enthusiastic way in which they have applauded the speaker to-night.

AN HON. MEMBER: We shall be more enthusiastic.

MR. McMASTER: It will warm the blood.

AN HON. MEMBER: Much more so.

SIR GEORGE FOSTER: I can quite see that, and I will say it is no disadvantage to my hon. friends opposite, who have been so lethargic for so long a time, that they should have some warm blood pulsing their veins to let the country know they are really alive.

MR. CASGRAIN: What about yourself?

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

SIR GEORGE FOSTER: That is just by the way. I am not going to enter very lengthily into discussion of this matter to-night, but I will take up a few points that my hon. friend has made and see how much there really is in them.

In the first place, he made much of the statement, repeated over and over again, that the Government was denying information to the House and to the representatives of the people. That is always a favourite chord to touch when you want to arouse your followers—either in the House or out of it—on any particular subject; but how far was my hon. friend right in demanding the information which he demanded on this particular subject and at this particular time? After all my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding)—who has probably had one of the longest experiences in public life of any Canadian now in Parliament—knows that in all governments there are certain negotiations that take place, and it is impossible to make public the stages of those negotiations and their various phases whilst they are in progress; and a great deal of information—sometimes a very great deal—never is made public at all during the time when publicity might be harmful in many ways with reference to living statesmen in different countries who have been carrying the negotiations on, or with reference to the countries themselves whose interests have been under discussion. That is one of the things that every statesman and every Cabinet Minister of experience knows; it is simply a demand which is absolutely without good foundation, that certain things shall be known while negotiations are going on, or shall be made public, and that there shall be nothing secret, nothing confidential, nothing kept away from the view of the legislature or of the people—that everything shall be open—open diplomacy, as my hon. friend said. Now that position is nullified by actual fact and by actual practice in the experience of every statesman and every member of a government. In no case where Governments carry on international negotiations, even in these days when open diplomacy is in far greater vogue than it was in previous times, is the course of the negotiations step by step and from hour to hour made known to parliaments, legislators and the public of the different countries concerned. The events which have taken place during the last five years; the events which have taken place even since the Armistice have been one great proof of the impossibility of successfully carrying on negotiations of a delicate and complex nature, involving the prejudices, the policies, the national aspirations, of different countries, if every day the reporter puts before the public just what has taken place, what has been said and what has been concluded with reference thereto. You must draw a line somewhere; there must be a point beyond which you cannot go in publicity. After all, the chief thing is the conclusion that has been arrived at; the arrangement that has been actually made. If I buy a watch, the purpose which I had in mind is carried out when that watch keeps the correct time and enables me to ascertain the hour of the day by referring to it. But if I am curious to know how that watch is made up and I dig into its springs and its cogs and its general interior, I shall make impossible of achievement the very purpose and idea of the thing itself. As I say, the thing that has been actually come at as a conclusion is the thing that matters, and it is the gist of that which has been given to Parliament and which Parliament has a perfect right to know.

My hon. friend would raise this matter into a controversy between the autocracy of a Cabinet and the supremacy of Parliament. Now, that is an exaggerated method of expressing what is happening to-night with reference to the demand of our friends on the other side and the information which is being given by the Government. It is not a case of the autocracy of the Government against the supremacy of Parliament; it is a case of the proper co-ordination of the functions of Government and the functions of Parliament. My hon. friend says that we should have come down with a resolution affirming the principle that a trade commissioner should be sent to Washington—

MR. MACKENZIE KING: Not a trade commissioner; oh, no.

SIR GEORGE FOSTER: Or, if you want higher flights than that: a resolution that a Minister Plenipotentiary should be stationed at Washington. Then, he says, we should come down with another resolution stating that if it was considered best, that Minister Plenipotentiary sent to represent Canada at Washington should also be empowered to represent the British Government as its ambassador, if the British Government so desired. That was the way in which my hon. friend would approach the subject. Would he have got anywhere in approaching the subject in that way? Is it feasible? Is it practical? You must first proceed by way of negotiation, oral and otherwise, in order that the Governments concerned may test each other's views; in order to settle upon the modus operandi; what shall be the functions, what shall be the powers, what can be done in this respect and in that. Then, after you come to conclusions that are satisfactory to the two Governments you bring your conclusions to Parliament, and there it is that the supremacy of Parliament exerts itself. Parliament is then master of the situation. It can turn out the Government which has gone so far, if it considers it proper to do so. It can stop them at the point at which they give the information and not allow the proceeding to go further, if it considers it wise to do so. Parliament is, in the end, the supreme arbiter; nothing can be finally carried out without its approval. But my hon. friend would proceed in the way that he suggests. Did the party to which he belonged, and to which he still belongs, proceed in that way in respect to the reciprocity negotiations in 1911? Did they bring down to Parliament a resolution affirming that it would be a proper and right thing to send a delegation of ministers to Washington to undertake the negotiation of a treaty of reciprocity with the United States? I have no memory of a course like that having been adopted. And did they then come down with another resolution affirming that certain ministers should go down there as plenipotentiaries for the time being to work upon that principle, bring back an arrangement, and submit it to the House? Not at all. They did what was the practical thing; what was the customary thing, having regard to their prerogatives. They came to the conclusion that it would be a good thing to have a reciprocity treaty with the United States. They therefore sent their ministers to Washington to negotiate a treaty. We in the House of Commons knew nothing about it at that time—did not know what the terms of the treaty were; did not know how much they would give up; did not know how much they would get. The whole thing was done entirely behind our backs. While we were in perfect ignorance of what they were doing from hour to hour and day to day, they were proceeding to negotiate a binding commercial arrangement, a reciprocity treaty, which they would bring back and, if they could, put through the House; if they could not put it through the House they would, of course, take the responsibility and meet the fate which would attach to that responsibility. They went without the voice of Parliament or of the country behind them. They did their work; they brought back the result; and as soon as they asked the voice of Parliament and the voice of the country, they got their answer, as every Government will get theirs if their action is not in accordance with the wishes of the people.

When my hon. friend asserts that we should have proceeded as he suggests with reference to this negotiation, he did not back up what he said by pointing to like things that had been done by his own party. I do not find fault with his party for doing what they did in the case of the reciprocity negotiations. It was their prerogative; it was their right; they acted in a perfectly constitutional way. So in this matter, this Government have exercised their prerogative; they have proceeded with these negotiations; they have brought them to a point where finality has been reached in certain respects; they bring that arrangement back, and they submit it to Parliament. Parliament is supreme in this matter; Parliament is the arbiter of the whole thing.

The hon. gentleman stated that our position on this side of the House was: "When we demand information, you take the position that the representatives of the people in the House of Commons shall not see one whit of what passes, shall not know a thing of the negotiations that have taken place, shall not have all the papers or any of the papers placed before them for their information." That is not, as I stated, the main thing. The main thing is that the arrangement which has been up to this time concluded shall be in its essence and effect made known to the House of Commons, to the Parliament of Canada; and that is what has been done. My hon. friend had rather a grievance that I had stated that all available papers would be brought down. That is always the answer when demands are made for negotiable instruments of that kind. After negotiations have been carried on, when the papers are called for, you bring down the papers that it is in the public interest to bring down, and you are not obliged to bring down, neither is it understood that you shall bring down papers, the publicity of which would not be useful, which might, in fact, be disadvantageous to the general public interest, the international interest, the interest of the people of the countries involved. My hon. friend supported his demand by reading an extract from the Winnipeg Free Press, an organ of great power and intelligence, not by any means an organ of this Government, but an organ of public opinion which I, for my part, like to read and follow in so far as its suggestions are good. My hon. friend also read extracts from other papers. When he analyses really what these extracts from papers show as to the demand that is made and which is expressed in the extracts, it amounts to nothing more than this, that if an arrangement is made, before it is put into effect, Parliament and the country should know exactly what it is. But that is not at all a demand from the press or from those papers that every step of the negotiations, oral as well as written, shall be placed in print or in essence before Parliament. Any one knows that with delicate negotiations of this kind such a course would be neither advantageous or useful. Some one has made the statement—I think it was made in one of the extracts read by my hon. friend—that if we were to have under this arrangement nothing more at Washington than a glorified trade commissioner or a camouflaged chief clerk, the House and the country ought to know that. The House knows that, and the country knows it and will know it. It is not a glorified trade commissioner nor a camouflaged chief clerk who goes to Washington under this arrangement; it is a Minister Plenipotentiary, and the term itself designates the position and the power of the person who has that appointment. Therefore the anxiety of my hon. friend that we shall have at Washington something more than a glorified trade commissioner or a camouflaged chief clerk may be set at rest entirely in respect to that.

He has read also expressions of opinion voiced by contributors to newspapers in the Old Country and in or on the part of Australia, and he has raised many doubts and fears as to what will happen in all this. His counsel would have been that nothing should be done in respect to this matter until all had got together at a general conference in the Old Country and the matter had been talked over and conclusions reached. He also asks the question: What will happen in Washington when the Minister Plenipotentiary goes there in his dual capacity of representative of the interests of Canada and possibly of representative of the British Government in the absence of the British Ambassador? He also asks the question: What will happen and who will be responsible for him, for instance, when the Minister Plenipotentiary is carrying out his duties with reference to Canada and Canadian affairs, which in so far as they relate to the two countries, will be within his power? The Dominion of Canada is responsible for him in that capacity; he receives his instructions from the Dominion Government, and he acts in conformity with those instructions. That is plain and evident from the premises. Then the hon. gentleman asks: When the British Ambassador is absent and the Minister Plenipotentiary is acting as British Ambassador and in his place, who will be responsible for what he does then—will it be Canada or will it be Great Britain? Equally in that case, if he is standing in the place of the Ambassador in the absence of the regular incumbent, he is acting under instructions from the British Government, and he is responsible under those instructions to the British Government.

MR. McMASTER: Supposing the Prime Minister and the Government of this country gave him instructions diametrically opposed to the instructions given him by the Imperial or Home Government, what would happen?

SIR GEORGE FOSTER: There is not much necessity of asking what will happen then, because that never could happen.

MR. McMASTER: Such a thing is possible.

SIR GEORGE FOSTER: In so far as he is the Plenipotentiary for Canada and acting for Canada, he takes his instructions from the Canadian Government alone. In so far as he is acting as an Ambassador for the British Government in the absence of the regular Ambassador, he takes his instructions from the British Government, and he is responsible to that Government for the way in which he carries them out. That is as plain as it can be, so that what my hon. friend conjures up in his mind is an impossibility, a thing which cannot happen. But the alternative which was hinted at by my hon. friend has something appalling in it from another point of view. My hon. friend said: Let Canada manage her affairs with reference to the United States, and let Great Britain manage her affairs alone with reference to the United States, in so far as they touch the interests of Great Britain. If that is pushed to its extremity, is that co-operation? Does it not, when pressed to its logical conclusion, have in it the elements of danger in the future as to co-operation and continued unity and the solidarity of the Empire? It seems to me, and I think it will commend itself to my hon. friend, that if that is his alternative to the principle which has been adopted in the arrangement which has been made and laid before this Parliament, there are greater dangers to be apprehended in the future along that line than along the present line where in co-operation the two countries work together in unity, each having its special work to do under its special instructions from its own Government, and co-operating, as they can co-operate, in a spirit of unity and of good fellowship.

MR. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will recall that I coupled what I said in that connexion with the remark that there should always be co-operation and conference and discussion.

SIR GEORGE FOSTER: There is that exactly. There is, first, a clear definition of the powers. In matters of purely Canadian concern the Plenipotentiary takes his instructions from Canada, and he works under those instructions and is not instructed by the British Ambassador. Co-operation, counsels of wisdom and of experience, should, and I suppose always will be perfectly common between the two, but the British Ambassador does not interfere in respect to matters purely Canadian, and the Canadian Plenipotentiary does not interfere in matters purely of Imperial concern. At the same time, there may be the closest intimacy and unity of thought and of effort between the two. So I think there is no more danger in an arrangement based on conditions as they have been outlined to Parliament than there would be in following out my hon. friend's line.

My hon. friend made a very fine appeal to the sympathies of his friends on the other side of the House when he made the rather unwarranted assertion that the Government of Canada, the present Government particularly, never came down to the House except when it wanted money, and that then it came. My hon. friend knows that that is an exaggerated statement. He also knows that there are few things which can be carried out in the way of public policy or public enterprise, initiated or aided by a government, which do not require for their carrying out to have money placed at the disposal of the Government. That is the privilege which Parliament holds. It holds the power of the money vote; and of course it is always necessary to come to Parliament for money in order to carry out the policies and the enterprises initiated through the Government and by the Government. But does not my hon. friend think that he made rather a catch-penny argument when he so strongly and so enthusiastically put it as a point of disadvantage to the Government that they never came to Parliament unless they wanted money? As Parliament holds the purse-strings it is absolutely impossible for any government in connexion with any governmental policy, or any governmental enterprise, begun, initiated, and brought to a certain point by the Government as the committee of Parliament, not to come ultimately to Parliament and the House of Commons for the wherewithal to carry those policies and those enterprises through. My hon. friend need only look at the history and experience of his own party to know that governments do act in that way, and to take that responsibility. Take the project of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, for instance. Read its history, let your memory stray over the initiatory processes of that undertaking, the effects of which still remain with us, and will for many a generation. I suppose any one might have made the same statement with regard to the Government of that day, that they only came to Parliament in respect to this great transaction, involving almost unlimited expenditure, after they had negotiated, signed, and practically sealed the arrangement with the companies with whom they made the bargain. Governments do act that way. They take that responsibility, and they carry out their measures through that medium. They must in the end always come to Parliament for its sanction before any of these enterprises can be carried through to completion.

My hon. friend in the end, as an argument often addressed and an appeal often made, says that in this age we should have no more secret diplomacy. Now what does he really mean by that? When he as the leader of a government carries on the affairs of this country, will he undertake to live by that rule of policy, that there shall be nothing undertaken by the Government in its transactions with Japan, in its transactions with China, in its transactions with France, in its transactions with any other country in the world with which it comes into contact daily, and where delicate questions arise involving negotiation and careful and wise counsels—will he abide by his rule that before he undertakes to write a communication to a foreign government he will come down to Parliament and make plain to Parliament and the country just what he is going to write and get the approval of Parliament and the country before he undertakes to do it? Will everything be open, no secrecy, nothing kept back, but from the very start every transaction made public to the legislature of the country and to the people of the country and to the world? I venture to say that my hon. friend will never lead a government along those lines, or, if he attempts it, he will never lead a government successfully. Under the constitution of things as they are in the world, that cannot be done, and it will never be possible for it to be done so long as there are conflicting and opposing interests between different countries of the world.

My hon. friend, I hope, will not be altogether too unquiet with reference to this matter. Has he not conjured up possibilities which have very little foundation in fact? You could, with reference to any policy, at any time within the last eighty years, and with reference to every advance that has taken place in the constitutional development of Great Britain and of her Overseas Dominions and Dependencies—you could have conjured up the same difficulties, made the same suppositions in order to prejudice or to oppose or to balk, the development along certain lines of progress. You could have always done that, and it has always been done. But the supreme fact in the constitutional progress and growth of the British Empire and of its outlying parts has been that these successive steps have been taken, each one adding liberty, power, and importance to the outlying portions, each step also adding strength, unity and solidarity to the Empire fabric as a whole, and that the fears of the timid fortunately did not outweigh the strong inspiration and hope of the courageous ones who took the part that progress seemed to indicate and trusted to the good sense, the strength and the capacity of the people of the Empire to guide in ways that would be advantageous and to avoid results that would be hurtful. And so the whole history of British constitutional development has passed on from step to step. I for one can see that in any new arrangement bearing within it responsibilities such as this arrangement bears, there may be about it eventualities that may well give us pause, but it is for the good sense, the wise counsel, the steady and cool judgment of the British people—qualities which have been such distinctive features of their progress in the past—to maintain their sway in the future and to guide along proper and safe lines for every one of these opening developments towards greater power, greater importance, greater liberty and consequently greater happiness for the Empire as a whole and for its constituent parts.

HON. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): I have felt a great deal of interest in the official explanation given by the right hon. gentleman (Sir Robert Borden) and by his colleagues on the treasury benches, Mr. Speaker, as regards the appointment of a Minister at Washington, but it seems to me that this question is a very simple one. We have discussed this evening the merits of the case, while the whole point is a question of procedure. And I believe, Sir, that the amendment which has been offered by my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) asserts the only principle which ought to be adhered to by both parties in this House, because long ago the battle for responsible government was won in this country. After carefully reading the amendment, whose words are well weighed, I wondered why there should be any division of opinion in this House as regards its merits. Because, I repeat, it asserts a principle which embodies a golden rule for the government of Canada.

I do not understand the objections which have been made by my right hon. friend, the last speaker (Sir George Foster), to this amendment, unless the right hon. gentleman has still the notions of fifty years ago. Those of us who are students of Canadian history—and we are all students of the history of our country—know that in the early forties and before as the fight was carried on by the friends of responsible government, they were denounced at every turn by the members of the Family Compact. The members of the Family Compact in those days spoke against Baldwin and William Lyon Mackenzie, as my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke this evening against the grandson of William Lyon Mackenzie (Mr. Mackenzie King) and against the member for Shelburne and Queen's. In those days, as to-night, the friends of responsible government wanted to exact from the government of the day the correspondence, the information, the whys and the wherefores of the policies of the Government, but the governor of the day, who in himself constituted the whole government, Sir Francis Bond Head, speaking of his critics, said: "They think they are the friends of responsible government, whilst at heart they are only disloyal." But he lived long enough to see responsible government firmly rooted in Canadian soil, and I am somewhat surprised that seventy-five years afterwards we find a Canadian Minister and a Canadian Government reviving the same old reactionary policy as was advocated by Sir Francis Bond Head in those far-off days.

The Government, Sir, do not seem to be very free with information; on the contrary, they seem to be very secretive indeed. But they live in a fool's paradise if they think, because during the five strenuous years of the War the people of Canada and the Parliament of this Dominion in a very generous, yes, in a chivalrous way, gave them a mandate to carry on, that they can continue the war system now that the glamour of war has gone. I repeat, they are living in a fool's paradise, because if there is one principle which has triumphed as a result of the great world conflict, it is that the people must be represented by its elected representatives, and that the people should be trusted.

My friend, who is fond of a little story at times, will remember that in the old days of the kingdom of Poland there was a king named Auguste. He had, as my hon. friend had some years ago, his "moments of weakness"—his being different from those of my hon. friend in that they resulted from a fondness of spirits. King Auguste, when he was particularly drunk, would say, "All Poland is now intoxicated." Well, when my hon. friend has the information served to him in council by the Prime Minister as to the whys and wherefores of the appointment of a semi-ambassador at Washington, he thinks that all Canada is informed and ought to be satisfied.

The right hon. gentleman told us that he had many very serious conversations with the Secretary of State for the Colonies in London regarding impending changes in our national status. I accept his word, Sir: I do not doubt that he had many very serious conversations with Lord Milner. But let me say, with all due respect to Lord Milner's great ability as an Imperial statesman, that if the status of Canada was altered as a result of the conversations of our Prime Minister with Lord Milner, that status was not altered on the maximum line but on the minimum.

Indeed, the Ministers of the Crown during the last five years have so often been away from Canada, have so often approached the round-table clubs and the Imperial conferences, have kept so near Mr. Lloyd George, Mr. Balfour and the great Imperial statesmen that they have come to believe that they are no more responsible to that little country, to that little dominion, to that little colony, Canada, but that they are only responsible to the Imperialistic party over in England.

My hon. friend the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) said that he had given all the information last year and that we on this side of the House had been perfectly satisfied with his answers. As regards my humble self, let me correct my hon. friend. When the item for a representative at Washington came up for discussion before the House, speaking of Sir Charles Gordon, who is a respected citizen of Montreal and one of the great captains of industry, I said that he had been during the War an excellent trade commissioner for Canada, had advertised our country, had built up financial and other friendships with the United States, and that if a trade commissioner were to be appointed in Washington I would like to see him continue in the performance of these functions. But I spoke of a trade commissioner, not of a semi-ambassador—a semi-ready ambassador—or a minister plenipotentiary. My hon. friend stated that he had accepted his explanation. My hon. friend who sits at my right (Mr. McKenzie) expressed then the views of His Majesty's loyal Opposition. He said:

Is the establishment of new relations between this country and a foreign country, although that foreign country is a neighbour, not of such importance that it should be dealt with by Parliament, and that the will of the people as represented by Parliament should be ascertained upon such a question?

Further,

These relations are of such an important character that the whole policy of the Government should be embodied in concrete legislation and thoroughly threshed out before being put into force.

In these wise words my hon. friend put the gist of the amendment which is being offered to the House this evening by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's. But we are told that this is not merely a trade commissioner, that we are not going to appoint at Washington a High Commissioner such as we have in London, and such as we have in a modified form in Paris, but that we will have in the future a Minister Plenipotentiary. I have nothing to teach my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) in international law; I cannot give him any lesson in the English language because he is a perfect master of language, but will he tell me in all seriousness that Canada, as a Dominion, has the right to appoint in a foreign country a minister plenipotentiary, and does he not know that in international law only independent people and independent countries can appoint ministers plenipotentiary and ambassadors? You cannot appoint a consul. I dare say that the British Consul in Washington will have more power and influence than the Canadian Minister Plenipotentiary. Why, Sir, I have been in Europe of late, and heaven knows what troubles we have with passports in moving from one country to another. Could I get my passport viséd by the High Commissioner in London? Could I get my passport viséd by the Canadian Agent in Paris? No, Mr. Speaker, I had to go to the British Consul, and so it will be at Washington; we will have to go to the British Consul.

What is the use of camouflaging this whole question before the Canadian people? The full import of this is that hon. gentlemen during five years of war have carried on in the name, and on behalf, of the Canadian people. The name of Canada has loomed great on the horizon. The name of Canada was never greater than it is to-day as a result of the War, but the status of Canada was not changed on account of the War. These hon. gentlemen, in order to justify the extravagance of the Government during these five years, are preparing another balloon for the Canadian people: "We have secured recognition as an international power; we have got a new status; we have a Minister Plenipotentiary at Washington; hail, hail, the people of Canada, come ye brave electors unto the polls and vote one more for the progressive Tory party!" That is the full import of this question: nothing else.

True—and I make the statement in perfect good faith—there are already forebodings, there are tidings which are teaching my hon. friends that it is not wise to play with fire, and you are only playing with fire on this issue. You are not sincere, you are not serious, but the people of Canada, who are sincere, who realize what their status is, who apprehend the dangers they are running in playing at diplomacy—the people of Canada are already telling you that you are doing wrong in this matter.

When I was in London the other day we had what I believe is the opinion of the people of Ontario, at least of the great city of Toronto. It was in the form of a long letter, written, no doubt, by Sir John Willison, criticizing bitterly his friends of the present Government for playing at diplomacy, because, as the London Times said through its correspondent, this whole question has been treated very mysteriously. The status of Canada has not changed. We maintain the best of relations with the United States. What the people of Canada are in need of to-day in Washington is a keen trade commissioner, looking for wider markets in the United States. We are anxious to do business with the United States, and we want an alert commissioner to stir up business between the two countries and to open new channels.

The Times, of London, printed that in substance, and I can send the warning to my hon. friend, if he wishes to read it. No, Mr. Speaker, the Government is not sincere, and it ought to know—at least the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who has had a long and honourable career in the Canadian ministry, ought to know—that by the appointment of that semi-ambassador, of that so-called Minister Plenipotentiary, Canada sooner or later may be involved in grave international problems.

MR. BURNHAM: May I ask the hon. gentleman—

MR. LEMIEUX: No, you may not ask. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be discourteous to my hon. friend, but he will please put his question a little later on when I am through with this part of my argument. My hon. friend thinks that everything will be very smooth: the British Ambassador will look after Great Britain's affairs, and the Canadian Minister will look after Canadian affairs, and will receive instructions from Ottawa, and Ottawa only; but at times during the absence of Sir Auckland Geddes, the Canadian Minister Plenipotentiary may sit at the desk of Sir Auckland, and may then carry on the affairs of Great Britain. Sir, is it not possible, does it not strike my hon. friend's mind, that conflicts of interests are likely to happen and to arise between even the Mother Country and Canada? Have they not arisen in the past, Mr. Speaker? I have here the life of Sir John A. Macdonald, but I will not weary the House by reading the chapter concerning the Fisheries Treaty. My hon. friend probably knows by heart that famous despatch of Sir John A. Macdonald, when he told the Canadian people about his impressions of the British representatives who sat with him at the conference at Washington who were so anxious to sign a treaty even though the interests of Canada were discarded. My hon. friend should remember the gloom that one morning descended over the halls of the Canadian Parliament when the Alaskan boundary award was known. On that commission the Canadian representatives were associated with a British representative appointed by the British Government. Do you remember, Mr. Speaker, that morning when the award was made known to Parliament? If we ever regretted an occasion and an association to discuss interests which were dear to the heart of Canada, it was that occasion and that association. We all know that Lord Alverston, who at first committed himself in favour of Canada, soon took another course and joined the American majority. No, Mr. Speaker, if you read the history of our difficulties, of our interests—as between Canada and the United States—you come to this conclusion that the best way to settle them is to settle them ourselves and not be associated with others.

MR. BURNHAM: I rise to a point of order.

MR. LEMIEUX: What is the point at issue?

MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman has risen to a point of order, will he please state the point?

MR. BURNHAM: My point of order is that no debate can take place or no amendment be moved on an item in the Estimates.

MR. SPEAKER: I know there is a rule of the House to the effect that there can be no debate upon an item in the Estimates, but I do not think the present amendment can properly be brought within the sphere of that rule. The debate, it is true, involves the principle of representation at Washington, in a measure; but the amendment calls for the production of papers and generally asks for delay. It is possible that there may be a certain amount of discussion which would infringe the rule referred to, but it does not seem to me that the substance and in the main, the purport of the amendment comes within the rule that the hon. gentleman has in mind.

MR. LEMIEUX: Mr. Speaker, this is not an amendment to an item in the Estimates. It is an amendment before going into Committee of Supply.

SIR GEORGE FOSTER: Committee of Ways and Means.

MR. LEMIEUX: Mr. Speaker, I think that Canada is liable to be involved in this game of diplomacy, of pseudo-diplomacy. What will happen? My hon. friend says that the Canadian representative and the British representative, living possibly under the same roof in the same Embassy, will replace each other at different times. My hon. friend very well knows that cases like the one which occurred in the eighties are liable to happen at any time. My hon. friend will remember that the British Ambassador to the United States in the eighties, when Mr. Cleveland was a candidate in the presidential election, expressed his views about that election in a letter written to a friend. It created quite a hubbub in the United States. The incident occurred on the eve of a presidential election when, as my hon. friend knows, some Americans are very fond of twisting the Lion's tail. The British Ambassador was recalled, and had to retire to Great Britain, and there was a state of excitement for a while. In such a case as that would the Canadian minister be also told to go back to his own country? My hon. friend can see that living together—the one acting for the other as he described this evening—Canada is liable to come to grief on many and many questions, some indifferent, some insignificant by themselves. My hon. friend asks what are we doing otherwise than the hon. gentleman himself—the mover of the amendment—did, when he went to Washington in 1911 and discussed not a treaty but a pact which was liable to be recalled at any time by the notice of either of the parties to it.

My hon. friend said, speaking of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, "You went to Washington." Yes, the hon. gentleman went to Washington, and ten years afterwards my hon. friend can smile over the campaign which took place over that visit. You remember, Mr. Speaker, how the hon. gentleman, with his late colleague, Mr. Paterson, was represented as being an old and feeble minister, who had lost all strength and could not carry the burden, the immense burden he had on his shoulders on that occasion. Well, ten years have elapsed and, judging from the speech which he delivered here this evening, the member for Shelburne and Queen's is still there, Mr. Speaker. And what is most interesting is that those who made these foolish appeals against "truck and trade" with the United States; those who for a while played with fire, have since practically adopted that very policy. The policies advocated by my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) under the head of reciprocity have been carried out by the right hon. gentleman.

MR. SPEAKER: Order.

MR. LEMIEUX: You were not in the chair, Mr. Speaker, when reciprocity was first mentioned in this debate. Had you been in the chair, I am sure that, knowing as you do by long experience that a word is sometimes as magic and may give rise to a long debate, you would have stopped my hon. friend who sits opposite. We have, my right hon. friend says, by secret correspondence and secret pourparlers settled the Status of Canada. We have appointed a Minister Plenipotentiary, but we have no information to give to the House: the people's representatives are not entitled to full information. Then, turning to the mover of the amendment, he says: You did the same with the reciprocity treaty—which, Mr. Speaker, was not a treaty. I say to my hon. friend—

MR. SPEAKER: There is no objection to referring to the manner in which the reciprocity agreement was negotiated. That is one thing, but it is quite a different thing to discuss the merits of reciprocity itself and its effect.

MR. LEMIEUX: To be sure, Mr. Speaker, I will avoid that rock; I will not resurrect the issue of 1911. But my hon. friend says that all was secret in the proceedings with regard to reciprocity. If I remember well, we discussed it openly in the House of Commons. The agreement was laid on the Table; the House was dissolved in the old Liberal fashion and the people were called upon to pass the proposal. Moreover, the question was not a new one; it was as old as Confederation. My right hon. friend was not in the House in 1879, but he knows that Sir John A. Macdonald inserted in his famous tariff resolutions of 1879 a standing offer in the name of the Canadian people to the United States respecting reciprocity—an offer, you will note, made by the Tory party. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will leave reciprocity alone.

With regard to any item of expenditure, whether it be for a thousand dollars or a million dollars, the humblest member of this House has the right to move for a return asking that the correspondence, the statistics, the information, be laid on the Table of the House. It can be made the subject of debate, and under our Parliamentary procedure the ministers responsible are obliged to lay on the Table a return giving the whole of that information. But apparently the hon. gentleman has been so much accustomed during the last five years to govern in the old Tory fashion, at his own sweet will, without any regard for the people, that he thinks that the appointment of an Ambassador to Washington, a change in the status of Canada, can be made without regard to the representatives of the Canadian people. Mr. Speaker, we hear so much about our relations with the Mother Country having been so greatly changed during the War; about a new status having been given to Canada, when still ringing in our ears we have the words of that master of the English tongue, that master mind, perhaps the most marvellous student of parliamentary government, Mr. Asquith, who, answering the Prime Minister of New Zealand in 1911, stated in his own blunt English way that as regards foreign affairs the responsibilities of Great Britain could not be shared with the Dominions. Why, that is the A B C of international law. And, Mr. Speaker, lest my language should appear severe; lest my language should appear, perhaps, disloyal, let me once more read to my hon. friend the advice which was tendered to the Canadian people by one of the greatest men Canada ever produced—by that old statesman who during his last election uttered those remarkable words which carried him through to success: "A British subject I was born, a British subject I will die"—Sir John A. Macdonald. Speaking one day of all those Imperialistic apostles, of all those framers of new constitutions for Canada, he said in his own cynical and witty way:

I am, so far as that question goes, up to the handle a home-ruler. We will govern our own country. We will put on the taxes ourselves. If we choose to misgovern ourselves—

As we do now, unfortunately.

—we will do so, and we do not desire England, Ireland or Scotland to tell us we are fools. We will say: If we are fools we will keep our folly to ourselves; you will not be the worse for it and we will not be the worse for any folly of yours.

Mr. Speaker, those words bristle with wisdom and with common sense. Do not meddle in the affairs of the Mother Country, and the Mother Country will let us govern ourselves. We have governed ourselves during the last seventy-five years according to British traditions, according to the best constitutional usages. Do not accustom the people to unwise words. Do not accustom the people to think that the Ministers of the Canadian Government are viewing with a light heart the loosening of the moorings which bind us to the Mother Country. Speaking for myself, Sir, and for my electors in the old province of Quebec, I am satisfied with my lot; I do not care for any change brought about by the policy of Lord Milner and by a Tory Government. Let Providence shape our destiny; let us not get into entanglements for the pleasure of having, supposedly, a Canadian Minister Plenipotentiary, but which, as that Unionist paper, the Winnipeg Free Press, so well said, will be nothing more or less than a camouflaged chief clerk.

RT. HON. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to take part in this debate, I frankly admit, because it seems to me that at this stage nothing further need be said to make quite clear the futility of the proposed amendment and to make not only the members of this House but the people of Canada realize how hon. gentlemen opposite, failing entirely to find a basis for this amendment in any matter of fact, have been reduced one after another to struggling with their imagination in an endeavour to conjure up untold evils that we are to apprehend, because there has been laid before the House in full the result of what this Government has done in co-operation with the Government of the United Kingdom and with the acceptance of the Government of the United States. In this competition of imaginative powers I am sure the speakers opposite who have preceded me will find no fault nor complaint that I am doing them an injustice, great as their achievements in the exercise of their imaginative powers have been, when I award the palm to my very good friend the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux). To lay the foundation of this edifice of terror which he has been at such pains to build up, the hon. gentleman had to carry us back—he is very fond of carrying us back—to the time in 1847—or 1848, was it?—when we had in this country a struggle for responsible government. That struggle for responsible government seems to haunt the hon. member's waking hours, and I often wonder whether it breaks in even upon his slumbers. He is so constantly in a state of terror, beholding this country on the brink of an abyss to which nothing is comparable but the condition and the danger to which it was exposed in 1847. He is living still away back in 1847, surrounded with the dangers of 1847, living in the Canada of 1847, the Canada that must have been so horrible a place to live in since it was perpetually haunted by that most awful of spooks, the Family Compact. The hon. gentleman is still in dread and terror of the Family Compact that went to its rest so very many years ago and that has long ceased to trouble the waking thoughts or the sleeping dreams of ordinary, sane Canadians who have grown up with their country and who have been conscious of their country's growth. The hon. gentleman says: Responsible Government is in peril. Why? Because the responsible Government of Canada, having advised His Majesty, as it is the proper function of responsible Ministers to do, that the time has come when Canada might very properly transact her business with her next-door neighbour, and having found that His Majesty's Government said: "Why, certainly that is perfectly obvious; everybody recognizes that"; and that the Government of the United States said: "Why, certainly, your representative will be most welcome"—the Government, as I say, having given that advice and having met with that reception, has come back to this Parliament and told this Parliament the totality of what it has done. Therefore, he says, the constitution is in danger. Why, here is this responsible Government right before this Parliament, the representatives of the people. If, in doing that, this Government has done anything which the people's representatives do not approve, let the hon. gentleman calm his fears; we are here in the hands of Parliament which the people of Canada elected, and if the people's representatives do not approve this thing, clear and plain as it is on its face, of which they have been fully informed, let them exercise their constitutional authority, and neither the Parliament nor the people of Canada will be for one moment bound by anything that has been done. Where is the danger to constitutional Government?

The leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) said that the great question involved was the supremacy of Parliament on the one hand or the autocracy of the Cabinet on the other. In that expression he ran the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) a very close second in evidence of powers of imagination. The autocracy of the Cabinet that stands here before Parliament to accept its judgment! Where is the supremacy? To-night the supremacy is in the hands of this Parliament to which we have told what we have done. If this Parliament thinks we have done right, well and good. If this Parliament thinks we have done wrong, it is in its hands to correct the wrong. Let me point this out. Hon. gentlemen have told us that they keep for another occasion their objections to what we have done; they will not to-night even question the wisdom of what we have done; they are satisfied to question the amount of information that they have received. It is a fair inference that on the information they have received they find no ground to question the wisdom of what we have done. It is true that while they have professed not to be questioning the wisdom of what we have done, they have wandered away—I think my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) was a particularly great sinner in that regard—from the subject of this sparsity of information and have indulged in some condemnation of the action itself. But the amendment—they are quite right in that regard—does not raise the question of the wisdom of the action itself; it does not attack it, it does not question it, and I do not think it will be unfair if I suggest that they do not question the wisdom of that action, because they, like us, are absolutely satisfied that it will meet with the approval of the Canadian people. The hon. gentleman is worried about the whys and the wherefores. If the hon. gentleman does not know the whys and the wherefores which justify Canada attending to her own business, the people of Canada know all about them, and do not need to be told them over again. There are some things so obvious, there are some things so much a matter of common knowledge, that they do not call for repetition, and I am telling no secrets if I say that in the correspondence that did take place there is no discussion of whys and wherefores. The thing itself in principle nobody disputes, and the Canadian people will not dispute it.

Now the hon. gentleman—and I should like to relieve his mind in this regard, because I would be sorry that he should lose his sleep to-night—is much perturbed by a ghost that walks often in his imagination, the ghost of somebody's mysterious efforts to create a system of Imperialism that in some way or other is going to deprive us of our Canadian autonomy. He is so subject to the visits of that troublesome ghost that it comes between him and every step that goes to confirm and extend the autonomous powers of this country. Every time a step of that kind is taken, this ghost passes across the line of vision that intervenes between my hon. friend and his advancing country, and he sees Imperialism; he sees something that is going to deprive us of our right to uphold our own self-government, something that is going to involve us in frightful responsibilities, and then he winds it all up by seeing in the very same thing something that is going to loosen the bonds that bind this country to the Mother Country and hold together the great commonwealth of nations that we call the British Empire. Now I would, if I could, do something to allay his apprehensions in this regard. I would ask him if he were not making a speech, if he did not feel called upon to find words of condemnation of some action of this Government, but were engaged in the ordinary application of his common sense—I would ask him how he sees in the fact that Canada is going to provide a Canadian appointed by His Majesty upon the advice of the Canadian Government to be the channel of communication between Canada and the United States, a danger to Canada's autonomy.

He has told us that this proposal is all camouflage, that Canada could not appoint a Minister Plenipotentiary, that none but an independent country could appoint a Minister Plenipotentiary. Well, now, Canada is not going to appoint a Minister Plenipotentiary, but His Majesty the King, who is the King of Canada just as much as he is the King of the United Kingdom, upon the advice of his constitutional Canadian advisers is going to appoint a Minister Plenipotentiary to be his representative at Washington, his delegate to the United States, so far as Canadian matters are concerned; and with all respect to the hon. gentleman's profound knowledge of international law, and the readiness with which he tells us that upon this side of the House we do not know the A B C of international law I venture to say to him that he will find no competent international lawyer who will question the power of His Majesty the King to appoint a Minister Plenipotentiary in the right of his Dominion of Canada. May I also tell him, since he seems to be singularly oblivious of the things that have been happening under all our eyes, that at the Peace Conference His Majesty exercised that power and did the thing that the hon. gentleman says that anybody who knows the A B C of international law would know he could not do. He did it, and those Canadian Plenipotentiaries, in that quality of Minister Plenipotentiary, walked into the gathering of Ministers Plenipotentiary representing the states of the civilized world and were received and seated there on a footing of equality with His Majesty's Ministers Plenipotentiary representing the United Kingdom, with the Ministers Plenipotentiary representing the United States, with the Ministers Plenipotentiary representing France, Belgium and all the nations of the earth. Yet the hon. gentleman says that if he knew the A B C of international law we would know that Canada could not have a Minister Plenipotentiary. Now Canada has had Ministers Plenipotentiary. His Majesty named them upon the advice of his Canadian Ministers, and His Majesty will name a Minister Plenipotentiary to go to Washington to be his representative there for the direction of purely Canadian affairs, and that Minister Plenipotentiary will be Canada's Minister Plenipotentiary, the hon. gentleman's profound knowledge of international law to the contrary notwithstanding. The A B C of international law is away back in that past in which the hon. gentleman lives. It is prior to 1847, where dwell the spooks that trouble his days and his nights. It is very far back. Might I suggest to the hon. gentleman that he cast his eye on what I might describe as the X Y Z of international law, on the latest developments, and then he will find to his great gratification that his country stands to-day in a position in which it is quite possible for her to have a Minister Plenipotentiary standing side by side with other Ministers Plenipotentiary on a footing of equality. I might say to my hon. friend, as he talks to us about the A B C of international law, that this is not the only known case. When the German Empire was at the height of its power Bavaria and several other countries had their distinct Ministers. It is not at all an impossible thing that within one state, within one great international empire, you may have a number of nations, all capable of figuring in the society of nations.

The hon. gentleman is very apprehensive of what is going to happen when there comes to be a conflict of interests, as he says there may be, and he imagines it may come at a time when the British Ambassador has gone home to England. During his absence there comes to be a conflict of interest between Canada and the Mother Country or some other portion of the Empire, and the hon. gentleman is appalled as to what is going to happen.

Why, I think he would give the Canadian representative, or the British Ambassador, if he should be acting alone, credit for a little common sense; and most assuredly, if the hon. gentleman himself were representing Canada under those circumstances, I would have the most implicit trust in him that he would realize that in a conflict of interests it would be the duty of both Ambassadors to refer the matter to their respective Governments. Then it would be for the Governments of the self-governing nations of the Empire to get together and give instructions to their respective representatives, and above all to give to the representative of the British Empire, the instructions that rest upon the conclusions coming from the consultation of all the nations of the British Empire. The hon. gentleman need not be anxious, I think, upon that ground.

Now, the hon. gentleman gave us grave warning about playing with fire. He is so anxious that we should attend to our own affairs and do our own governing, and he has a horror of the old Tory days of the Family Compact and, I suppose of government from Downing Street. But what does he quote as a warning? What the London Times says.

MR. LEMIEUX: The Canadian correspondent.

MR. DOHERTY: Yes, the Canadian correspondent of the London Times. He thought that we were playing with fire and that there were grave dangers—I do not remember the exact words—involved in playing at diplomacy. With all respect to Sir John Willison, we are not playing with diplomacy; and with all respect to the hon. gentleman who is now evidently so devout a follower of Sir John Willison—seeing that he hangs on the words of wisdom dropping from the knight's mouth—we are not playing at diplomacy at all; we are getting back to the very simple position that I mentioned at the outset where Canadian business with the American people, our next-door neighbours, will be transacted—in all the forms of diplomacy if you will, as it must be—through a Canadian appointed by His Majesty upon the advice of the Canadian Government. If that can be anything else than a rounding out of our powers of self-government, I am at a loss to imagine what it can be.

The hon. gentleman sees us involved in grave international troubles. There once was a British Ambassador at Washington who wrote a letter about their elections that the American people did not like, and the British Government recalled him. Now, on the hon. gentleman's advice, because we run that frightful risk, we should drop this project at once, because perhaps at some time our Canadian representative may write a letter that the American people may not like! And notwithstanding, if I accept his own view, that he was at such pains to point out to us the different occasions upon which our interests suffered because they were in the hands of exclusively British representatives, we must be on our guard not to have any representative of our own. The hon. gentleman was at pains to recall the Alaskan arbitration board, and pointed out the change made by the British member on that board. To what end? To warn us to have no representative of our own. After pointing out that if we had not had two representatives of our own upon that tribunal we would have had no one to support our view, he says: You see, the British representative turned against Canada; the conclusion is, be careful never to be represented by any Canadian; always be represented by exclusively British representatives, because there have been British representatives who have abandoned Canada's interests. I am not going to discuss whether there have been such British representatives, but out of the hon. gentleman's own mouth, if his statement be correct, comes the most conclusive argument why we ought to see to it that we have representatives of our own.

The hon. gentleman made a great contrast between what happened on the reciprocity treaty and on this matter, how openly they acted upon that treaty—just as openly as we are here to-night discussing this agreement—after it was made they brought it in and submitted it to Parliament.

MR. LEMIEUX: And the correspondence.

MR. DOHERTY: Yes, they brought in the correspondence, and if there had been correspondence here of a nature to be useful in connexion with this discussion, it might very well have been produced. But there is the question: How is the correspondence going to affect the question whether what has been done was the right thing to do or the wrong thing to do. That is the thing we did, that is the thing which is here for the fullest and freest discussion by hon. members and the people of Canada, and that is the thing for which we are responsible, and for which we are proud to be responsible, and for which we fear neither the verdict of this House nor the verdict of the people of this Dominion.

Now, the hon. gentleman is very much excited about what he calls the "hollow farce" of our status. No one has claimed that this particular arrangement has changed our status; it is the evidence of a change of status that has come as the result of a gradual growth. With regard to what happened during the War, I would say this: that the magnificent achievements of our soldiers, and the magnificent achievements of the Canadian people, did not change our status, but made manifest to the world and commanded on the part of the world recognition of the fact that we had attained a real national status. That is what has come: that recognition and the responsibility which accompanies it. This arrangement is another evidence of it. And yet the hon. gentleman talks about it as a hollow farce!

Why is it that hon. gentlemen are so frightened that the country should ever leave the national apron-strings? I presume they must be glad to see her growth, yet they do not want her to have the privileges and the responsibilities that come from growth; they are in a corner frightened at shadows, seeing on every side impending dangers, and shrinking back from the manhood—if I may change the sex of our country for the moment—that has come to this Canada at last.

What would any man think of his son who, having reached the status of manhood, would say: "It is true I am a man, with the developed force and reasoning power of a man, with the right of being consulted about common matters that belong to the status of a man; but no, Mother, please let me keep a good strong hold of your apron-strings; because, you see, if I acknowledge manhood I might have to carry the responsibilities of manhood; there might even come a day when I might be responsible for some foolish letter that somebody wrote!" The hon. gentleman knows his country too well and loves her better than to believe that. He did not hesitate to tell us that we were not serious, that we were not sincere. He may from his point of view think that we are neither serious nor sincere, but I for my part will not throw that back at him. I do not doubt his sincerity, nor do I doubt his seriousness; but, knowing as I do the intelligence and the capacity of the hon. gentleman, it is a puzzle to me how he justifies that cowering attitude on the part of his country, that he is so frightened at her assuming the responsibilities of nationhood, that he is so frightened of it that he is even willing to forego the status and the privileges of nationhood for fear that we might be called upon to carry the proper responsibilities associated with that nationhood. What he fears is that somebody is plotting to carry this country into something he calls Imperialism. Upon this side of the House there is no less desire and no less firm purpose that there is on the part of my hon. friend that there shall be preserved to Canada for all time the untrammelled rights that she enjoys to-day and to ensure that she shall continue to be entitled to the recognition of her status as an equal nation within this Empire. That determination is as strong on this side of the House as it can be in his breast, and nothing is being done here, or by this Government, otherwise than that which is in the direction of consolidating and confirming that autonomous status of our country. We have gone further, because we are advancing farther than those who have preceded us. I do not say that they were not looking in the same direction, but there is just as earnest determination to hold together this aggregation of nations, of which Canada is one—not an inferior one, not a dependency, but a nation standing on that footing of equality that she can just as well furnish the British Ambassador as representing the entire Empire as the United Kingdom can. The United Kingdom is not herself and alone the Empire. There is nothing incongruous in a Canadian Minister being the representative from time to time, if not permanently for the matter of that, of the British Empire, if it be thought wise by the other component parts of the British Empire. It is only an additional evidence of the recognition of the equality of our status within the Empire, but here we are as determined to stand by Canada's rights to her position as an autonomous nation within the Empire as the hon. gentleman can be, and that she shall maintain and hold her place in the great aggregation, the great commonwealth, of equal nations that go to make up the British Empire. My hon. friend need have no fear that we are wandering away from the example of that great statesman Sir John Macdonald, whose words he read to us.

HON. H. S. BELAND (Beauce): Before the Minister sits down may I ask him a question? I see by the declaration that was made by the right hon. the Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster) that the Minister Plenipotentiary is going to be appointed by His Majesty on the recommendation of the Canadian Government. Do I understand that this recommendation will go direct to His Majesty without first being submitted to the British Government. In other words, is the appointment to be made by His Majesty the King on the recommendation of the Canadian Government without the question being referred at all to the English or Imperial Government?

MR. DOHERTY: We have no doubt that His Majesty will not withhold from his British Ministers his action in connexion with the matter, but the statement is perfectly clear that the person to be appointed is to be appointed on the advice of his Canadian Minister, just as the Ministers Plenipotentiary at the Peace Conference were. I am not suggesting, and I do not know that there is occasion to suggest, that it is impossible, that, if the Ministers of the United Kingdom see some reason why they should offer an objection, or possibly the Ministers of other Dominions see some reason for opposition, they can suggest it. I am not going into that. The proposed channel by which the advice gets to His Majesty does not alter the fact that it will be the advice of His Majesty's Canadian Ministers.

MR. BELAND: In other words, according to the Government's understanding of the appointment of the Minister at Washington, the Canadian Government is not supreme as the adviser of His Majesty?

MR. DOHERTY: As far as I understand it the Canadian Government is supreme as the adviser of His Majesty:

Accordingly it has been agreed that His Majesty, on advice of his Canadian Ministers, shall appoint a Minister Plenipotentiary who will have charge of Canadian affairs and will at all times be the ordinary channel of communication with the United States Government in matters of purely Canadian concern, acting upon instructions from and reporting direct to the Canadian Government.

I can see no room for suggesting even a doubt that the advice of the Canadian Ministers is to be supreme as to who shall be the Canadian Minister or Plenipotentiary.

MR. BELAND: So that the recommendation will go direct to His Majesty?

MR. DOHERTY: Whatever is the regular channel by which communications reach His Majesty.

MR. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear; that is very diplomatic.

MR. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, like my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), I did not intend to speak on this amendment, and I would not have risen were it not for the fact that the hon. the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) referred to Hansard of last year. I have found a few lines which my hon. friend has not read, to which he has not referred, and which might be of great interest to the House. When my hon. friend stated that the matter of the appointment of a Minister Plenipotentiary at Washington was fully discussed and approved by the Opposition last year he did not state really what happened. I am sure he did not wish to deceive the House, but if he did not wish to deceive, what has become of his power of observation?

MR. ROWELL: My hon. friend has not quoted what I said to-night. I said to-night that the question of the Canadian representative at Washington had been discussed in the House on the occasions I mentioned, and that there had been no objection to the principle of that appointment.

MR. ARCHAMBAULT: Exactly. At page 2077 of Hansard of 5th May, 1919—and if I remember well my hon. friend cited 5th May—I find the following:

Mr. E. Lapointe: Has the Government brought down any legislation as regards this representation at Washington? I suppose the Order in Council business is going to be closed up.

Mr. Rowell: The voting of the Estimate by the House would be all that would be necessary to appoint a representative at Washington. Next session, when the matter is more fully understood, and we know exactly the relations, it may be considered desirable to introduce legislation.

Do I understand that my hon. friend by legislation means Orders in Council? Or a resolution? What kind of legislation has been introduced in the House this session? Is it not a fact that it was an Order in Council, and that my hon. friend made an announcement to the House stating that an Ambassador, a Minister Plenipotentiary, was going to be appointed at Washington. Is that the kind of "legislation" my hon. friend referred to last year? But let me resume the quotation:

Mr. Archambault: Have we as a nation the right to appoint a diplomatic agent at Washington?

Mr. Rowell: We have no right, except with the concurrence of the Imperial Government, to appoint a diplomatic agent, but the question of the status of this representative is now a matter of conference between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Imperial Government.

Mr. Archambault: We should not pass this Estimate before having power from the Imperial Government.

Mr. Rowell: My hon. friend need not worry. We shall have an understanding with the Imperial Government, and we shall have a Canadian representative at Washington.

A question by Mr. McMaster and a reply by the President of the Privy Council follow. Then comes another question from myself:

Mr. Archambault: Have the Imperial authorities agreed to that?

Mr. Rowell: They are agreed that we should have representation at Washington.

Mr. Archambault: Is there any correspondence to that effect?

Mr. Rowell: There are certain confidential communications between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Imperial Government. Negotiations are not yet closed. As soon as they are closed I am sure the Prime Minister will lay the whole matter before the House, but he is conducting negotiations personally in Great Britain.

I was under the impression that negotiations were closed. If they are closed, what becomes of the statement made by my hon. friend last year that when the subject would be closed the Prime Minister would lay the whole matter before the House? The Prime Minister spoke to-night, and he stated emphatically that he would not lay anything before the House, that no publication would be allowed. May I ask what are the reasons for not divulging the communications which have been exchanged? Are my hon. friends opposite afraid that these negotiations will bring criticism from this side of the House? If they are not, why not disclose the facts? However, it is not the first time that we have been refused information here. When I asked very reasonable questions about the expense of the Canadian National railways we met with a point-blank refusal from the Minister. I believe, Sir, that in pursuing this course we are departing from responsible government, and in my opinion the amendment of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's should be adopted.

15TH MAY. Canadian representation at Washington. As this question has been raised in Parliament the publication of the correspondence is under consideration of my Ministers. They feel that for the present it would not be in the public interest to bring down the correspondence as it deals so largely with points regarding which the United States Government evidently feel that (?public) discussion at this time would not be desirable, and to separate these points from the correspondence is impracticable.

My Ministers would be glad to have views of His Majesty's Government on question raised.—DEVONSHIRE.

SIR G. PERLEY (HIGH COMMISSIONER) to SIR G. FIDDES (COLONIAL OFFICE).

(Received 31st May, 1920.)

[Answered by No. 96.]

29th May, 1920.

DEAR SIR GEORGE FIDDES,

IN connexion with the arrangements for appointing a Canadian Minister in Washington and the many communications which have passed between the two Governments on the subject, there is one point which is not yet plain to me, and which you can perhaps clear up. I refer to the question of his precedence in relation to the Ministers from other countries. For instance, let us suppose that the Canadian Minister were now appointed and remained so long in office that the Ministers from all the other countries (I am, of course, not now referring to Ambassadors) had been changed in the meantime, would the Canadian Minister then be the doyen of all the Ministers and have precedence over others? A prominent Canadian was in my office the other day asking about this, and I was unable to give him a definite reply. Perhaps you can help me to do so.

Yours sincerely,

GEORGE H. PERLEY.

SIR G. FIDDES (COLONIAL OFFICE) to SIR G. PERLEY (HIGH COMMISSIONER).

(Confidential.)

DEAR SIR GEORGE PERLEY,

Downing Street, 3rd June, 1920.

IN reply to your letter of the 29th ultimo* I am afraid that you would find it difficult to give any definite reply to inquirers as regards the precedence of the Canadian Representative at Washington. You are already aware from the telegram from the Officer Administering the Government of Canada of the 8th of May† (which was forwarded to you on the 12th of May) that your Government, while stating their views, do not propose to make further representations to Washington at the moment "as they do not anticipate that any real difficulty will arise in actual practice."

There was a Conference in Washington in April between Mr. Rowell and Mr. Polk of the State Department, and the latter then explained to Mr. Rowell the difficulties which he foresaw in giving effect to the wishes of the Canadian Government. Mr. Polk recommended that no attempt should be made now to arrive at a hard and fast decision, that the Canadian Representative should come to Washington, and that we should trust to the process of evolution to find some way out of the difficulty. It would seem from the telegram of the 8th of May that, in practice, the Canadian Government have accepted this solution.

Of course, you realize that this is not a matter in which we should have any claim to impose our views on the United States. Precedence at Washington is obviously a matter for the United States Government, and they in turn are bound to deal with it in accordance with established international practice.

I am afraid that this will not be very helpful to you, but at any rate it will enable you to know how the matter stands at present.

Yours sincerely,

G. V. FIDDES

EXTRACT FROM DEBATE IN THE CANADIAN HOUSE OF COMMONS.
30TH JUNE, 1920

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT WASHINGTON.

MR. ROWELL: I beg to move to amend that item by substituting for the words "at Washington" the words "in the United States." I do that because the Auditor-General thinks that under the present designation the vote might be limited to Washington, whereas it includes both the New York and Washington offices.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Fielding: Has the Minister any further information to give us concerning this item?

Mr. Rowell: I do not know just what my honourable friend has in view.

Mr. Fielding: I believe that many honourable members of this House, who are more willing perhaps than I am—although I am not always unwilling to support the measures which the Government bring down, will join with me in a protest—it may be in silence—against the action of the Government in again endeavouring to commit this Parliament to the very grave and important step which is introduced by this proposal in the absence of any information dealing with the subject. I think it is an amazing situation that the Government should ask Parliament to vote this money in face of the fact that we have not been able to get any information concerning the purpose for which it is asked. I take exception to it from various standpoints. I quite realize that in the carrying on of public affairs it is sometimes necessary to withhold documents from Parliament; I know we have occasions in connexion with our public affairs when that is so. But I am afraid this Government is overplaying the part of custodian of confidential documents. We had here last night a long discussion on the Board of Commerce arising out of the fact that the Government had suppressed public documents which really should have been given to Parliament long ago.

Two years ago the ministers returned from the Imperial Conference. I have no doubt conferences are useful in a general way, but the only particular feature of that conference that the Government reported to this House, and dwelt upon, was an arrangement whereby a channel of communication was to be opened between the Canadian and Imperial Governments. In times past it has been customary to have the transactions put through the Colonial Office. We were told, and it was represented to be a matter of grave importance, that in future the Prime Minister of Canada was to have the right to communicate direct with the Prime Minister of Great Britain. This was represented to Parliament as being a very grave and important step. After the lapse of two years I thought it might be desirable to find out how far this new privilege had been found useful. Therefore I obtained an Order of the House asking if we might receive copies of whatever correspondence had taken place under this new arrangement, and the return came down that in that time certain correspondence had taken place but it was confidential and no scrap of it could be laid before Parliament.

Now we have this Washington business. It is a very grave step. On a previous occasion I pointed out that it is nearer to a constitutional change than anything else that has recently occurred, and yet we are asked to commit ourselves to that project without a line of correspondence dealing with the subject. I am strong in my doubt as to the wisdom of the course that is proposed, and whether I agree or not as to the desirability of having representation at Washington I think that almost all honourable gentlemen who listen to me will feel, as I do, that Parliament should long ago have been taken into the confidence of the Government and given to know what all this means. It is on that ground, therefore, that I protest what has taken place.

But on the merits of the question—I speak for myself alone—I have grave doubts as to the wisdom or value of the proposition. I have had some experience of official transactions between Ottawa and Washington, and I have had considerable opportunity, like other honourable members, and irrespective of my own official connexion with matters of this kind, of observing what has occurred. I might point out that if any reason exists why there should be a change in the existing system Parliament has never been informed of it. No honourable member can point to a single case that has been presented to us by the Government to indicate that there is any need for a change at all. I think that is a consideration of importance. If difficulties have arisen between the Canadian Government and the American Government, or between the Canadian Government and the Imperial Government, out of the existing order of things, I think it is only fair and reasonable that we should know what these difficulties are in order to justify the steps which it is proposed to take.

There is no intelligent public opinion on this question. In the previous discussion—although I can only be permitted a passing reference to it—it was alleged that many newspapers of the Dominion had viewed this proposal with favour. To some extent that is true, but how could there be any intelligent public opinion on the subject when no information has been given to the House of Commons to show what the object of it is? It cannot be said that there is any intelligent and well-informed public opinion upon the subject. I have never heard any general reason given calling for this change. We read occasionally in the press that we need something of this sort because of the difficulties of our present system, and we are told that if we have any transaction with the Government at Washington we must first send our communication across the water to the Imperial Government. We will send it to the Colonial Office, the Colonial Office will send it to the Foreign Office, the Foreign Office will send it to the Government at Washington, and gradually, after the lapse of a long time, our wishes will be made known at Washington. That is the story that is told. That is the only reason that I have ever heard given in the public press or in Parliament for making the change. Is that reason well founded? Does it represent the facts? I say it does not. I say it is a pure dream as to the condition of affairs existing between this Government and Washington. There was a time, no doubt, in the olden days, when things were different, when this circumlocution office could be busily employed in the way indicated. But that time, if it existed at all, was long ago. For many years Canadian foreign affairs have not been dealt with in that way. We have had experience with relations between various governments, and as far as my own observation has gone we have never found the slightest difficulty in obtaining communication with a foreign government through the agency of the British Government. The great complaint has been that the Imperial Government has stood in the way of bringing the communications of Canada to the attention of other nations, but it is not within my knowledge or belief that any such cause of complaint exists.

For a number of years we have had the British Ambassadors at Washington coming to Canada for consultation. That has been the practice of British Ambassadors. Lord Bryce, in a particular degree, carried out that policy. He came to Ottawa once or twice a year and put himself in touch not only with the Government of the day but with public men whom he had an opportunity of meeting, and the result was that Lord Bryce was very well informed on all Canadian affairs. There was no difficulty whatever in the way of having Canadian affairs administered through the assistance of Lord Bryce or the British Ambassador at Washington. That was equally true of Sir Cecil Spring-Rice who succeeded him, and who, as I am not sure whether Lord Reading came to Ottawa; Lord Grey did not, but these gentlemen were only temporary appointments, and they were only at Washington a short time. But it is fair to assume that every British Ambassador hereafter to be appointed at Washington will in the future deem it his duty to visit Ottawa and put himself in communication with the Ministers of the Crown, showing that there is absolutely no need for any new system in order to have Canada properly represented.

Then there is another thought in connexion with this matter. It is proposed to have a gentleman at Washington who is to be the representative of Canada, and we are told that when the Ambassador is away he will be the representative of Great Britain. Well, I am afraid, sir, that makes the situation worse rather than better, because while he is representing Canada entirely he will have the responsibility to the Canadian Government and possibly to the Canadian Parliament—though Parliament does not seem to count in these matters I regret to say—but if he is to become, for the time being, British Ambassador then he no longer is responsible to the Government and Parliament of Canada—he must be responsible to the Imperial Government. It seems to me that is a fantastic arrangement, and there will be difficulty in connexion with it.

There is another thought that I venture to express. I believe that when any question of real importance arises between Canada and the United States you will have far better representation of Canada's interests if you do not rely upon some gentleman who—I am quoting the words of an eminent Conservative of Montreal, in a letter to the press a short time ago describing this arrangement—will be given a desk in the office of the Ambassador. I believe that when any real business arises which requires consideration from the Canadian viewpoint it is a very much better arrangement to have a Minister of the Crown, fresh from consultation with his colleagues and fully informed of the Canadian position, leaving Ottawa in the evening, being at Washington by the next afternoon, and then being in a position to represent the interests of Canada. I am sure he would represent them much more intelligently and much more effectively than any gentleman who has been spending his time around Washington wondering what in the world he was going to do next. The whole tendency of this arrangement must be to give Canada a representative at Washington who holds a nominal position. The tendency will be that he will fall into a rut, and the rut of officialism we know very often leads to idleness. If there is anything really important to do the Government will, even now, I am sure, send a minister down from Ottawa to do it, and the gentleman who is supposed to represent Canada at Washington will really come to be a person of only nominal power. I do not think, sir, there is any need of this arrangement at all. I do not think any good can come of it. Canada stands so well now with the British Empire generally, and particularly with the Government in England—by reason of the splendid service she has given in the Great War—that I can understand the tendency of the British Government to assent to almost anything within, and even beyond, the bounds of reason that the Canadian Government may ask. It is flattering for us to know that that appreciation exists; but I am persuaded in my own mind that if the seasoned officers of the Colonial Office, and of the Foreign Office, could give us their private thought, they would tell us they find in this arrangement a very dangerous experiment indeed.

There is one other thought which is worthy of consideration, and it is the financial one. I do not present that as the main consideration, but it is a consideration to which we should give some weight. At this moment we are on the eve of separating, and members will go home to explain in many instances to their people why they were unable to obtain some particular grant which they desired, and to which their constituents attached importance—in one case a public work; in another case a breakwater to protect the fishermen's gear; in another case, dredging, either in the lakes or on the St. Lawrence, to open some harbour; a post office here, a public building there—a score of things which we all would like to have. We have got to go back to our constituencies and explain that although these things cost a few hundred or even a few thousand dollars we cannot afford them now; we have not got the money. It will be more difficult for honourable gentlemen to give that explanation to their constituents when they can be met with the statement that we are spending a large sum of money in creating this kindergarten school of diplomacy at Washington.

I have no objection to the extension of our relations with the United States. I have given many evidences in my public life that I attach the utmost importance to friendly relations with the great republic. I yield to no honourable member in this House my desire to establish such relation; and particularly am I anxious that we establish commercial relations. But I cannot see the necessity or the wisdom of our engaging in this expenditure. Last year $50,000 was proposed for this purpose, this year it is to be $80,000; depend upon it next year will be a great deal more. Washington, I believe, is, for persons in official life, the most expensive city in the world; and if we mean to establish at Washington anything which will compare with what we are pleased to call now our increasing status and our greater dignity, it is going to be a very expensive luxury. I do not feel that we need it. We have no information to justify us in doing this. I know there are some members of the House who are of the opinion that it is a great thing to have representation in the foreign courts. I am afraid I am lacking in the enthusiasm which some of them manifest in that way. At all events I strongly represent to you that this is an unnecessary expenditure, it is not a wise expenditure, it is an expenditure which is more likely to get us into trouble than to be of any substantial good.

There is still one further thought that I would like to express. Considering, sir, that we have no information on the subject, considering that we are going into a blind alley—these are not phrases that are too strong; honourable gentlemen know that they are just as much in the dark on the subject as I am—how far are we going to be obligated by this thing in the future? I am bound to say that in the absence of any information, no Government that arises in the future can be expected to feel bound by any action that this Parliament now takes; and any gentleman who, under these circumstances and in the absence of any knowledge of what we are doing, accepts a position at Washington under this arrangement will be obliged to feel that he is taking very great risks. In all earnestness, and in all sincerity, I represent that I believe this is not only an unwise expenditure from the point of view of the public interest, but I believe it is unwise in other respects. No good can come of it, but much harm may result.

Mr. Rowell: One or two observations in answer to my honourable friend. The honourable member opened his remarks by intimating that after the Imperial Conference of 1918 the only important information given this House was in reference to improved channels of communication. I judge my honourable friend could not have been in the House at the first session of last year when the work of the Imperial Conference of 1918 was reviewed. I have Hansard for that year before me, and no less than forty pages are taken up with a discussion of the work of the Imperial Conference of 1918. Many questions came before that conference touching problems affecting Canada and the Empire as a whole. The resolutions of the conference on these matters were reported to the House and were discussed by honourable members for a period covering some hours. Five-sixths of those resolutions were laid on the table together with a printed report of the proceedings of the conference. So much for my honourable friend's reference to the Imperial Conference.

My honourable friend's references to Canadian representation at Washington are as lacking in solid foundation as that respecting the Imperial Conference. My honourable friend says that the House has no information. He declares that no papers are laid on the table. One would think it is not possible to obtain information except from documents. Let us suppose that the whole matter had been one of conference and negotiation between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Prime Minister of Great Britain, what documents would there be to lay upon the table? The statement would be that statement which the Prime Minister would make to the House, and in doing so he would impart full information to the House. When my right honourable friend, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, presented the statement to the House, he gave the substance and the really important features of the understanding and arrangement arrived at. That statement was agreed upon by both Governments. Does my honourable friend think that the details are a matter of contract and of bargain? That has not been the principle upon which the British Constitution has been worked out. There was an understanding, as was stated when the announcement was made to the House—an understanding which was repeated when the matter came up for discussion—that hereafter Canada should be represented at Washington by a minister plenipotentiary appointed by His Majesty on the recommendation of his Canadian Ministers; that that Minister should report to and take instructions from the Canadian Government; and that he should carry on his work there in co-operation with the British Ambassador and be a part of the British Embassy. Once you have a definition of the position and status of the Canadian representative, the rest follows as a natural and logical consequence. It would not be possible to define the precise limits of the duties and responsibilities of the Canadian Minister. From the very nature of the case the arrangements and the procedure must be flexible. There must be room for development in these relations, just as our Constitution has developed to meet changing conditions as they arise from time to time. And, further, the arrangement can be modified if necessary to meet new conditions. If the present arrangement does not prove entirely satisfactory, it can be modified. That is clearly understood. My honourable friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in the official statement he made to the House, gave the House the terms of the arrangement arrived at, and everything follows as a natural consequence.

Now, my honourable friend says that there is no occasion for such representation. Take the very matter that we have been considering in this House in the last few days—the coal situation—I merely use it as an illustration, showing how closely the two countries must be associated together in matters of trade where their vital interests are concerned. That is a case where we get supplies from the United States. Take another matter, the export of pulp and paper, that is a case where the United States get their supplies from us. Both of those questions are exciting very great interest in the two countries, and they are questions concerning which it is important that there should be no misunderstanding. Both of these questions can be dealt with better by men who understand them, who know all the conditions and who can talk them over as man with man; that is the best means of arriving at a satisfactory solution. I merely mention those two matters to illustrate the class of cases that are constantly arising. Unquestionably it is in the interests of Canada to be represented at Washington by one of her own citizens, who knows Canadian conditions, who is in close touch with the Canadian Government, and who is constantly watching over Canadian interests in order that they may be safeguarded. I submit that this House could not more wisely expend this amount of public money than by voting this item for Canadian representation at Washington.

Mr. McMaster: Many years ago an English king endeavoured to promote the marriage of his son with a daughter of the king of Scotland by invading the northern kingdom, and a Scotch nobleman of the time said that he was not opposed to the match, but he did object to the manner of wooing. Now, that is very much my position in regard to this matter. I have no objection to Canadian national interests being represented at Washington by a Canadian; au contraire, I am very much in favour of it; but I am extremely doubtful of "the manner of wooing"—I am extremely opposed to the manner in which this matter has been introduced.

Some time ago the matter was before the House, and we asked for information, for the papers to be brought down. We were told by the Prime Minister, if I remember aright, that he had examined the documents, and had caused them to be examined by someone else, and that they had both decided that it was not necessary that Parliament should see the documents. Those were very doleful auspices under which to introduce this matter. It has been noticed in the British Liberal press, and the "Manchester Guardian" has stated, that it is too bad that this move has been attended by such unfortunate circumstances. That is the first objection I have to this Estimate. I wish also to protest emphatically against the wrong done to honourable members in bringing down an Estimate of this importance a few hours before we are supposed to finish the work of the session. It is not fair to honourable members, and it should not be done. There is no objection in my mind to our having a representative at Washington if we can afford it, and that is a question with which I do not propose to take up the time of the House to-night—but I say this: that the man who goes to Washington must be our representative, and in the absence of the British Ambassador must not be his locum tenens. I say that is the most dangerous proposal that could be made in connexion with this matter.

Let us suppose this case—and it is not an improbable one; it has happened in the past and may happen in the future—let us suppose, there is a divergence of opinion between Great Britain and Canada on some fisheries question, that the British Ambassador is away and the Canadian Ambassador is locum tenens for him. From whom is the locum tenens to take his instructions? Is he to take them from the British Government and go against the views of the Canadian Government? Or is he to take his instructions from the Canadian Government and go against the views of the British Government whom he is supposed to represent? I protest against this as an unwise provision, and I would think that this matter, involving as it does $80,000, might well remain over until next session; although I wish to state very frankly that any movement by this or any other Government towards a full realization of Canadian nationality will always have my warm and enthusiastic support.

Sir Robert Borden: Mr. Chairman, the Estimate appeared last year, and my honourable friend has had something like fifteen months to consider it. Therefore I hardly appreciate his injured feeling in respect to lack of particulars.

Mr. McMaster: My right honourable friend will admit that this is the first occasion when we have been asked to vote for money. Is it not?

Sir Robert Borden: No. It was voted last year.

Mr. McMaster: Was the money spent?

Sir Robert Borden: No. My honourable friend has evidently given no more consideration to the Estimate than he has to this question. He has propounded what seems in his opinion to be a very difficult conundrum to answer. He says: Suppose the British Government has one point of view with respect to a particular matter and the Canadian Government has another point of view? I will answer his question by asking another. Suppose that condition arises when there is a British Ambassador and no one else at Washington, what is the British Ambassador to do?

Mr. McMaster: The British Ambassador, of course, will take his instructions from the British Government. But if the British Ambassador is away, and under the proposed legislation our man is there as locum tenens, he will have to follow either the instructions of the British Government or our instructions.

Sir Robert Borden: My honourable friend, I think, is under a complete misapprehension. If he pretends to say that the British Ambassador at Washington ought to follow the instructions of the British Government in respect to a matter of purely Canadian interest when the Canadian Government entertains precisely the opposite view, he takes a position which I am not prepared to accept, and which this Government never has accepted. The Canadian representative at Washington, if he were acting in the stead of the British Ambassador, would occupy exactly the same position as the British Ambassador has occupied in the past. In matters of purely Imperial concern he would act under the directions of the Imperial Government; in matters of purely Canadian concern he would consult with and act according to the views of this Government. That is the whole situation.

Mr. McMaster: May I put a question to my right honourable friend?

Sir Robert Borden: Certainly, as many as you like.

Mr. McMaster: Is it not possible that a question may come up which is of both Imperial and Canadian concern?

Sir Robert Borden: Certainly, but the position will be exactly the same whether the British Ambassador is there or whether the Canadian representative is acting in his place. My honourable friend has lost his usual logical sense of the fitness of things if he does not see that at once. Now, so far as the observations made by my honourable friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) are concerned, I should like to tell him that this is not so new a departure in point of principle as he imagines. How is it different in point of principle from the action of the late administration, Sir Wilfred Laurier's Government, of which he was a member, in establishing an International Joint Commission which for ten years has dealt with many matters that formerly were settled through diplomatic channels? Has any disadvantage thereby come to this country? Has that occasioned any detriment to the good relations between Canada and the United States? On the contrary, I venture to think that the International Joint Commission has been of the greatest possible advantage to the two countries, and has aided in maintaining good relations in respect of matters that might otherwise have led to serious dispute. Moreover, the Government of which my honourable friend was a member gave a somewhat new status to our representative in Paris, and we have acted upon that status. The only thing to which we objected when we came into power was this. We found Mr. Roy, a very able and capable man, acting in Paris for the Government of Canada and also for the Government of the Province of Quebec, and having his salary partly paid by the Dominion and partly by the province. We did not consider that a desirable condition of affairs, so we asked Mr. Roy to resign as representative of the province of Quebec and made good to him the difference in salary. I am bound to say that I believe his service in Paris has been of the greatest possible advantage to this country. He is in very close touch with the British Embassy there, he has established excellent relations with them, and he carries on, in some sense, diplomatic arrangements of a minor character, to the great advantage, I believe, of this country and the maintenance of good relations between Canada and France.

There is another thing that we might take into account. We have had in London for many years an officer called High Commissioner for Canada. He carries on very important negotiations between the Government of this country and the Government of the United Kingdom, being sometimes brought through his instructions into direct communication and relation with the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and with the British Cabinet. I do not know that any disadvantage has resulted to anyone from that condition of affairs. I think that the service both of the High Commissioner in London and the Commissaire-Général in Paris have been of advantage to this country. I believe, notwithstanding all that has been said, that the presence at Washington of a Canadian representative will equally be of good service, and will promote good relations between the two countries.

I would like to tell my honourable friend that, much as I respect the very able officers in the Foreign Office, in the Colonial Office, and elsewhere in the British service, I should not be prepared to accept their view as to the desirability or otherwise of an arrangement of this kind. In a matter of that kind we ought to be able to judge for ourselves; so far as I am concerned I do propose to judge for myself. I should add, however, that so far as I am aware of the opinion of the higher officials of the Foreign Office, they see no objection whatever to this proposed arrangement. I think it perfectly manifest that at some time we must have representation at Washington. About two-thirds or three-quarters of the business of the Embassy relates to Canadian interests. When we have ten, fifteen or twenty millions of people in this country, are we, in respect of their interests, in respect of their representation at Washington, to say that all these things can be better attended to by other people than by ourselves? Are we to relegate ourselves to a position in the background? I for one do not appreciate that point of view.

Mr. Mackenzie King: My right honourable friend is hardly correct when he says that Parliament voted last year the appropriation which the Government have asked for this year. Last year we voted $50,000; this year the Government are asking for $80,000, a difference of $30,000. I think my right honourable friend will admit that that is quite correct.

Sir Robert Borden: I thought my honourable friend would understand that I was referring to the principle of the vote, not to the exact amount of it.

Mr. Mackenzie King: My right honourable friend attaches little importance to the exact amount. For my part every dollar is significant, and I propose to move that we strike out the $80,000 which is being asked this year in excess of what was voted last year. If when this matter was discussed in Parliament last year $50,000 was sufficient for the purpose of starting this representation at Washington, and the money was not used, it ought to be equally sufficient now, particularly in view of the fact that apart from the statement by the Acting Prime Minister we have had practically no information as to what is intended. The principle at stake in this matter is whether or not Parliament is to have a say in regard to our inter-Imperial and international relations. Apparently the Government's policy in these matters is one of secret diplomacy. We were told by the Prime Minister, as the honourable Member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) and the honourable Member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) have pointed out, that the Prime Minister had read over the correspondence, that some other person had read over the correspondence, and that as a result of that reading Parliament was not to be informed one way or the other of what the correspondence contained. That is not, I am sure, a method of carrying on the business of the country which will meet with the approval of the people. Matters of ordinary business as between partners are not carried on simply by understandings; statements and records are kept in which is clearly set forth the exact position of the parties. If rumour be correct, my right honourable friend (Sir Robert Borden) may not hold the position of Prime Minister very long; he may be succeeded by one of his colleagues or by some other person who will not have precisely the same views on these matters as he has, or I will suggest another possibility. The Government of which my right honourable friend is the head may not be in office very long; it may be succeeded by a ministry that has views of its own on these questions. Should there not be somewhere in the records of this country, documents which will put beyond question exactly what has been agreed to between the different countries, between Great Britain and Canada or between the United States and Canada, on matters affecting inter-Imperial and international relations? Assume that some future British Ministry should dispute the word of a Minister in this House or of this Parliament, and the Canadian Ministry—not the same Ministry which is now in office—were unable to support our present position other than by the statements made in the House. What position would we be in? In these matters, particularly where they are in the nature of departures, or advances, if you wish to call them so, along lines of constitutional or other development, there is the strongest of reasons why we should have in the records of our country documents which will become in time part of the archives of Canada, and which may be referred to as bona fide records of what has taken place. This evening we were informed by my right honourable friend in regard to another very important matter, the taking over by Canada of five ships from the Government of Great Britain, that all of that correspondence was secret; that no member of this Parliament could see it; yet we are expected to vote a couple of million dollars to maintain the ships once they are taken over. That is the method of secret diplomacy. It is in accord with the proceedings of the bureaucratic administration; it is not the method of a ministry responsible to Parliament, and unless the ministry is prepared to be responsible to Parliament, I fail to see why Parliament should support the ministry. For this reason I move that the present item be reduced by $30,000. I think the time has come when there should be an end to monopoly of control of the affairs of Canada by a Cabinet carrying on the country's business in secret councils. The business of the country should be carried on in the open on the floor of this Parliament, in such a manner that the Government will be obliged to take into their confidence not only the members of Parliament but the people of the country whose money they are voting to expend.

Sir Robert Borden: I am very glad my honourable friend has made this motion because, in doing so, he acknowledges the principle and objects only to the amount. He leaves the matter therefore, just where it was last year, even if his motion should pass, that is to say, with a vote of $50,000 for a particular purpose which has the endorsement of this House in voting the Estimates. The honourable gentleman has not given a great deal of consideration to the statement which was made in this House. It was announced at the time, I believe, that the statement was to be made concurrently in Great Britain and Canada that it had been agreed upon by, and represented the views of, the two Governments. Under those circumstances I do not know why my honourable friend should put forward the contention which he has, that it might transpire at some future time that the British Government held a different view. The statement which was made was a statement submitted to the British Government, modified to some extent by them, I believe, and put out with the full concurrence of the British Government and of this Government, both in Great Britain and in this country. Moreover, as regards records, my honourable friend, I hope, does not intend to suggest that I purpose running away with the records, if at any time in the future I should cease to be Prime Minister. He says, "There ought to be records in the country." Well, whatever records there are, will be for any future Government. I do not propose taking them away. They will be there for the inspection of any Government in the future, and that Government will be fully at liberty to bring them down if they obtain the proper consent, or to take such other course as may to them seem fit.

Mr. Fielding: I put to the Government a question which I thought was a fair and reasonable one. I asked them to state what circumstances had arisen to show that the interests of Canada were suffering at Washington for lack of a representative such as is now proposed. My right honourable friend spoke at great length but he did not answer that question. I am not surprised that he did not, because I am satisfied no such condition has arisen. My right honourable friend says: "We have a representative at London and a representative at Paris." True, but they are both 3,000 miles away from Ottawa, and if they were only a few hours' journey away from Ottawa, we probably would have no representative at either London or Paris. It is no argument to say that because we have a representative at Paris so far away, therefore, we must have one at Washington which is virtually next door to us. I notice that the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) is making a change in the wording of this item. He says that the Auditor-General suggested it. I shall not ask my honourable friend to confess, but I shall not be surprised if he got the suggestion from some other quarter, that it might not be the wisest policy to fix the representative at Washington.

Mr. Rowell: I am very glad to answer my honourable friend. I got no suggestion from any quarter that it was desirable to make a change. When I moved the change, I explained that this item covered the New York office as well as Washington, and the Auditor-General thought that if we put in the item "at Washington" that would be open to some question. The New York office is under Washington and, therefore, it is desirable to say, "in the United States" instead of specifically mentioning Washington.

Mr. Fielding: The honourable gentleman and the Prime Minister both referred to the extensive trade relations we have with the United States. It is quite true that we have extensive trade relations with that country, and it has been part of my mission in life to make those trade relations more extensive. I am not sure that the right honourable gentleman who is now Prime Minister has laboured in that direction. But when my honourable friends speak of the commercial reasons as having any great bearing on this question, I fail to see the force of the argument. I have not seen so much of Washington as has my honourable friend; but to my knowledge and belief Washington is not a great commercial centre, and if we want commercial agents in New York, Boston, Chicago, in any part of the United States where great business interests are centralized, I should very heartily support my honourable friend in saying that we should have additional representatives in those quarters. He said, "Why, have we not the International High Joint Commission"? Yes, having that, and as it is running smoothly, what more do we want in the same direction? "Oh, but," the right honourable gentleman said—and I took down his words—"we are proposing to adopt that same proposition that there are certain things in our international relations which can be better done by other people than by ourselves." That was my right honourable friend's statement.

Sir Robert Borden: I did not say that.

Mr. Fielding: Yes, my right honourable friend did say that.

Sir Robert Borden: I did not.

Mr. Fielding: Well, Hansard will tell.

Sir Robert Borden: My honourable friend misunderstood me. I have a right under the rules of the House to state in what sense my words are to be understood, and I did not intend them to be understood in any such sense.

Mr. Fielding: My right honourable friend has a right to speak of his intentions, but Hansard has a right to speak of his words. We have not been having the affairs of Canada attended to by other people than ourselves in international affairs for many years. We did not have them attended to by other people when Sir John A. Macdonald went as Commissioner to Washington to deal with the fisheries question. We did not have them attended to by other people when Sir Charles Tupper went again and again to Washington. We did not have them attended to by other people when we appointed representatives on the High Joint Commission of which my right honourable friend speaks. We did not have them attended to by other people when two members of the Canadian Government went down to Washington and endeavoured to conduct negotiations there to extend trade with that country at a time when my right honourable friend and his friends did everything they could to strangle that trade.

I do not purpose having any lectures from my right honourable friend as to the extension of trade relations between Canada and the United States. We have no evidence before us that a single thing has arisen to call for this movement. Again I challenge the right honourable gentleman to show that any difficulty has arisen at Washington in our relations with the American Government. This is an entirely unnecessary and wasteful thing. It may be a serious matter. Or it may be that the most that can happen from it is that the Government will send some gentleman to Washington who will discover that there is nothing for him to do but to occupy a desk in a corner of the office of the British Ambassador, and when there is any business to be done, the Government will send a man down from Ottawa. My right honourable friend speaks of the coal question and the pulp question which have been before us in the last day or two. I take his illustration of the coal question which is a very serious question to-day. Does my right honourable friend suppose, if we had any chief clerk, or whatever you may choose to call him, sitting at a desk in Washington, the Government would entrust the matter to him, living in Washington and getting the Washington atmosphere for years past? No, the right honourable gentleman would go himself to Washington, or would send one of his colleagues—as he is doing now—full of the knowledge of the Canadian policy, full of the knowledge of the Canadian Government, fresh from a consideration of the whole matter. Such a representative would have force and weight at Washington. That is the way the thing has been done in the past, and that is the way in which I want it to be done in the future.

Sir Robert Borden: My honourable friend is under a serious misapprehension when he refers to me as having alluded to commercial relations. I said nothing at all about them. I take the illustration which he has given just now. I can tell him that within the past three and four weeks this country has had very considerable advantage from the fact that there is still at Washington one member of the Canadian War Mission for the purpose of closing up the affairs of that mission at Washington—Mr. Mahoney, with whom we have been in constant touch and communication, and who has rendered us the very greatest possible service, but less service than he could have rendered to this country in that regard if he had been vested with the powers which it is proposed to confer upon a Canadian representative at Washington in the true sense. My honourable friend speaks as if it were the easiest possible thing in the world for ministers during the session of Parliament to leave their place to go to Washington to deal with matters of that kind. His experience as minister for fifteen years in this country should have taught him the precise reverse.

I take another illustration he gave. He says our affairs with the United States have been carried on and negotiated by Sir John Macdonald, by Sir Charles Tupper, by himself and Mr. Paterson. If these go in particular cases of importance what is the difference in principle if you have at Washington a duly authorized Canadian representative to deal with all matters of importance that come up from time to time? What is the supposed detriment to public interest? It is all right, says my honourable friend, to do this in particular cases of importance. Is there any reason why it should not be done in all matters of importance, but perhaps of less importance? That is all that is proposed, and I venture to think, notwithstanding the views of my honourable friend, that this proposal will be of real advantage to the people of this country, and that that fact will be recognized more and more after this representation has been established.

Mr. Mackenzie King: One expression used by my right honourable friend at this moment will, I think, help to make clear what it is that we so strongly object to in the new proposal. If I understood by honourable friend aright, he intimated that the Canadian representative at Washington would have to take charge of the smaller affairs of Canada as well as the larger affairs. That was about the difference between the representation that is now proposed and the representation we have had in the past. In other words, the Canadian representative under this proposal will have to look after all affairs in a general way. My honourable friend said nothing whatever about the proposal that the representative of Canada at Washington shall act for the British Ambassador for the time being whenever the British Ambassador is absent from Washington. He said nothing about that in his last allusion, although he referred to it in his earlier remarks.

Sir Robert Borden: I did not think it worth while to repeat what I said before.

Mr. Mackenzie King: Quite so, but I feel it worth while to repeat that, so far as this Parliament is concerned, I believe the majority of its members are strongly opposed to any representative of Canada acting as British Ambassador at Washington. I think my right honourable friend has reason to believe that on his own side of the House there are many members who are strongly opposed to any innovation of that kind, and certainly every member on this side of the House is unalterably opposed to it.

Some honourable members: Question.

Mr. Mackenzie King: I hear some honourable members saying "Question." If they cannot give the public business the attention to which it is entitled, they will just have to wait, that is all. This is one of the most important public matters we have had to consider in this Parliament for some time, and the people of this country are entitled before a new venture of this kind is launched to understand fully just how far they are being committed. I think my right honourable friend holds, to a considerable extent, the view that on these international affairs there ought to be agreement as far as possible between both sides of the House, and I think particularly on the question of a Canadian representative at Washington acting as Ambassador for the British Government in the British Ambassador's absence, there ought to have been on the part of the Government some effort to find out whether Parliament was likely to be united on such a project. Parliament is not united. We on this side of the House are unalterably opposed to the proposal. We believe it will lead to difficulties between the Mother Country and this Dominion, and lead to trouble between the United States and Canada. I hope my right honourable friend will construe our desire to cut down this appropriation by $30,000 as a protest primarily against having the Canadian Minister Plenipotentiary act at any time as British Ambassador in the absence of the British Minister.

Amendment (Mr. Fielding) negatived; yeas 32, nays 57.

No. 98.

THE DEPUTY GOVERNOR-GENERAL TO THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

(Received 9th May, 1921.)

(No. 255.)

SIR,

Ottawa, 22nd April, 1921.

WITH reference to previous correspondence, and more particularly to the Governor-General's despatch No. 331, of the 15th May, 1920,* I have the honour to transmit, herewith, copies of the unrevised Hansard of April 21st, containing the debate† in the House of Commons on the question of the appointment of a Canadian Minister to Washington.

I also enclose some cuttings‡ from Canadian newspapers commenting on the debate.

I have, &c.,

L. H. DAVIES,

Deputy Governor-General.

Summary of 1st and 2nd enclosures in No. 98.

Mr. Meighen began (p. 2462)§ by explaining that there was some urgency, that it was important that the office be filled, that the reason for the delay in filling the office was merely that the Government had not decided on the best person to fill it, and that the Government had still not made up its mind as to who is to receive the appointment. Sir R. Borden (p. 2474) and Mr. Rowell (p. 2478) also represented the urgent need for the appointment. Later on in the debate (p. 2513) Mr. Meighen stated: "It is not only the intention but the sincere hope" of the Government to make the appointment in the current fiscal year. Sir R. Borden (p. 2471) laid stress on the independent status of the Minister vis-à-vis the Ambassador. Mr. Rowell gave (p. 2483) a sketch of the general duties which the Minister would perform, and mentioned specifically (p. 2482) as matters on which he would approach the United States Government: (a) Canada's voting rights in the League of Nations and (b) the United States Tariff. He also referred (p. 2484) to the pulp and paper question as one on which any possible difficulty might have been avoided if there had been a Canadian Minister at Washington. Mr. Meighen in dealing (pp. 2485-6) with the objection to the proposed arrangement under which the Minister will take charge of the Embassy in the absence of the Ambassador, said (p. 2485) that he did not regard the proposal as of first importance. Mr. Mackenzie King described the proposal (p. 2495) as a "great mistake." Sir R. Borden stated (p. 2474) that it was upon the status of Canada under the Resolution of the 1917 Imperial War Conference, "but which she has acquired chiefly from the part she has taken in the War and at the Peace Conference." . . . "that we rest our right of distinctive representation at the Capital of the great neighbouring nation, etc," but later (p. 2505) he urged that in principle the appointment did not differ from the arrangements under the Joint Waterways Commission, and Mr. Meighen said (p. 2515): "I do not say we are doing it because of our national status . . . We are doing it because we need it, because it is going to be of service to us." On pages 2514-6 he stated that it could not be argued from the fact that this step was being taken in relation to the United States; "we must go on and incur the expense of having diplomatic representatives in the various capitals of Europe or other countries in the world" . . . "There is nothing that leads us into any further step at all, because we take this step in relation to the United States." . . . "If the need arises to do likewise with any other country, if the need arises equally great and equally pressing, why, then, of course, we will have the same right to do it in the same way." Mr. Cockshutt (p. 2488) raised the question whether the United States would not on their side appoint an Ambassador to Canada? It will be remembered that this possibility was hinted at by the State Department at an early stage of the question, but was not subsequently mentioned.

* No. 91. † A summary only is printed here. ‡ Not reprinted. § These references are to the pages in Vol. LVI, No. 45, of the Unrevised Edition of the House of Commons (Canada) debates.

It will be seen that the Parliamentary correspondent of the Ottawa Journal wrote in the article printed in the second press cutting: "As for the Prime Minister, it cannot be said that he displayed much enthusiasm for the proposal" and called special attention to Mr. Meighen's remark on p. 2514: "I feel myself in point of sentiment with those who oppose the vote, but in point of reason in sympathy with those who support it."

PRELIMINARY NOTE.

Meetings of the Imperial War Conference, 1918, took place on various dates between 12th June and 26th July 1918, being held, as a rule, on alternate days to those of the meetings of the Imperial War Cabinet.

The majority of the Resolutions passed, together with extracts from the Proceedings and certain of the Papers laid before the Conference, have been published in [Cd. 9177].

The present volume contains the remainder of the Resolutions, Proceedings, and Papers.

For convenience of reference, a complete Summary of the Proceedings and a complete List of the Papers laid before the Conference are included in this volume. The Resolutions are also set out in full.

III. RESOLUTIONS AGREED TO BY THE CONFERENCE.

The following Resolutions were unanimously agreed to by the Conference, subject to the exception noted in the case of Resolution XIX. :—

I.

Imperial War Graves Commission.

(Second Day ; Monday, 17th June ; see p. 32 of [Cd. 9177].)

The Conference desires to place on record its appreciation of the labours of the Imperial War Graves Commission and is in favour of the cost of the carrying out the decisions of the Commission being borne by the respective Governments in proportion to the numbers of the graves of their dead.

II.

Non-Ferrous Metal Industry.

(Fifth Day ; Wednesday, 26th June ; see p. 63 of [Cd. 9177].)

In pursuance of the policy of freeing the Empire from dependence on German-controlled organisations in respect of non-ferrous metals and ores, the Conference endorses the principle of the Non-Ferrous Metal Industry Act of the United Kingdom and recommends the Governments of the Empire to adopt effective measures, in so far as these may be necessary and have not already been taken, to carry out this policy.

III.

Control of Raw Materials.

(Fifth Day ; Wednesday, 26th June ; see p. 45.)

(1) The Conference agrees that it is necessary to secure for the British Empire and the belligerent Allies the command of certain essential raw materials in order to enable them to repair the effects of the War as soon as possible and to safeguard their industrial requirements.

(2) The Conference is of opinion that the Governments of the British Empire should make such arrangements amongst themselves as will ensure that essential raw materials produced within the Empire shall be available for the above purposes, and should arrange with the Allied Countries to utilise for the same purposes essential raw materials produced in those countries.

(3) Amongst the raw materials which should be considered for the purpose of this policy, the Conference recommends the following :—

Asbestos	Lead and its ores.
Cotton.	Manganese ores.
Jute.	Nickel, refined and matte.
Wool.	Spelter and zinc concentrates.
Hides and skins.	Tin and its ores.
Leather.	Tungsten ores.
Rubber.	Mica.
Oleaginous products.	Molybdenum.
Petroleum.	Steam coal.
Copper.

IV.

Control of Raw Materials.

(Sixth Day ; Friday, 28th June ; see p. 53.)

That this Conference has considered the provisions of the Imports and Exports (Temporary Control) Bill now before the Imperial Parliament, and is of opinion that, whilst the circumstances of the different parts of the Empire differ widely as regards the extent to which it may prove desirable to pass similar legislation, the respective Governments should nevertheless take such action as may be deemed expedient to enable the objects of Resolution III. to be fully carried out.

To assist the Governments in determining their action in this respect, the Conference recommends :—

(1) that a Committee of its members should first consider the possible methods in each part of the Empire of obtaining command of each of the essential Raw Materials specified in Resolution III. (3).

(2) that the Governments represented at the Conference should, in the light of the information collected by their representatives on this Committee, consult with the representatives of the producers and trades concerned as to the method of obtaining command best suited to each individual commodity.

V.

Imperial Meat Supplies.

(Seventh Day ; Monday, 8th July ; see pp. 89-90.)

The Conference welcomes co-operation among the Governments of the Empire to ensure that the Empire shall become as far as possible self-sufficing in the matter of meat supplies, and recommends the examination by the Governments concerned of the recommendations of the Committee upon Imperial Meat Resources, and the adoption of such legislative and administrative measures as are required for such development within the Empire as will secure this object.

VI.

Enemy Debts.

(Seventh Day ; Monday, 8th July ; see p. 93.)

The Conference having had under consideration the Report of the Enemy Debts Committee, dated 23rd January 1918, and a secret memorandum dealing with returns made in regard to debts and property, expresses general approval of the principles recommended by the Enemy Debts Committee in their Report, dated 23rd January 1918, for the settlement of pre-war debts by Government intervention by means of a clearing scheme, and agrees that in the event of these principles being accepted by the Governments of the Allied Powers, the Governments of the Dominions should appoint delegates to confer in this country with representatives to be appointed by His Majesty's Government as to :—

(a) Legislation necessary to give effect to the recommendations of the Committee in the event of the same being adopted in whole or in part by arrangements with the enemy Governments made in the Treaty of Peace.

(b) Questions on which recommendations have been made by the Enemy Debts Committee which will require legislative action in any event.

VII.

(Seventh Day ; Monday, 8th July ; see p. 70 of [Cd. 9177].)

It is agreed that it is desirable to establish an Imperial Bureau of Mycology for the purpose of supplementing the work of the Imperial Bureau of Entomology, and to obtain the necessary funds for its maintenance by suitable contributions from the Imperial Government, the Governments of the Dominions and India, and of the other Oversea Possessions, as suggested in the Memorandum laid before the Conference.

VIII.

Imperial Statistics.

(Eighth Day ; Wednesday, 10th July ; see p. 87 of [Cd. 9177].)

The Imperial War Conference having considered the correspondence as to the improvement of Imperial Statistics arising out of the recommendations of the Dominions Royal Commission, is in favour of the proposal to hold a Conference of Statisticians after the war, and that such Conference consider the establishment of an Imperial Statistical Bureau under the supervision of an Inter-Imperial Committee.

IX.

Imperial News Service.

(Eighth Day ; Wednesday, 10th July ; see p. 93 of [Cd. 9177].)

The Imperial War Conference is impressed with the importance of securing, (a) that an adequate news service should be available in all parts of the British Empire, and (b) that this service should be supplied through British sources. The Conference requests His Majesty's Government to formulate a scheme, with these objects in view, on the lines indicated in the Memorandum prepared by the Minister of Information, and to submit this scheme for the consideration of the Governments represented at the Conference.

X.

Dye Manufacturing Industry.

(Ninth Day ; Thursday, 11th July ; see p. 103 of [Cd. 9177].)

The Conference takes note of the action taken and contemplated by His Majesty's Government with a view to freeing the industry of the United Kingdom from dependence on German dyestuffs, and recommends the Governments of the Empire to consider immediately what steps can be taken to co-operate with the efforts of the Imperial Government to promote the successful development of the dye industry in the British Empire, and so to avoid enemy domination over our essential industries.

XI.

Shipping.

(Ninth Day ; Thursday, 11th July ; see p. 112 of [Cd. 9177].)

The Conference accepts in principle the establishment of an Imperial Investigation Board and refers it to a Committee of the Conference to frame a detailed scheme for such a Board.

The Conference agrees that it be also referred to the Committee to consider the best machinery for promoting the development of Imperial communications to the best advantage, with special reference to the probable size of vessels and the consequent demands upon harbour accommodation for the purposes of Imperial requirements, and to the Resolution handed in by the Prime Minister of New Zealand.

XII.

Inter-Imperial Parcels Delivery.

(Ninth Day ; Thursday, 11th July ; see p. 112 of [Cd. 9177].)

The Conference considers it desirable, for the purpose of encouraging Imperial trade, that the present facilities for inter-Imperial parcels delivery should be enlarged, improved, and co-ordinated, and recommends that the proposals contained in the Board of Trade memorandum should be examined by the Governments represented at the Conference with a view to the preparation of a detailed scheme designed to promote this object.

XIII.

Central Emigration Authority.

(Tenth Day ; Monday, 15th July ; see pp. 123-124 of [Cd. 9177].)

The Imperial War Conference reaffirms the principle laid down by Resolution XXI. of the 1917 Conference, in favour of arrangements being made by which intending emigrants from the United Kingdom may be induced to settle in countries under the British Flag. It is of opinion that the representatives of the Oversea Dominions in the United Kingdom should keep in the closest touch with any new Body established by His Majesty's Government to supervise emigration from the United Kingdom. The Conference is of opinion that the appointment of a Consultative Committee, not to exceed ten members, on which representatives of the Oversea Dominions should sit, to advise any such Body, would afford the best means of co-operation.

XIV.

Cable Communications.

(Tenth Day ; Monday, 15th July ; see p. 132 of [Cd. 9177].)

That it is in the highest interests of the Empire that the rates for telegraphic communications between the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, South Africa, and India should be further materially reduced as soon as practicable. That in order to ensure generally the cheapest and most secure telegraphic communication between the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, and New Zealand it is desirable that they should co-operate in the provision of a State-owned cable across the Atlantic.

XV.

Channels of Communication.

(Twelfth Day ; Thursday, 18th July ; see p. 165 of [Cd. 9177].)

(1) That this Conference is of the opinion that the development which has taken place in the relations between the United Kingdom and the Dominions necessitates such a change in administrative arrangements and in the Channels of Communication between their Governments as will bring them more directly in touch with each other.

(2) That the Imperial War Cabinet be invited to give immediate consideration to the creation of suitable machinery for this purpose.

XVI.

Imperial Mineral Resources Bureau.

(Thirteenth Day ; Friday, 19th July ; see p. 168 of [Cd. 9177].)

The Imperial War Conference, having considered the memorandum by the Minister of Reconstruction on the Imperial Mineral Resources Bureau, as amended, agrees that the number of representatives of the mineral, mining, and metal industries on the Governing Body of the Bureau should be increased from four (as originally agreed) to six. The Conference further approves the proposal for a Charter of Incorporation as set out in paragraph 6 of the memorandum and the proposals in paragraphs 7 and 8 as to the allocation of expenditure.

XVII.

Demobilization.

(Fourteenth Day ; Monday, 22nd July ; see pp. 147-148.)

The Conference agrees that an advisory and executive committee—to be known as the "Military Demobilization Committee of the British Empire"—should be set up forthwith :—

- (a) To consist of representatives of the Military authorities of the Dominions and Colonies, and of representatives of the War Office, India Office, and Ministry of Shipping, under the Chairmanship of the Secretary of State for War, or some one deputed by him; the secretariat of the Committee to be provided by the Mobilization Directorate of the War Office.
- (b) To consider all military questions of demobilization affecting the various Governments concerned by :—
 - (i) making decisions in regard to matters of detail;
 - (ii) submitting questions of principle which may arise from time to time to the Government or Governments concerned;
 - (iii) arranging for the fullest interchange of information with regard to plans for demobilization.
- (c) To sit, prior to general demobilization, at such time as may be considered necessary by the Chairman, during demobilization, as frequently as may be necessary to secure the complete mutual co-ordination of the demobilization procedure of the various Governments concerned.

XVIII.

Petroleum.

(Fourteenth Day ; Monday, 22nd July ; see p. 163.)

The Conference takes note of the Memorandum on the question of Petroleum, and, having regard to the great and growing importance of petroleum and its products for Naval, Military, and industrial purposes, desires to commend the suggestions contained in the Memorandum to the serious consideration of the Governments concerned.

XIX.

Naturalization.

(Fourteenth Day ; Monday, 22nd July ; see p. 183 of [Cd. 9177].)

This Conference is of opinion that legislation should be passed throughout the Empire restricting, for a period after the War, so far as in the circumstances of each country may be possible, the naturalization of citizens of present enemy countries, and also the acquisition by them of any form of political rights or of land or mining privileges.

[The Government of the Dominion of Canada abstained from voting ; the Government of the Union of South Africa recorded dissent.]

XX.

Nationality and Naturalization.

(Fourteenth Day ; Monday, 22nd July ; see p. 192 of [Cd. 9177].)

The Conference refers to the Resolution X. passed by the Imperial War Conference, 1917, recognising the desirability and importance of securing uniformity of policy and action throughout the Empire with regard to naturalization, and recommends that a special Conference, representative of all parts of the Empire, should be held at the earliest practicable date to examine and report in the light of that Resolution upon any question connected with nationality or naturalization which any Government represented at the special Conference may desire to raise, and upon any suggestions which may be made for the amendment of the existing law.

XXI.

Reciprocity of Treatment between India and the Dominions.

(Fifteenth Day ; Wednesday, 24th July ; see p. 195 of [Cd. 9177].)

The Imperial War Conference is of opinion that effect should now be given to the principle of reciprocity approved by Resolution XXII. of the Imperial War Conference, 1917. In pursuance of that Resolution it is agreed that :—

1. It is an inherent function of the Governments of the several communities of the British Commonwealth, including India, that each should enjoy complete control of the composition of its own population by means of restriction on immigration from any of the other communities.

2. British citizens domiciled in any British country, including India, should be admitted into any other British country for visits, for the purpose of pleasure or commerce, including temporary residence for the purpose of education. The conditions of such visits should be regulated on the principle of reciprocity, as follows :—

(a) The right of the Government of India is recognised to enact laws which shall have the effect of subjecting British citizens domiciled in any other British country to the same conditions in visiting India as those imposed on Indians desiring to visit such country.

(b) Such right of visit or temporary residence shall, in each individual case, be embodied in a passport or written permit issued by the country of domicile and subject to visé there by an officer appointed by, and acting on behalf of, the country to be visited, if such country so desires.

(c) Such right shall not extend to a visit or temporary residence for labour purposes or to permanent settlement.

3. Indians already permanently domiciled in the other British countries should be allowed to bring in their wives and minor children on condition (a) that not more than one wife and her children shall be admitted for each such Indian and (b) that each individual so admitted shall be certified by the Government of India as being the lawful wife or child of such Indian.

4. The Conference recommends the other questions covered by the memoranda presented this year and last year to the Conference by the representatives of India in so far as not dealt with in the foregoing paragraphs of this Resolution to the various Governments concerned with a view to early consideration.

XXII.

Imperial Court of Appeal.

(Sixteenth Day ; Friday, 26th July ; see p. 210 of [Cd. 9177].)

The Conference is of opinion—

(1) That the question of replacing the present dual system of appeal by the constitution of one Imperial Court of Appeal demands the prompt consideration of His Majesty's Government.

(2) That the Lord Chancellor should be invited to prepare and circulate to the Governments of the Dominions and of India as soon as possible, a memorandum of such proposals as in the opinion of His Majesty's Government are practicable for that purpose with a view to decision at the next Imperial Conference.

(3) That each such Government as soon as possible thereafter shall communicate to the Government of the United Kingdom its views with regard to such proposals.

XXIII.

Control of Raw Materials.

(Sixteenth Day ; Friday, 26th July ; see p. 192.)

(1) The Conference, having considered the Report of the Committee on Raw Materials, requests His Majesty's Government to communicate this Report forthwith to the Governments of the Dominions and India and to ascertain their views on the appropriate action to be taken.

(2) The Conference further agrees that steps should be taken to ascertain the needs and the resources of the Allies in respect of the raw materials specified in the Report.

(3) The Conference considers that the figures given in the Report as to the raw material requirements of the Empire might with advantage be used by the British Delegates at any forthcoming Inter-Allied Conference, subject to any corrections that may be made necessary by later and fuller information.

XXIV.

Shipping.

(1) That in order to maintain satisfactorily the connections and, at the same time, encourage commercial and industrial relations, between the different countries of the British Empire, this Conference is of opinion that shipping on the principal routes, especially between the heart of the Empire and the Oversea Dominions, including India, should be brought under review by an Inter-Imperial Board on which the United Kingdom and the British Dominions and Dependencies should be represented.

(2) That for this purpose an Imperial Investigation Board, representing the various parts of the Empire, be appointed, with power to inquire into and report on all matters connected with ocean freights and facilities, and on all matters connected with the development and improvement of the sea communications between the different parts of the Empire, with special reference to the size and type of ships, and the capacities of harbours; the Board to include, in addition to representatives of the Governments concerned, persons with expert knowledge of the problems involved, including representatives of the shipping and trading interests.

XXV.

Concluding Resolution.

(Sixteenth Day; Friday, 26th July; see p. 222 of [Cd. 9177].)

The Members of the Conference representing India and the Oversea Dominions desire before they separate to convey to the Secretary of State for the Colonies their earnest and sincere appreciation of his labours in preparing for, and presiding over, the Conference.

They desire also to put on record their deep sense of gratitude for the many courtesies which they have received from the Prime Minister and the other members of His Majesty's Government, as well as for the generous hospitality which has been extended to them by the Government and people of the United Kingdom.

The part in [] was omitted from p. 31 of [Cd. 9177].

General WARE: Oh, very much so.

[Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I observe that the number of deaths amongst the Canadian Expeditionary Force is given as 32,878 up to the 14th April 1918. Our record shows that we have more than 40,000 dead. Apparently there is some discrepancy. I shall inquire into that, and ask the Minister of the Overseas Service to communicate with you respecting it.]

Mr. ROWELL: Is it contemplated, &c., &c.

The part in [] was omitted from p. 32 of [Cd. 9177].

CHAIRMAN: The really important question for the Conference to decide, if they have no further questions to ask General Ware, is whether they will accept the suggestion that the ultimate cost of this work shall be defrayed by the respective Governments in proportion to the numbers of the graves of their dead.

[Mr. HUGHES: I should like to ask General Ware one question. I see on page 2 of these tables the aggregate number of deaths set out. I should like to obtain some idea of the date to which that is made up.

General WARE: Up to the 14th April 1918.

Mr. HUGHES: I turn to page 5 of the same tables, where the Australian deaths are shown, and I see there there is a discrepancy of at least 7,000 between the totals there and what is known to us. If you apply that generally, you will see there is a very great discrepancy.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is the same discrepancy with regard to our figures.

CHAIRMAN: Are your figures up to the same date—14th April—or up to to-day?

Mr. HUGHES: That is up to to-day—up to last week, say. Although I would not like to say that the difference could not be accounted for in that way, I am not inclined to think it can be. That would involve 35,000 casualties in the Australians since the 14th April, and I do not think we have had much more than half that.

CHAIRMAN: It is evident there is a discrepancy, and those figures will have to be corrected, for the discrepancy could not be accounted for by that number of casualties.

Mr. HUGHES: No doubt the figures are very difficult to ascertain.

General WARE: Those are the official figures, which we accept. We cannot go behind them.

Mr. HUGHES: No. Ours are official, too, and we cannot go behind those.

CHAIRMAN: I think that had better be inquired into.

General WARE: We actually are inquiring. Sir Robert Borden drew my attention to the matter the other day, and we are inquiring. There is some discrepancy, undoubtedly. I would suggest that in the figures you have, Mr. Hughes, a certain number of the missing have been written off as dead, whereas in the other case they are treated as "missing." I think that is what it comes to. As a matter of fact, two of my officers spent the week-end in trying to find out how this discrepancy arose, and that is the only suggestion they could give me this morning. When a man is missing, the War Office insists on as complete evidence as can be obtained that he is dead before writing him off as dead. In the meantime one may be practically certain that the man is dead, though there is not the actual evidence. Well, I think your record has gone a little ahead of the War Office in that way.

Mr. HUGHES: No, that is not so. I have got a return quite recently, in which the dead, the missing, and the prisoners and other casualties were shown separately; the men missing were in all cases separately so shown.

General WARE: Well, the matter is being inquired into to see if anything can be arrived at on that point.

Mr. HUGHES: Some of the missing, no doubt, are dead. However, it is not material to the question Mr. Long was just putting—at least, not very material.]

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have been asked to move this Resolution, &c., &c.

The part in [] was omitted from p. 35 of [Cd. 9177].

CHAIRMAN: * * * That is the end of their recommendation. [In connection with the Reports which I have quoted, I should like very briefly to mention certain figures which were prepared confidentially by the statistical experts at the War Office for the Empire Settlement Committee as to the estimated decline in the male population of England and Wales in April of this year as compared with 1911, when the last Census was taken. They gave figures showing that, after allowing for deaths in war, the male population between 20 and 24 would have declined since April 1911 by some 70,000, that between 25 and 29 by no less than 112,000, and that between 30 and 34 by 75,000.

Mr. HUGHES: What is the aggregate?

CHAIRMAN: About 250,000. These figures were based on two assumptions, first, that if there had been no war, emigration from the United Kingdom between 1911 and 1918 would have proceeded at the same rate as in the preceding decade; secondly, that the deaths due to military casualties in 1917-18 would be equal to those in 1916-17. As to these assumptions, I need say nothing as regards the first. As to the second, I need hardly remind you of the heavy casualties sustained during the first part of this year's German offensive by the British Army. Even now, unfortunately, it is not improbable that still heavier casualties may be awaiting us in the future.] The position as regards the future man-power of the Empire is clearly one which cannot but cause grave anxiety. &c., &c., &c.

THIRD DAY.

Wednesday, 19th June 1918.

THE IMPERIAL WAR CONFERENCE MET AT THE COLONIAL OFFICE AT 11 A.M.

PRESENT:

The Right Honourable WALTER H. LONG, M.P., Secretary of State for the Colonies (Chairman of the Conference).

The Right Honourable Sir ALBERT STANLEY, M.P., President of the Board of Trade.

Mr. W. A. S. HEWINS, M.P., Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies.

Canada.

The Right Honourable Sir R. L. BORDEN, G.C.M.G., Prime Minister.

The Honourable A. MEIGHEN, K.C., Minister of the Interior.

The Honourable J. A. CALDER, Minister of Immigration and Colonization.

The Honourable N. W. ROWELL, K.C., President of the Privy Council.

Australia.

The Right Honourable W. M. HUGHES, Prime Minister.

The Right Honourable J. COOK, Minister of the Navy.

New Zealand.

The Right Honourable W. F. MASSEY, Prime Minister.

The Right Honourable Sir JOSEPH WARD, Bart., K.C.M.G., Minister of Finance.

South Africa.

Lieutenant-General the Right Honourable J. C. SMUTS.

The Honourable H. BURTON, K.C., Minister of Railways and Harbours.

Newfoundland.

The Right Honourable W. F. LLOYD, Prime Minister.

India.

The Right Honourable E. S. MONTAGU, M.P., Secretary of State for India.

Major-General His Highness The MAHARAJA OF PATIALA, G.C.I.E., G.B.E.

The Honourable Sir S. P. SINHA, K.C., Member of the Executive Council of the Governor of Bengal.

Mr. H. C. M. LAMBERT, C.B., Secretary to the Conference.

Mr. E. J. HARDING, C.M.G., Junior Assistant Secretary to the Conference.

THERE WERE ALSO PRESENT:

Sir G. V. FIDDES, G.C.M.G., C.B., Permanent Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies.

Sir A. D. STEEL-MAITLAND, Bart., M.P., Additional Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and Additional Parliamentary Secretary, Board of Trade.

Sir H. LEWELLYN SMITH, K.C.B., Permanent Secretary, Board of Trade.

Mr. VICTOR A. A. WELLESLEY, Controller of Commercial and Consular Affairs, Foreign Office.

Mr. H. FOUNTAINS, C.B., C.M.G., Assistant Secretary, Commercial Relations and Treaties Department, Board of Trade.
 Mr. PERCY ASHLEY, Assistant Secretary, Industries and Manufactures Department, Board of Trade.
 Mr. L. CHRISTIE, Legal Adviser, Department of External Affairs, Canada.
 Sir R. GARRAN, C.M.G., Solicitor-General, Commonwealth of Australia.
 Lieutenant-Cominander J. G. LATHAM, Royal Australian Naval Board.
 Major-General Sir G. ASTON, K.C.B., of the War Cabinet Secretariat.
 Mr. H. W. CARLESS DAVIS, C.B.E., Deputy Chairman, War Trade Intelligence Department.
 And Private Secretaries.

Control of Raw Materials.

CHAIRMAN: The subjects for to-day are four Resolutions dealing with the control of raw materials after the war, which have already been circulated to members of the Conference, and I think it would be convenient if I make a very brief statement to the Conference just telling them what has happened since the last Conference in regard to these questions. We enter to-day on that part of our programme which deals with economic subjects: it is, in some ways, the most important part of our work, and I propose to say a few words of introduction to the subject before we deal with the Resolutions in detail.

You will remember that the last Conference passed a Resolution, No. XXI., respecting the question of Imperial trade policy after the war, and His Majesty's Government, as I informed the Dominion Governments in October last, appointed a Committee of Ministers, of which I was myself Chairman, to inquire into and report on the best method and machinery for giving effect to the Resolution. The question of the post-war control of raw materials has naturally been one to which the Committee has devoted most anxious consideration. As you will have gathered from the Reports on the subject* which have been circulated to you, the conclusion we reached was that owing to the great complexity of the circumstances, which vary indefinitely with every commodity, it is not possible to draft any general scheme for controlling raw materials after the war, but that each commodity must be dealt with separately and on its own merits. When the war comes to an end, we may feel certain that in whatever position it may find the different belligerents, we shall—ourselves, our friends, and our enemies alike—be in urgent need of a number of things of which supplies have been inadequate during the war, and, in fact, the world's supplies of some of these articles will be very short. Of some of them the Empire cannot possibly hope to produce an adequate supply, while of others we shall not only have plenty for ourselves, if we control the supply, but we shall have enough to enable us to secure from our Allies and our enemies some of these things of which we stand in need. Our Committee has regarded the whole question primarily from the point of view of the urgent necessity for securing to the Empire a sufficiency of essential raw materials to enable it to repair the ravages of war, and they have sought to devise some effective machinery by which the Empire, which, taken together and acting as a whole, is one of the strongest and richest economic Powers in the world, may secure, first to itself and next to its Allies, those materials which it must have if the industrial life of this country and other parts of the Empire is to recover its prosperity.

In order effectively to carry out the policy which we put forward, it is essential that His Majesty's Government should know that the Empire is united in this matter, and the draft Resolutions which have been laid before you aim at this result. If the Conference accepts the policy, I feel sure the Empire will possess a very powerful weapon for defence, and possibly also for offence when peace negotiations come. How effective it may be in this latter sense only experience can show, but this, I think, may be safely said: that the measure of the needs of others will be the measure of its effectiveness for us. And those needs in the case of the Central Empires we know in certain cases to be very great.

The Resolutions, you will see, do not lay down more than a general line of policy. It is, as I have already indicated, impossible to deal with individual commodities except by separate treatment, and for this the Resolutions provide. Inquiries as to the special measures required in individual cases have already been started by a Sub-Committee, of which Mr. Hewins was chairman. He has given a great deal of time and thought to these subjects, and I propose to ask him to take part in the detailed discussion of the Resolutions later on.

* See pp. 209-221.

Before I close, I would observe that the Resolutions do not cover the whole ground. The President of the Board of Trade, Sir Albert Stanley, is here to-day, and will, as I say, take part in the discussion. He will deal, primarily, with the need for legislation throughout the Empire to control imports and exports after the war, and also the Non-ferrous Metal Industry Act. There are also certain special subjects which it is convenient to treat separately, viz., meat and wool; and we are anxious also to deal with the question of enemy debts. But all these subjects will, I think, more conveniently follow the consideration of the present Resolutions, which I lay before you as embodying a policy which, if the Empire will act together as a whole, should, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, not only give the world a working example of the policy of preference which we all accepted last year, but should yield practical results of the utmost value.

That is merely a brief statement of what has happened, what has led up to the present position of affairs. I therefore formally move the four Resolutions which are as follows:—

I. The Conference agrees that it is necessary to secure a sufficiency of essential raw materials in order to enable the British Empire to repair the effects of the war as soon as possible, and to safeguard its industrial requirements, and that for this purpose it is desirable to control certain raw materials produced within the Empire.

II. The Conference agrees that the materials enumerated in the following lists are deserving of consideration as suitable for such control:—

List (1).—Raw Materials of Empire origin required by the United Kingdom and the Allies.

Asbestos.	Copper.
Cotton.	Lead and its ores.
Jute.	Manganese ores.
Wool.	Nickel, refined and matte.
Hides and skins.	Spelter and zinc concentrates.
Leather.	Tin and its ores.
Rubber.	Tungsten ores.
Oleaginous produce.	Mica.

List (2).—Raw Materials of Empire origin which might be the Subject of Special Arrangements with Foreign Powers.

Asbestos, fine.	Steam coal.
Cotton.	Rubber.
Jute.	Zinc concentrates.
Wool.	Mica.
Nickel.	Oleaginous seeds and nuts.
Tin.

III. The Conference resolves that each of the Governments represented should appoint delegates empowered to make arrangements in respect of such articles produced within the Empire and enumerated in Resolution II. as have not already formed the subject of special arrangements.

IV. The Conference charges His Majesty's Government to negotiate with foreign Powers, on behalf of the different Governments of the Empire, such arrangements as will enable the Empire to obtain sufficient quantities of important raw materials of which adequate supplies are not produced within its limits.

Mr. MONTAGU : Will you take them all together ?

CHAIRMAN : Yes, unless the Conference decides to take them separately. I move them now pro forma, but, if preferred, they can be taken individually, one by one.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN : I think you will have to take them individually.

CHAIRMAN : Yes, if you wish.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN : Which one first ?

CHAIRMAN : No. 1. It is a draft Resolution. Is it your pleasure that we take a discussion upon that Resolution first, by itself ?

[Agreed.]

Sir ROBERT BORDEN : It would be well to have a statement on it first. Without some explanation, I should hardly be prepared to concur in the draft Resolution in its present form.

Mr. HEWINS : Mr. Long, perhaps I had better explain the origin and genesis of these Resolutions. As you have stated, your Committee was appointed by the Prime Minister, to take into consideration the methods of carrying out Resolution XXI. of the Imperial War Conference of last year. That Resolution affected raw materials. The general tenor of the Resolution was that steps should be taken to make the Empire self-sufficient with regard to food, raw materials, and essential industries, and that special facilities should be given by each part of the Empire to the other parts with the view of promoting that. The question naturally hinges on other matters of the greatest delicacy and importance. There is in particular the matter of the post-war control of raw materials which is of the greatest interest, not only to the British Empire, but to all our Allies, and, in fact, to the world. And when Mr. Long's Committee got to work they had to consider the manner and the order in which the question should be approached.

The control of raw materials, in any shape or form, is not merely an economic or a business question, it raises a great many other questions as well. And we are face to face with the fact that although the British Empire contains large deposits of raw materials which are required for purposes within the Empire and outside, at the same time those raw materials are under the control of different Governments; that it is not the United Kingdom which controls these raw materials, which some people were rather by way of thinking, but that they are in the Dominions, the great self-governing nations, which must come to an agreement amongst themselves with regard to what should be done with them. And, whatever might be done at subsequent stages, it was thought by the Committee that it was necessary, as a matter of order and business-like arrangement—to put it on no higher ground—that, first of all, the Empire must arrange within itself what it would do, what it would sanction with regard to the raw materials within the Empire. Then, on the nature of the policy to be adopted, it was not only undesirable, but it was impossible to lay down any one general method which might be put before, let us say, the Conference, because different parts of the Empire had different expedients at their hand for dealing with the various economic questions which arise. And, whilst sketching out the general condition of things, it was felt it was absolutely essential that consultation must take place as to the different methods that might be commended in regard to different raw materials. We were, therefore, forced to consider the question in detail.

If you take simply the list of materials in these Resolutions, it is obvious that they raise very different economic questions and very different issues, and Mr. Long's Committee thought therefore that it was desirable to see, by way of an investigation in detail, the conditions surrounding different raw materials which we have to handle. That was the origin of that branch of the work of the Sub-committee to which Mr. Long has alluded. And we proceeded to take the raw materials serialim. I have got here a full list of all the subjects that we have surveyed in that Sub-committee. And we kept before our minds not the idea that we could lay down the policy to be there and then accepted, so to speak, but the idea of adequate preparations for detailed discussion when the Conference should set out to explore these matters thoroughly, and we tried to see what the considerations were which had to be kept in view. And accordingly, in addition to these reports which are before you, I have a vast collection of very detailed reports on each of the raw materials enumerated, constructed with the view of supplying a basis for detailed consideration, so that we could work out, serialim, in regard to each one what may be the best policy to be adopted.

We began, on the Committee, with the group of metals. We took nickel, tin, zinc, tungsten, aluminium, manganese, lead, and the other metals enumerated. On Mr. Long's Sub-committee we did not deal with cotton or wool because those subjects were already provided for under the auspices of Sir Albert Stanley at the Board of Trade and of other committees. Jute was under consideration by the India Office, but we considered a report upon jute. Rubber is being considered in various ways. General steps have been taken with regard to raw materials. Just a bare description of these steps is set forth in the Third Report of Mr. Long's Committee,* which is printed and lies before you. That is just a description of the ground which has been covered. It does not set forth Resolutions to be adopted; it is simply a description of what has been done for the information of the Conference. Having taken those steps, these reports were carefully analysed and considered, and the result of that survey was the First and Second Reports on Raw Materials which lie before you,† which were submitted to the Cabinet and approved in general.

Therefore, if the course of procedure which I have indicated were adopted, you would first of all go into detail in regard to the materials enumerated to see what line of policy may be adopted. Having gone into that detail, then this Conference, it might be hoped, would be able to come to some more general conclusions, so as to define the position of the Empire with regard to the matter generally, and the Empire would then be in a position to take part in those negotiations which must necessarily follow with our Allies, to see what we can do to assist them and assist ourselves in repairing the devastations of war and determine the development of policy after the war. We did not approach the subject as to whether it was desirable or not to pursue an aggressive policy—if I may use the word—with regard to Germany after the war. We took the line that we should look, first of all, to the interests of the British Empire as a whole, that then we should link up those interests, as far as possible, with those of our Allies, and that, probably, if you secured those objects, and secured the means by which you should organise and repair the devastations of the war, you would have sufficiently emphasised your line of policy to correct any aggressive policy on the part of Germany.

Mr. HUGHES : You follow the Resolutions of the Paris Economic Conference, practically.

Mr. HEWINS : Yes, practically that is how the thing was done. That is the origin of these Resolutions, which are based upon the Reports of Mr. Long's Committee, in so far as they concern the Empire. The steps which would have to be taken with regard to the Allies, supposing the Empire came to an agreement on the general line of policy, would naturally follow. But we felt that the first thing which was necessary was to consider the Empire, the family of great nations—that it is best, first of all, for them to settle their own policy and what they particularly wish to do, before defining what shall be done with any raw material in reference to any of our Allies or any other country. That, I think, is the way in which the thing has arisen.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN : Has the United States Government been consulted with regard to these proposals ?

Mr. HEWINS : These Resolutions ?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN : Not the exact Resolutions, but the general proposals.

Mr. HEWINS : Yes, they are generally acquainted with the lines of them.

* See pp. 212-221.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is reason to believe they are watching the proceedings of this Conference with a good deal of interest, and there is the possible danger of a lack of sympathy on their part with what we have in mind. Naturally, this Empire and the United States of America are economic rivals under ordinary conditions. It is said that they are impressed with the opinion that some of our activities at the present time are pointing in a direction which would not command their sympathy, to say the least, for that reason.

Mr. MASSEY: May I suggest that members speak a little louder? The acoustic properties of this room are not very good. (Hear, hear.)

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, I know that, Mr. Massey. That, I say, should be borne in mind. My attention has been called to some other portions of these Resolutions to which I will direct attention a little later. In the first place, so far as the control of all these raw materials is concerned, I think it must be carefully borne in mind by this Conference that in the Oversea Dominions, particularly those that are formed upon a Federal basis, the control of such raw materials is of a somewhat varied character. In the first place, there are raw materials which already have passed into private ownership, and as to which control could be exercised, in Canada at least, only by the Provincial Governments. It might be possible that the Federal Parliament could, as a war measure, pass legislation which would be effective. But we would have to take the rights of the Provinces into consideration.

Then, as to raw materials which have not yet passed into private ownership, we in Canada are confronted with this situation: that a portion of them is vested in the Provinces, a portion of them is vested in the Dominion. We have an anomalous situation in this respect, that some of the Provinces of Canada have full ownership and control of their natural resources, and some of the Provinces of Canada have not. It is possible that that situation may be altered in the not distant future. Of course, it is recognised, as Mr. Hewins said, that control can only be exercised by the governing powers of the Dominions, whether Federal or Provincial. We shall have to start with that. It seems to me there may be a good deal of practical difficulty in working the matter out when we come to ask the people of the Oversea Dominions to accept a control which might interfere very seriously with the value of their products. I have not considered that very carefully, but the Conference ought to consider it very carefully before we embark upon any plan, or before we authorise delegates to enter upon any definite plan. There are other members of the Conference who have devoted much more study to this question than I have, and I speak with deference to their opinions, and with great respect for what they may be able to say on the subject.

The concluding Resolution does not commend itself to my judgment in its present form. It says: "The Conference charges His Majesty's Government to negotiate with foreign Powers, on behalf of the different Governments of the Empire, such arrangements as will enable the Empire to obtain sufficient quantities of important raw materials of which adequate supplies are not produced within its limits."

Mr. HUGHES: Where is that?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No. IV. Now, one has to consider the practical operation of that. Take, for example, our relations with the United States. We interchange raw materials on a very large scale. The United States of America are practically wholly dependent upon us for their supplies of nickel. We are dependent on the United States for our supplies of cotton, supplies of iron ore, and supplies of coal. Half the coal used in Canada comes from the United States. Distribution is based upon considerations of transportation, upon geographical position. If we desire to make arrangements with the United States, as we have had to make arrangements with them during this war, with regard to our supplies of coal, why should Canada, particularly, charge His Majesty's Government with the duty of arranging that. I venture to say, with all respect, that we could probably arrange it ourselves much more effectively and more expeditiously than His Majesty's Government. And it seems to me that there is a somewhat reactionary idea conveyed in that paragraph, although, I have no doubt, nothing of the kind was intended. But its effect might be that which I have indicated, and I should take exception to such a proposal for the reasons that I have stated.

Mr. HUGHES: Is this put forward in the form of a Resolution to be affirmed by the Conference?

CHAIRMAN: If they so please.

Mr. MASSEY: Only No. I., sir, I think.

CHAIRMAN: No. I. is before us. Sir Robert Borden referred to No. IV. in order, as I take it, to save time.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I thought they were all one Resolution.

CHAIRMAN: No. You suggested their being taken separately.

Mr. HUGHES: We are dealing with No. I.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I was under a misapprehension in regard to that, because there are a number of Resolutions dealing more or less with the same subject, and I thought you were referring to all of these.

CHAIRMAN: No; only with No. I.

Mr. HUGHES: I think, sir, that we can most usefully approach this matter by way of a discussion which will cover the whole policy, because—speaking for myself—Resolution No. I. is one to which I do not think any exception can be taken; it is very largely abstract in its nature. But there are other Resolutions, and the policy generally, in its application in detail, involves some difficulties. Sir Robert has pointed out some of them.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Mr. Hughes, when I suggested we should take No. I., I meant the whole of the four Resolutions on this subject, because there were a number of other Resolutions about imports and exports, and so on, and I thought Mr. Long asked whether we should take them all at once.

CHAIRMAN: No. I. only meant the first of the four dealing with the control of raw materials.

Mr. HUGHES: You are taking a general discussion on No. I., are you?

CHAIRMAN: Just as the Conference wishes. We will take them all together, if you like.

Mr. HUGHES: If we are not to do that, then I think No. I. should go pro forma, and let us get on with the discussion.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Mr. Hughes, I entirely agree that we should take these four as one, and have a discussion on them.

Mr. MASSEY: I think, Mr. Long, we might take a discussion on the four, but if there is going to be a vote—though probably there will not be anything in that way—the motions should be put seriatim, one at a time.

CHAIRMAN: Shall we take the general discussion on the four? And, if necessary, we can divide them afterwards, for adoption or rejection.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I agree. I thought that was what we were doing.

CHAIRMAN: No. We took your early suggestion, which was apparently made under a misapprehension.

Mr. HUGHES: Take the Third Report of the Committee on Raw Materials,* to which some reference has been made. This raises the question, in a concrete way, how you are going to deal with this matter. The first of the four Resolutions is, if I may say so, a mere pious expression of opinion as to what it is desirable to do. People pass resolutions such as No. I. every day and nothing comes of them; but I apprehend that we are here to do things if it is possible at all to do so. We must therefore consider how far we can give effect to this policy. I need hardly say that I have been an advocate of this policy, and generally I heartily approve of the proposal. But there are a number of difficulties, and some of those difficulties ought to be stated. When you speak of raw materials, of course there are raw materials and raw materials. I will give you two cases in point. Australia produces copper, lead, zinc, wool and other things. Now, speaking from a purely Australian point of view, it is a matter of perfect indifference to us—and I am speaking now as if Australia was a shopkeeper or a merchant with these things to sell—it is a matter of perfect indifference to us whether any particular person tells us that he will buy our lead or our zinc or our wool, because we can produce enough of these three commodities to influence the world's markets so materially that they must buy them, and as to these articles it is a question whether we sell rather than whether other people buy. But with copper and other things it is quite different. We produce, of course, very much more copper than we require ourselves, but our production of copper is, compared with the world-production, only a drop in the bucket, and our copper cannot influence the world's price, which is affected by the American production, the American output, and so on.

* See pp. 212-221.

Now, when we are asked to make our raw material available for the Empire, I think it is only fair to ask that the Empire should take this raw material as a whole—not only those things that just suit her, leaving us with the things for which we have to scramble for a market, because that places us in an awkward position and an unfair one. We can do better with certain articles, say copper or wheat (assuming we are able to sell them), if we have at hand articles which these same nations who will buy these things, or whom we want to buy these things, must buy. They must buy our wool; they must have zinc; they must have lead. In a lesser degree they must have tungsten ore. If we withhold any of these the market is affected materially. Well, what is to become of all those raw materials of which we have neither a monopoly nor a controlling influence in the market? And our distance from that market being so considerable as to place us at a disadvantage, how does this scheme propose to help us? I am sure the Conference realises that we are a long way off England. That distance, sometimes, is a disadvantage to us, a great disadvantage. If we were 3,000 miles away, our circumstances would be very different. If we have to sell our things in this market, or get them to this market, there are 9,000 or 10,000 miles of ocean transport, of lee-way, to make up before we get level, say, with Canada or with the United States of America; much more, of course, before we get level with Europe. So I think when we talk about the raw materials we want an Imperial policy dealing with raw materials of Empire origin required by the United Kingdom and the Allies. We want to have a policy which will apply to our raw materials in general, and not merely to such of our raw materials as may happen to suit your requirements in particular. You may be able to get some raw material cheaper elsewhere. Very good. But it is most embarrassing and unsatisfactory to us if you pick the eyes out of our produce and leave us with that which is relatively unsaleable.

After all, gentlemen, this is an economic question as well as a national one. If you put the whole thing on a national basis, then the argument which I put forward, or am suggesting, has additional force, and it may be said that you ought not to have regard to price at all. If these things are necessary for Empire defence, the fact that they are 2,000 miles away or 22,000 miles away ought not to affect the case at all. Some things are necessary; you have put some of them down on the lists here. Probably if you added oil and rubber to those things which you have put here you would run the gamut of all those things which, if a nation had a monopoly of them, would make her independent, economically and nationally. I submit, therefore, that if we are to have a policy, it should be one that takes into consideration raw materials in general, and not such raw materials only as may happen to suit your particular purpose. Otherwise you spoil our market utterly elsewhere, because you prevent our selling relatively unsaleable articles. Now, we have some good lines, and I speak quite candidly when I say that if we were dealing with these on a purely commercial basis it would be a matter of perfect indifference to us whether you said you would buy them or you did not; we can sell them anywhere. But there are other lines—and I suppose that is true of every one of the Dominions—of which that cannot be said. And so, if we regard ourselves, as we ought to, as members of one family, or—to express it in terms more suited to our circumstances—as a League of Nations, bound together by self-interest, by blood, by ideal, by tradition, by fear of common dangers, I say that either the commercial aspect ought to be blotted out altogether, so that you may deal with things with due regard to the circumstances of each part of the Empire, or else that there is no other alternative than to treat the matter on a purely commercial basis.

Incidentally, Mr. Long, you have omitted from this second column of the first list molybdenum. You want to put molybdenum there, which is used for the same purposes but which is not a tungsten ore.

I am not going to say anything more, excepting that if and when we are to consider the methods by which we are going to effect this—whether, for instance, it is “essential to the success of the policy,” as stated in the Third Report on Raw Materials, “that three general measures of control should be adopted . . . to prohibit the export and re-export” of the articles scheduled, “to reserve the “right of requisitioning them when they are stored for foreign account,” and, “so far as the non-ferrous metals are concerned, to adopt the policy which is “adopted in the Non-ferrous Metal Act of the United Kingdom,” all these matters require the most careful consideration. We are a great coal-exporting country, we have a limitless quantity of iron ore, and it is difficult to know to what extent this prohibition goes.

I want, in conclusion, only to say that I not only approve the principle of this proposal, but I believe it to be absolutely essential for the welfare, and even for the economic existence, of the Empire. At the same time, because of the circumstances of the various Dominions, and because, after all, they are nations now and no longer Colonies—they have a national consciousness, they are very jealous of any interference with their rights, and they are very keen that we should safeguard their interests—I hope that this Conference will, if it agrees to any concrete proposal, have regard to the commercial and industrial interests of the several Dominions from which raw materials are to be obtained.

Mr. MASSEY: We had some discussion on this subject, Mr. Long, last year, as probably you will recollect, and it was understood that the matter should come up for discussion again this year. I am very glad that it is being brought before the Conference, because I am quite sure that each and every member after the experience we have had during the last four years, or even a larger number of years for that matter, will understand its importance, looking at the different proposals and at the subject from an Empire point of view.

The last speaker referred to the different Dominions and Dependencies of the Empire as practically free nations, and it would be difficult to describe them in any other way. I, at any rate, will not attempt to do so, because I am just as anxious to safeguard the autonomy of the different parts of the Empire as any citizen of the Empire can possibly be. But in speaking of our Dominions, and thinking in their interests, we have got to consider that we are all parts of the Empire, and all under one Sovereign. And I hope that the present arrangement may last, as the saying goes, until the sound of the last trumpet, or at all events for many centuries to come.

However, dealing with the subject of raw materials itself, I think it might be advantageous to divide the classification of those raw materials into two sections: (1) those which may possibly be used for war purposes by other nations; and (2) those raw materials which are not required for war purposes. Now, if we go back for the last few years, I think each and every one of us can recollect instances where the raw materials produced within the Empire have been exported to present enemy countries. I am not speaking of all of them, I am speaking of some of them—they have been exported to present enemy countries, and by present enemy countries have been used, since the war broke out, against us for war purposes. It does not require a very great stretch of the memory to recollect that from different parts of the Empire—I am afraid we are all to blame in this respect—iron ores have been exported to Germany, lead ores have been exported to Germany, zinc ores have been exported to Germany, and what are called here oleaginous products have been exported to Germany, and in very large quantities. And what has been the effect? The effect has been, Mr. Long, that these articles have been fired back at our soldiers, fired back at our citizens, in the form of shells, in the form of bullets, and in the form of explosives. Now I hope that something will be done, that some satisfactory arrangement may be made, by which nothing of this sort will happen in the future. In saying that, please understand that I am not thinking of any of the present Allied countries. Though the results of the Paris Conference appear to have fallen through by the withdrawal of at least two of the countries concerned, I am strongly of opinion that, as far as we are concerned at all events, the principles of the Paris Conference should be observed; and so far as I understand the proposals now before the Conference, these proposals go in that direction.

The principle, I think, will be generally agreed to, though in all probability—and this is to be expected—some objection will be raised to one or two of the details. Sir Robert Borden has already referred to the transactions which have taken place, and are continually taking place, between the great Dominion of Canada and their neighbours the people of the United States. Well, in cases like those, I think such transactions may be safely left to the people immediately concerned to deal with—that is, to the Government of the United States on the one hand, and the Government of Canada—either the Federal Government or the Governments of the different Provinces, as the case may be, on the other. I cannot imagine that any interference is intended in that way, either between Canada and the United States, or between any other country of the British Empire and the United States, or any one of the Allied countries. Personally, Mr. Long, referring to the first line of the first Resolution, where it says that “it is necessary to secure a sufficiency of essential raw materials in order to enable the British Empire to repair the effects of the war,” I think each and every one of us agrees with this proposal, and agrees with the existence of that necessity, though there may be differences of opinion as to how best to go about meeting it. Personally, I believe that, with very few exceptions, the British Empire itself can, with a certain amount of encouragement, and not very much encouragement at that, produce all the raw materials required for its own purposes.

Mr. HUGHES: Hear, hear.

Mr. MASSEY: I am very strongly of that opinion, and I think that is the proper way to secure the sufficiency of raw materials which we all know the Empire requires, and particularly the heart of the Empire, the United Kingdom.

Now, if we take this List (1) in Resolution II., I am bound to say I do not know anything about asbestos. I know, of course, that it is a commodity which is in common use, which is urgently required for certain industries, and which could not possibly be done without except with difficulty and inconvenience. I am not going to speak upon that subject, but anyone who knows anything of the different countries of the Empire, tropical countries particularly, will know that with a little encouragement all the cotton required by the British Empire—required by or manufactured in the British Empire, England, Scotland, or Ireland—can without very much trouble be produced within the Empire itself. We know that very large quantities of cotton are produced in India and in Egypt and in parts of Africa. When I mention cotton, I am not suggesting that countries within the temperate zones, like New Zealand, can possibly produce cotton. Cotton can be produced in some of the Pacific islands, though there, again, there would be the difficulty about labour. But I am satisfied from what I have seen, and known, and read, that all the cotton required in the British Empire can be produced within the boundaries of the Empire, and particularly in India, South Africa and in Egypt. I think General Smuts will agree with me in that. I am not suggesting anything in the way of tariff; I am simply stating what we know to be a fact, and that is the principal direction in which I think, whether it is possible to do it at present or not, we can best secure the articles we require. Again, with regard to jute, we all know that India can produce all the jute which the Empire requires, and can produce a very large quantity for export afterwards. We do not need to look further. So with wool. Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and even the United Kingdom itself, produce large quantities of wool, and I think I am right in saying that before the war very large quantities of wool were exported from

CONTROL OF RAW MATERIALS.

Mr. MASSEY—cont.

British countries to foreign countries, and even to present enemy countries. And again referring to that point, I am sorry I have not got particulars here, because, as I indicated yesterday, I have not had time to read all the papers which have been supplied to us; but anyone who looks at the statistics of trade as between the countries of the British Empire, including Britain and present enemy countries, will find that the greater part of our exports to present enemy countries was made by way of raw material, and that, on the other hand, the greater part of our imports from the enemy countries was made by way of manufactured goods. That arrangement was too one-sided to last, and I am very glad indeed that attention has been directed to it by these proposals, and by other methods. I hope some other more satisfactory method will be available for preventing anything of the sort taking place, or continuing. Then, coming to hides and skins, we produce more hides and skins than the Empire requires. Notice came to the New Zealand Government within the last few months that the British Government did not require any more of our hides and skins. I am not finding fault with that; we shall have to find another market for our hides, and no doubt another market can be found.

Mr. HUGHES: We have enough hides and skins to clothe the Armies on the Western Front.

Mr. MASSEY: Exactly. We can find another market, if necessary, without difficulty, and I do not suggest for one moment that any objection will be raised from any part of the United Kingdom to our doing so. So with leather: the importation of leather from New Zealand has actually been prohibited in the United Kingdom. I do not know for what reason—but that shows that a sufficient amount of leather is available in the United Kingdom for its own requirements and for the requirements of the Army and Navy. Rubber can be produced in the tropical countries of the Empire in unlimited quantities, though, of course, since the war commenced there has been a tremendous demand for rubber, and it would be a very good thing indeed if we could prevent the exportation of rubber. I do not say we can now while the war lasts, but for a considerable time after the war, if not permanently. I do think that raw material that can be used for war purposes should not be exported from the British Empire to any country which is at war with us at present. Oleaginous products I have already referred to. Copra is produced in immense quantities in the South Pacific, and all of us who are residents in that part of the world know that immense quantities of copra produced there went to Germany before the war, part of which, no doubt, has been used for explosives. And so with lead and manganese. I should just like to call attention to the fact that we have very large quantities of manganese in New Zealand, none of which has been used. I do not know whether it is required, but the deposits are there when required either by our own country or any other part of the Empire.

I do not wish to go further, sir, but I have spoken principally with the object of emphasising the chief point I have endeavoured to make, which is this—that if we require—and we do—a sufficiency of certain raw materials for our own purposes, for the purposes of the civil population, for the purposes of the Army, and for the purposes of the Navy, as the case may be, then with a little encouragement, with the knowledge that we shall not be subjected to unfair competition, and that they will be purchased at a reasonable price if they are required, I honestly and firmly believe that nearly the whole of the raw materials mentioned in the two lists in Resolution II. can be produced within the Empire with very little trouble, and to the great advantage of both producers and consumers.

General SMUTS: Mr. Long, in their present form I must confess that I find myself under some difficulty in agreeing to these four Resolutions. They raise questions of general policy, they raise very large and very far-reaching issues of an Imperial, national, and economic character, and in this very general form in which the question of economic policy is raised, I would require a great deal of consideration before I could agree to the propositions which have been laid down.

I wish only to refer now to a few points which strike me on the first blush in this matter. I see that the first Resolution does not follow the recommendation which is contained in the First Report of the Raw Materials Committee to which you have referred.* The Resolution as it stands says that "it is necessary to secure a sufficiency of essential raw materials in order to enable the British Empire to repair the effects of the war as soon as possible, and to safeguard its industrial requirements, and that for this purpose it is desirable to control certain raw materials produced within the Empire." The recommendations of the Committee on Trade Relations raised a larger question which I thought was always part of this whole question—namely, the question of the economic offensive—the question of using this weapon as a war weapon in order to secure good terms of peace. That is the form in which the Resolution was recommended by the Committee on Trade Relations. They said: "The objects of control are: (a) To secure for the British Empire and the belligerent Allies a sufficiency of essential raw materials in order to enable them to repair the effects of the war as soon as possible, and to safeguard their industrial requirements." Then the Committee went on to mention the other objects, namely: "(b) To exert pressure on enemy Powers, so as to induce them to conclude an early peace for fear of economic ruin after the war. (c) As a result of such pressure, to strengthen our hands, and those of our Allies, in conducting the negotiations at the Peace Conference." That, I think, is the real policy. We do not want to enter into these very far-reaching economic arrangements simply as a settled post-war policy which is going to be followed in any case, and whatever happens; I thought the object was to get a weapon into our hands, a weapon which our negotiators at the Peace Conference might use effectively. But you see, Mr. Long, as the Resolution stands here, no reference whatever is made to this war weapon which we are going to use for peace purposes. There is only laid down a general economic policy for the future; and I certainly think the recommendation as originally made by the Committee on Trade Relations is wider, more far-reaching, and better than the first Resolution which is now before us.

Mr. HUGHES: But would it not be as effective, General, to endorse and to urge the giving effect to the Paris Economic Conference Resolutions in their entirety? They did all that.

General SMUTS: That is a question which we can discuss—the form which any general Resolutions are to take. I am simply discussing now certain objections to the form of the Resolution before us.

Now there is a second point which I wish to raise, and it is this. No doubt, if you read this first Resolution, you will see that a certain economic policy is here laid down, and when I ask myself whether this is the policy which we have followed in the past, I must frankly admit that it is not. The policy followed by the British Dominions in the past has been different. We have done our best from time to time to move the Imperial Government to agree to our ideas of fiscal policy. For one reason and another they have not been able to do so. Our policy has been one of free markets all over the world, subject to an Empire preference. That has been our policy. And last year I thought we had scored a point when we secured the adhesion of the Imperial Cabinet to this policy. The resolution which we passed last year, Resolution XXL, is as follows: "That the time has arrived when all possible encouragement should be given to the development of Imperial resources, and especially to making the Empire independent of other countries in respect of food supplies, raw materials, and essential industries. With these objects in view, this Conference expresses itself in favour of two principles: first, the principle that each part of the Empire, having due regard to the interests of her Allies, shall give special favourable treatment and facilities to the products and manufactures of other parts of the Empire." This Resolution was not only passed by our Conference, but was passed by the Imperial Cabinet.

Mr. MASSEY: And announced in the House of Commons.

General SMUTS: And announced in the House of Commons. And therefore, after this Resolution had been passed last year, I looked upon the Dominion policy as having triumphed, and upon the policy of Imperial Preference as having been adopted all round. That is the settled policy of our Governments, and it has worked very well in practice.

* See pp. 209, 210.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Of course, the method of preference was not set forth.

General SMUTS: As I read this first Resolution, Mr. Long, it seems to me to embody a different policy—that is a policy of control—not a policy of preference, but a policy of control, which means, as I understand, that the Governments of the various Dominions and of the United Kingdom have to take control of certain raw materials which are necessary for Imperial purposes, and that they shall control the supply of these materials to the various parts of the Empire, and thereafter to Allied countries, and thereafter, in regard to certain matters, to neutral and enemy countries. That seems to be an entirely different policy, and whether it could possibly work as an economic policy in practice I am very doubtful indeed. I just point this out—I may be wrong in understanding the first Resolution, but as I read it, it seems to me to embody a different policy from that of Imperial Preference which we laid down last year, and from which I should be very sorry to depart.

Mr. HUGHES: I do not think it is really so.

CHAIRMAN: It is not.

General SMUTS: I may be wrong. You see, Mr. Long, to my mind the whole question is what is meant by this word "control" in the first Resolution. Is it going to be legislative control or compulsory control by the Governments over the raw materials of their citizens? Because if that is so, then naturally you are going to raise very important and far-reaching issues. You know the Dominions are producers of raw materials to a very large extent. You are going to limit their markets, and I doubt very much whether you are going to pass this through the Dominion Parliaments, and whether the Dominions people will submit to a policy of that kind. They have with perfect goodwill gone in for the policy of Preference, but I doubt whether they will go in for one of legislative control. Therefore we have to deal very carefully with this question. If by control is meant the sort of arrangement which has been made hitherto—for instance, the purchase of wheat from Australia by voluntary arrangement between the Governments, or the purchase of cotton in Egypt the other day, which was also made by voluntary arrangement—if by control is meant similar arrangements to those, then I can only give you my personal opinion that that is the proper way to do it. But if by control is meant that the Dominion Governments must take legislative power to limit the markets of the citizens, then I think it is a wrong policy.

Mr. HUGHES: Such a control would postulate an Imperial Parliament having control, or else each one of the Dominion Parliaments passing a separate Act, each on similar lines, and they will never do that.

General SMUTS: That is why I say that, in this general form, as stated here, it is very difficult for me to assent to the first Resolution. I do not know what the word "control" means. It is subject to various interpretations.

Mr. HUGHES: I think it means what you said at first—that we should pursue such a policy as would in effect give us control by purchase—by negotiation.

CHAIRMAN: Certainly.

General SMUTS: We must be quite clear.

Mr. LLOYD: The whole kernel of the matter is what does "control" mean, and it is idle to discuss the question until we get that settled.

Mr. MONTAGU: May we have an explanation of this, because so far as I understand, the position is this. Take our own country at the present moment. No owner of raw material can export to an enemy country while the war is on. When the war is over, unless we take power to control the export of raw materials, anybody can export where he likes. Now I thought the meaning of this first Resolution was that in order that we may be free if we want to devote our raw materials to the welfare of the Empire, it is necessary first to control raw materials, otherwise we shall not have it in our power to do what we want.

CHAIRMAN: That is so.

Mr. HUGHES: But, Mr. Montagu, this first Resolution in effect is one of the Resolutions of the Paris Economic Conference. It is practically that.

Mr. MASSEY: In effect.

CHAIRMAN: I do not want General Smuts to be interrupted. We can deal with these specific points afterwards.

General SMUTS: I was just raising some difficulties on the form. I do not want to affirm principles which will be misunderstood in the Dominions, because these proceedings will be published, and they will be misunderstood. If they are misunderstood here round this table, one can easily understand the different interpretations which will be put upon them by others outside.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Each one of us may have a different idea of what the word "control" means. We must get down to some form of words to express an idea which is common to all of us.

General SMUTS: And that is why I thought we were beginning at the wrong end of this subject. After all, we are all at one in our object. We passed the Resolution last year, and I need not refer to it again. This was agreed to, not only by this Conference, but by the Imperial War Cabinet, and it laid down the policy that all possible encouragement should be given to the development of Imperial resources, and making the Empire independent of other countries in respect not only of raw materials—

Mr. MASSEY: All the way round.

General SMUTS: Not only in respect of raw materials, but food supplies, raw materials, and essential industries. It was a very far-reaching Resolution, and we are absolutely at one that that is our object.

CHAIRMAN: That will come later on, you know—the proposals for foodstuffs, and so on. We have kept the matter within these four Resolutions merely for convenience of debate.

General SMUTS: I was going to submit, rather, whether it would not be more useful for us to go into a more detailed discussion of some of these topics, like the control of base metals, wool, or any other items, rather than lay down large principles which have been already affirmed in last year's Conference.

Mr. HUGHES: Well, I am inclined to think, if I may be permitted to say so, that the Resolution to which General Smuts alludes has reference more to a suggestion that each Dominion Legislature should give, by tariff or in some way approved by each Legislature, special treatment to different parts of the Empire, including Great Britain.

Mr. MASSEY: What about Great Britain itself? That is what most of us had in mind, I think—or one of the things.

Mr. HUGHES: Quite. But this question appears to be quite different. This is not a question of giving favourable treatment to imports of merchandise from Great Britain, or raw materials from the Dominions, but of having control over the corpus of these in their entirety, and saying that as it is necessary for the salvation of the Empire that, for example, it shall have a sufficient supply of non-ferrous metals, and as we have within the Empire a sufficient supply, therefore we now here pledge ourselves to reserve that supply for our own requirements first, and subsequently, if there is any residuum, for our Allies, and then for neutrals. That is practically what this is.

Mr. HEWINS: Yes.

Mr. HUGHES: The one is specialised treatment by tariff, and the other is actual control over the thing itself—to prohibit or control its export. The destination of Australian wool, for example, is controlled, so that it can only go to some part of the Empire, except by licence.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Well, that presupposes that the policy is going to be carried out—then you must have some market for it within the Empire.

Mr. HUGHES: That is my point, sir, and I hope that other Dominion representatives will see this. It is very unfair to say that we must only sell within the Empire those things which the Empire wants, and that you may then slam the door and say, "Well, we cannot buy that." Where are we going to sell it? I say all or none. Take all, and we pool our resources for the national safety and for the economic development of the Empire. That is the position.

CHAIRMAN: May I ask the General if he has finished?

General SMUTS: I have finished my remarks.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What is the exact proposal? What have we in our minds with regard to any surplus of these articles? Is there behind this a proposal that we shall keep them as far as possible from enemy countries?

Mr. HEWINS: Oh, certainly. That question, Sir Robert Borden, does not arise with regard to very many articles, because when you have satisfied the needs of the Empire and of our Allies, there is not very much left.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That emphasises the importance of what I said a moment or two ago. The United States is a tremendous economic force, and cannot be overlooked in this respect. Normally we do very much the greater proportion of our trade with the United States. Now, let us suppose that you desire to control some article which is produced in Canada and which would be of great importance to the enemy, whether in time of peace or in time of war. If you desire to keep that from the enemy, how can you do it unless you have the co-operation of the United States in the proposal? It would be idle for us to attempt to keep back our raw materials from the United States, because we are dependent on the United States for a great many of their raw materials. Well, when once our raw materials go to the United States, inevitably they may go to Germany, to Austria, or to any other country, unless we have the co-operation of the United States in the purpose we have in mind. That is why I think there should be co-operation with them and co-operation by them.

CHAIRMAN: Before the Prime Minister's question is answered—which I will ask Mr. Hewins to do presently—I must ask whether the Prime Minister of Newfoundland or any other representative would like to add anything to what has been said.

Mr. LLOYD: What I should have wished to say has already been said by other Prime Ministers and representatives. What I am most concerned with is, what is the exact meaning of "control," because on that seems to hang the whole of the questions. We have food control, shipping control, and the use of the word "control" in such phrases gives us some definite ideas, and that is how it appears to me. The object is to limit; it is not to offer any special facilities within the Empire, but rather to confine and to limit, and to say that such and such raw materials shall go there and shall not go elsewhere. Now, if that is the proposition, then we know exactly where we are. I cannot see what else it can mean. As regards the articles enumerated, it is not a matter material to Newfoundland, but I take it the object is rather to control in such a way that the advantage shall be to the various parts of the Empire and to the Allies. I am not clear that there is not a little confusion between No. I. Resolution and No. II. No. I. deals specifically, and only, with parts of the Empire, whereas that first list in Resolution II. speaks of "raw materials of Empire origin required by the United Kingdom and the Allies"—as if the Allies were to be treated exactly on the same footing as parts of the Empire. But that is merely an inference, because in Resolution I. it is clearly laid down that the Empire is to be treated preferentially to the Allies, while, inferentially, in Resolution No. II. there is to be some kind of similar treatment to the Allies. I should like that point to be made clear—whether the Allies are to be treated on the same footing as parts of the Empire, because that would dispose of the question so far as it affects Newfoundland, and probably Canada. In taking that first list, for instance, we are only concerned in Newfoundland with hides, skins, copper, and oleaginous produce. Our main markets for those articles are the British Islands, Canada, and the United States, and if they are to be treated alike, as we know our markets and are not likely to have any other markets, Newfoundland would not have any objection to control of exports to present neutrals and enemies, if the wording means, as I think it means, limitation of places of export, or giving preferential treatment to the British Empire and Allies. But I think we ought to be clear at all events as to what we mean by "control," and that word ought to be defined before we go any further.

Mr. MONTAGU: Mr. Long, on behalf of India I find myself in greater sympathy with the Resolutions as they stand than many of those who have gone before. It is quite true, as Sir Robert Borden and General Smuts have pointed out, that there are other questions involved. There is the question of the supply to our Allies of their needs, which ought clearly to come before the needs of neutrals, and there is the question of the economic offensive against the enemy, with a view to concluding as early as possible a satisfactory peace. Those two questions, it seems to me quite clearly, can only be discussed profitably between ourselves and our Allies by a renewal of something like the Paris Conference of last year. But does it not seem clear that before we can negotiate with our Allies on either of these subjects, we must find out what the Empire is willing to do as a whole, in order that we can negotiate with our Allies and use threats to the enemy as one united Empire? And the first essential, before we can consider what we shall do with the enemy, or what we shall do with our Allies, is to undertake the control, or to take power to control by some form or other, the essential raw materials of the Empire. Otherwise negotiations are useless, because we have not the power to carry out those negotiations. I do not think it would be possible—I speak with great humility—to define in one sentence what the control should be, because I think in each country you might have a different form of control, and in each commodity you might have a different form of control. In one case it might be control by licensing exports, in another case it might be by fixing prices, in another case it might be by purchasing a commodity on behalf of the State. All those methods, and perhaps others, might be used. And therefore I think that it is incumbent upon us, if we are to pursue either the policy of devoting the resources of the Empire to the needs of the Empire, or of building up the Allies first, or of preventing the enemy from getting supplies, to settle once and for all, in general principles, that we are willing to consider the question of control, and that it will be necessary to control certain raw materials. As far as the first Resolution goes, as far as I understand it, it is only certain raw materials that are referred to, and no attempt is made to define those raw materials. The second part of the Resolution merely enumerates lists of substances of importance, the consideration of which is necessary.

Now on behalf of India, which has, I think, a very leading interest as the sole producers of jute in the world, and as producers of half the cotton in the world, the assent of India to this must depend upon three conditions, some of which have been mentioned. The first is that a market shall be found for the whole of the exportable surplus of the particular commodity controlled. It would be, in my view, obviously impossible for a country to agree to the control of a commodity if that meant cutting off the producers of that commodity from their available markets without giving them adequate markets elsewhere. The second is that an adequate price is secured to the producer of the commodity. If a commodity is not controlled and all countries compete for it, and it is a commodity of which there is a short supply, the prices would be very large, no doubt. But if we control the destination of a commodity, it seems to me that we do directly or indirectly control the prices for the benefit of the consumer. And although I do not mean to suggest that India should have for its cotton and jute products which are prevented from going to Germany the prices which Germany would give, I do think that the grower of cotton and jute should be given an adequate price for what he produces. And then, of course, the third condition seems to be almost axiomatic—that if the commodity is the subject of manufacture in India, the needs of the people in India must first be met.

That brings me to another subject which I am afraid the Conference will have to consider in discussing these Resolutions, although it does not necessarily involve the discussion of raw materials. If I am right in arguing that control, by whatever means control is exercised, reduces the price of a raw material, it seems to me that it is certain to follow that the consumer of the finished article which is made from the raw material the price of which is controlled, will demand that the price of the finished article shall be controlled. I notice that in the war aims of the Labour Party in this country, it is urged already that the consumer shall be protected by the control of prices of manufactured articles. I should submit that the political force of that cry will be very strong indeed if by State action the manufacturer of the manufactured article gets his raw material cheaper by reasons of State control.

Well, sir, as regards the second Resolution, which, as I understand it, merely asks us to pledge ourselves to consider particular articles, it does not seem to me to be necessary at this stage to examine them in detail. But when I come to the third and fourth Resolutions, I would submit, with Sir Robert Borden, that there is great danger in the exact wording of the fourth Resolution; and with regard to the third Resolution, it does seem to me to be difficult to suggest that the delegates are to be empowered to make arrangements. I should have thought, so far as India is concerned—and I can only speak for India—it would be necessary for the delegates to suggest arrangements ad referendum to the Government they represent.

CHAIRMAN: Does anyone else wish to say anything with regard to the general question?

Mr. BURTON: Before Mr. Hewins answers these questions, I should like to say that I entirely share the feeling which has been expressed about this whole matter—that the first essential is to know what we are talking about and exactly what we are agreed upon. I agree with what has been said, that the word “control” in the first Resolution is really going to govern the whole business, and that until we know exactly what method of control is intended—and I hope Mr. Hewins will explain that to us—it would be a dangerous thing to agree to the Resolution as it stands.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: And the extent of the control.

Mr. BURTON: And the extent. Now Mr. Montagu has referred to the same point, and he rightly admits the necessity of our having some control. It seems to me that he was discussing the question of control during the war, and arguing from that that we should require control after the war. It is the control after the war that we are concerned with, and that is exactly where the importance of the whole thing comes in. Well, then he went on to say, as other speakers said, that we wanted a definition of the word “control.” I wanted to ask Mr. Hewins to tell us whether the definition, to some extent at all events—to an important extent—is contained in the Third Report of the Committee on Trade Relations.* Paragraph 1 of that Report says, as you will see: “Moreover, it seems essential to the success of the policy that three general measures of control should be adopted, in respect of these materials, by every part of the Empire which either produces them or exports them (a) To prohibit their export and re-export (except under licence). (b) To reserve the right of requisitioning them when they are stored for foreign account, or otherwise unreasonably withheld from the market. (c) So far as the non-ferrous metals are concerned to adopt the policy which is embodied in the Non-Ferrous Metals Act of the United Kingdom, and in the similar war legislation of the Australian Commonwealth.” Paragraph 2 tells us that: “With regard to the further measures of control which may be necessary on the part of the Dominions which own the raw materials in question, we can only suggest for their consideration, if they desire to study precedents and models, the following examples,” which we know about, for instance, the licensing scheme, about which the essential thing which I should like to have cleared up is whether these methods of control which are expressed as being necessary as general measures of control, are an integral part of the policy. They must be, I think, because there is another Resolution drafted by the President of the Board of Trade which is to the effect “That this Conference is of opinion that it is advisable that the Governments of the Empire should take early steps to secure the necessary powers, where such powers do not exist, to exercise control for a limited period after the war over the importation and exportation of all or any classes of goods.”

The only thing this can mean must be that the Dominion Parliaments must introduce legislation for that purpose. We must have the power, otherwise we could not do it.

Mr. HUGHES: Could not do what?

Mr. BURTON: Could not control, by prohibition of exportation otherwise than by licence, unless we had got Parliamentary authority. That is one thing we must make up our minds about; that is as clear as day.

* See pp. 212-221.

Mr. HUGHES: Power to prohibit export without legislation is very wide. It is probable you could do it, but it would be a roundabout and unsatisfactory way of doing it.

Mr. BURTON: What I want to have made quite clear, when Mr. Hewins gives his explanation, is this. It seems to me, with regard to the Committee's Report, that the prohibition of export and re-export (except under licence), and the reservation of the right of requisitioning, are things which it is impossible for us to do effectively at all, except by authority of Parliament. That, then, envisages the introduction in each Dominion of legislation which will give the Administration the power from time to time—I want to know whether I am stating it correctly—to say, at one time, "You may export to this country," and a few months after, "You may not export to this country"; or, "You may export only to this country," and so on. I should like that to be clear, because I feel this—and it was referred to briefly by General Smuts—that if it is of the essence of the thing, as I think it must be, it raises questions of the utmost importance and difficulty as far as we are concerned (and I imagine it applies to all the Dominions) in securing legislation of that sort. So that is our position. Remember what you are putting to the people—that they are to give into the hands of the Executive—not into the hands of Parliament from time to time, but into the hands of the Executive—the right to say, "We will do what we like about directing your trade into this or that channel."

There is one more point I want to touch upon, and that is the point raised by Mr. Montagu as to manufactured articles, and it has struck me that sufficient attention has not been paid to that yet. The object of the policy is to secure, quite rightly from our point of view—sentimentally we are all in favour of doing everything we can to further it—that raw materials shall be kept for the use of the British Empire; and, therefore, powers are to be taken to control these raw materials. Is the manufactured article, when it is made from those raw materials, to be subject to any restriction or control? Or is the manufactured article to be sold freely to the enemy if he wants to buy? What is the view which the Colonial Office places before us with regard to that aspect of the matter? What is to be done with the manufactured article? How is that to be dealt with? Is that to be quite free to go anywhere; or is the Empire also to have any sort of preferential treatment with regard to that?

These are the matters which I wanted to refer to briefly, in addition to what has been said, and I am particularly anxious to hear what is the state of affairs with regard to the method of control, because on that rests, certainly, our view about the whole question.

CHAIRMAN: Does anyone else wish to make any comments, or ask any questions, before I ask Mr. Hewins to deal with the points which have been raised?

Mr. HEWINS: Mr. Long, may I take, first, the question—viz., what is meant by control?

Mr. MASSEY: Before you go on, may I say that I have to leave in a few minutes, and if I go away in the middle of Mr. Hewins's speech you will understand that is only because I have to.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I may say the same.

Mr. LLOYD: Could we adjourn now?

Mr. HEWINS: I shall only be a few minutes.

Mr. COOK: We are all in the same position, I think.

Mr. HEWINS: May I deal first of all with what is meant by control? I think in the first Resolution we proposed the word "control," as opposed to the entirely unregulated state of things which would exist with regard to raw materials and other articles if we did not take definite measures. As I explained, in my opening remarks, we deliberately did not define the word "control" very rigidly and exactly, because the methods by which you will deal with different raw materials would differ in different parts of the Empire, and according to the different powers enjoyed by those different parts of the Empire. Take, for instance, this country. Suppose we do not adopt any measures of control whatever. Then, directly the war ceases, we fall back, I will not say into pre-war conditions, but we fall back into conditions of absolute chaos as regards all import and export trade. It is therefore necessary to consider, from the point of view of the transitional period after the war, quite apart from all other questions, what measures of regulation you will adopt. Now in certain directions legislation will be necessary. In this country there are certain things which we cannot do without legislation—things like the Bill which Sir Albert Stanley is going to explain presently, on the control of imports and exports. We cannot move a step unless we have a Bill like that. But "control" is not intended to mean complete regulation and control by the Government at all times and in regard to all commodities. The particular method will have to be worked out appropriately to each particular article. Take, for instance, the case of Egyptian cotton. That would mean purchase. Other articles may require just regulation; other articles still may require regulation by licence.

Mr. HUGHES: All these things are alike in this particular—that they interfere with private enterprise.

Mr. HEWINS: Unquestionably.

Mr. HUGHES: And with the ordinary commercial methods of sale and purchase.

Mr. HEWINS: Well, Mr. Hughes, I should not like even to put it quite like that. I think the regulation of these articles is necessary, when the war ceases, if you are to get enterprise at all in any kind of decent and free way, because the conditions will be so chaotic in the absence of such regulation and control, that it will be extraordinarily difficult to carry on business at all. But I agree otherwise with your correction. I have referred to this country because the measures of control which it is desirable to adopt, in any given country among the Dominions, in order to carry out any stated object, are clearly matters of opinion—though as a matter of fact Canada has, I think, already taken powers similar to the Imports and Exports Bill which we propose to adopt here.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We have not passed any Bill to that effect, but under our War Measures Act we can do the same thing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is only for the period of the war.

Mr. HEWINS: I do not know that I can carry the definition of "control" further than this description of the measures which may be necessary in particular cases.

Mr. HUGHES: If you were to say "it is necessary to ensure an adequate supply of raw materials for the purposes of the Empire," that might meet the objection of some gentlemen—unless you are able to say that "control" does not really mean control.

Mr. HEWINS: Oh, "control" means control.

Mr. HUGHES: Then if it means control, it precludes individual action.

Mr. HEWINS: So far as it is exercised, it does.

Mr. HUGHES: And no man can say what the control is to be in any particular case. All is incertitude and unrest. A man says, "I have got a thousand bales of hides to sell; can I sell them?"—and you say, "Great Britain has not decided whether you can sell them or not." That will not do.

Mr. HEWINS: No, it does not mean that. These methods which are in operation at the present time are set forth in this Third Report on Raw Materials.* It is not proposed to adopt all these methods all round for everything, but, as we proceed with this discussion, what I trust will happen will be that we shall take the articles individually, and see, with regard to those articles, what are the general measures which it is desirable to adopt. We cannot answer in general terms.

Mr. BURTON: Why, then, if that is so, do you say, "It is essential to the success of the policy that three general measures of control should be followed?"

Mr. HEWINS: Because I think you will find, as you survey the articles, that one or other of these methods will be applicable.

* See pp. 212-221.

Mr. BURTON: You say that three general measures should be adopted. The ones regarding purchase and licensing are only subsidiary ones, put in at the end.

Mr. HEWINS: No, I do not think it implies that. But as a matter of fact these are not formal recommendations; this is only a description of what is done at the present time, and as you survey these different articles, first one and then another, you will find that one method of control, say licensing, is necessary for one, and that another, say purchase, is necessary for another. And in all these cases we in England would certainly require legislative action before we could move at all—in many of them at any rate. I do not know what is the situation in the Dominions. But it certainly is not meant that all these methods of control are to be operative generally; you would have to draw up your particular schemes.

Mr. HUGHES: May I put this to you. We have had to deal during the war, as you perfectly well know, with concrete cases.

Mr. HEWINS: Yes.

Mr. HUGHES: Take the case of wool. You buy the whole clip.

Mr. HEWINS: Yes.

Mr. HUGHES: Now that is a complete and satisfactory solution of that.

Mr. HEWINS: That is finished then.

Mr. HUGHES: That is a complete solution of that. You buy a certain proportion of our zinc, and for a term of years. That is a perfectly satisfactory solution, because we know how much we have sold, and we know how much we have got to get rid of elsewhere. But take our hides and tallow. There we are in confusion. If you will not take them, we cannot dispose of them elsewhere. We do not know what to do. Of course, in war our merchants put up with all things, but in peace they will not; and one thing is certain: this system of control—and I think it would baffle the ingenuity of man to draw it up and show that there is a system—would have to dispose of the thing finally, so that a man in the wool trade could say, "Very well, I am selling seven-tenths of all the wool of Australia to the British Empire, and I have got to find a market for the other three-tenths." And the same with zinc. As to copper, the world is before him, and he has to sell it where he can. With regard to hides, however, tallow, butter, and meat, he is told, "Well, if the British Empire wants it, then it is to be reserved"; and in the meantime he cannot go into the markets of the world and sell, because he does not know whether the British Empire wants it or not. That will not do.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: But, Mr. Hughes, you are speaking of conditions as they prevail during the war. The British Government, for example, buys all the food required for the population here; and you have been giving, as an illustration, wool required for war purposes. Is it contemplated that that form of administration is likely to continue after the war?

Mr. HEWINS: I trust not. But if you could get a definitely settled policy with regard to articles formulated for after the war, surely that would be so much to the good, and all we suggest is that we should consider these articles with a view to adopting a united policy.

Mr. HUGHES: Now Sir Robert has raised a question which opens up new ground. I thought it was proposed, in regard to this very thing which has just been mentioned, to continue this policy after the war. Otherwise I see nothing in this word "control." What is it? We sell our wool by auction, and we are perfectly prepared to sell it by auction to-morrow, and we can get a better price for it. But you say you will buy it. Very good; we should sell it to you, and at a lower price. But if you are not going to keep this system on after the war—

Mr. HEWINS: Mr. Hughes, you have referred to the very rapid changes which have taken place during the war. I trust these will all be reduced to somewhat more normal action when the war is over.

But if I may go on to one or two other points, Sir Robert Borden raised the question of our Allies. I should like to deal with that if I may. What we are dealing with to-day is the question of the order in which you will take your steps. The reports which are before you do provide for those negotiations which you have mentioned with our Allies, especially with the United States. But in the order of the proceedings it is almost, I may say, necessary that the Empire should know where it stands with regard to these different raw materials, before it enters into negotiations with the Allies in respect of those raw materials. First of all the Empire, then our Allies. There is no idea whatever of pursuing a policy inimical or antipathetic to any of our Allies. It is simply a question of making up our minds first of all with regard to the position of the British Empire, and then making the necessary arrangements with our Allies.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: To avoid misunderstanding, I was going on to point out that if the United States had any settled objection to the policy involved, that would be fatal. It could not be effectively carried out without their co-operation.

Mr. HEWINS: I agree it would be impossible to carry out this policy effectively without the co-operation of the United States.

Mr. HUGHES: When we were at the Paris Conference, although America was not there, the parties there present were able to make such an arrangement effectively; that is to say, they were the parties who could, by trading with one another, and by making arrangements as to raw materials, really carry out this policy. We are not.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I should expect that the United States would co-operate.

Mr. HUGHES: Oh, I think so. But they would have to be consulted.

CHAIRMAN: I think we had better adjourn now.

FOURTH DAY.

Monday, 24th June 1918.

THE IMPERIAL WAR CONFERENCE MET AT THE COLONIAL OFFICE AT 11 A.M.

The names of those present are printed on pp. 46, 47 of [Cd. 9177].)

Control of Raw Materials.

CHAIRMAN: It seemed to me, in the course of the discussion we had the other day, that there was some little misunderstanding as to the intention of His Majesty's Government in making these various proposals to the Conference, and also some misunderstanding as to the effect they were intended to have. General Smuts referred to the policy of preference, and I gathered that he looked upon these proposals with regard to raw materials as being rather a departure or a substitution. But that, really, is not the case. The Conference will find that we have made definite suggestions as to a policy of preference. Of course, this is really a matter for the Government at home: the Dominions have already made their views quite clear on this subject, and have, for a long time, adopted a policy of preference towards the United Kingdom. And what we decided last year was that His Majesty's Government should now proceed on somewhat similar lines, and we have made some definite proposals which really are part of a big policy. We propose that there should be a preference in all cases where articles are now subject to a duty (except where there is an excise) and a preference when new import duties are imposed. The preferences recommended on present dutiable articles are at the standard rate of 33½ per cent. rebate on the ordinary duties. We also proposed some temporary preferences to our Allies, who have made great sacrifices in the common cause, to assist them to repair the ravages of war. But these Resolutions which we are asking the Conference to consider now, are not really in the nature of a policy of preference; they are intended to deal solely with the question of raw materials. And our object—the object of His Majesty's Government and of the Committee who considered all these various problems—is, in the first instance, to secure, if it be possible, united action on behalf of the Empire as a whole. Because it is quite obvious that, whatever steps we may take here, it will be the duty of the Government through the Foreign Office to follow up an active alliance, Allies and neutral. Our position, obviously, would not be as strong as it would be if the Empire were, happily, able to speak with one voice upon this question of raw materials. I do not know how far members of the Conference have been able to follow the statements made in the German Press and made by German statesmen, but it is perfectly clear that they are thinking almost as much on this question of raw materials now as they are, I think I may say, of the offensive of the war in its other form. They realise the vital importance to them of raw materials. And in the course of inquiries, examination into the figures showed us how tremendously important it is to Germany to be able to resume—that is if she can—the position she occupied before the war, when she was getting her raw materials very largely from the British Empire. And our object was to secure a position for the Empire which would, if possible, prevent a return to anything like the conditions which existed before the war. It was suggested to us that if peace proposals were made it was possible that a suggestion might be made for an armistice, and unless there was a definite policy adopted by the Governments of the Empire in regard to the control of raw material, our position in any such Conference would be one of very great danger. With regard to the position of the Dominions, I think my colleagues will find, as they examine the various proposals which we have made, and as they read the three Reports on Raw Materials,* that there is the strongest expression of a desire on the part of our Committee, representing His Majesty's

CONTROL OF RAW MATERIALS.

CHAIRMAN—continued.

Government, that each Dominion should be absolutely free to exercise their own methods, and to adopt such schemes as they think right, provided only, if it were possible, that we may get united action on the part of the whole Empire. I can say this, as Chairman of the Committee—and Lord Robert Cecil is present, as well as Sir Albert Stanley and Mr. Hewins, who have all three been members of the Committee—that we have given an immense amount of time and labour to the examination of these problems, and we believe that our recommendations, which were unanimously put forward, are on the whole well calculated to meet our difficulties. But, of course, we do not imagine for a moment that they are absolute perfection, or that they are not capable of improvement. And it occurred to me that instead of greatly prolonged debates in the Conference—as we are very anxious to get on with our work—it might be the pleasure of the Conference to appoint a sub-committee of the Conference to act with three members of our Committee, with the view of dealing with details, and getting the resolutions into such a form that they might be adopted, then, by the Conference without taking up too much of our time. I do not know whether that suggestion will commend itself to the Conference. What I would propose for to-day is this: Mr. Hewins is here, who was Chairman of the Sub-Committee and who knows the subject and speaks with unequalled authority on this question, and he could answer any question here which any member of the Conference would like to address to him. I thought it desirable to say these few words, because I think there was a slight misapprehension before, both as to what the objects of the proposals were, and as to the proposals themselves.

Mr. MASSEY: Has it been made sufficiently clear that these proposals are only intended to apply to the transition period following the war?

CHAIRMAN: Yes, quite.

Mr. MASSEY: Very well; it is as well to be clear about that. Then there is another point referred to in your remarks. Do I understand you to say that the British Government intend, later on, to propose preference duties for the Dominions and Dependencies and the whole of the British Empire outside the United Kingdom, of 33½ per cent., or some other percentage?

CHAIRMAN: The position is exactly this. As you will remember, last year not only did the Conference adopt preference resolutions, but the Imperial War Cabinet adopted them after considerable discussion—you took part in it, Mr. Massey. Now, acting on the instructions of the Cabinet, we have had a Cabinet Committee, composed of members of the Government, exclusively Ministers, and we have made these recommendations. They have not yet been adopted by the Government and by the Cabinet as a whole, I understand, but I do not imagine any difficulty in that. We have done what they told us to do; we have gone into the thing and made recommendations, and they have yet to be put together, and perhaps slightly altered in detail. But they are the definite recommendations of a Cabinet Committee of the Government.

Mr. MASSEY: That is very interesting. I do not want to take up the time of the Conference, Mr. Long, or to make anything like a speech, but I think your proposal of a Committee or a Sub-Committee to deal with this matter is a good one. We have now had several meetings, and we have not got very far with our programme, and I am afraid, unless we do better in the limited time at our disposal, we shall go away without having done very much. That is a thing we want to avoid as far as possible.

CHAIRMAN: I am giving instructions for a Foreign Office Memorandum headed "Recent German Pronouncements on Economic Policy," to be circulated at once. It is an extremely useful paper, and well worth careful study, I am confident. And it has been very carefully considered by the Secretary of State, myself, and by Lord Robert Cecil.

Mr. MEIGHEN: With regard to the Sub-Committee's recommendation as to the establishment of preference, does it go further than tariff preference? Does it extend into the field of transportation preference? Because it is my understanding of the original Resolution that the specific field of preference was not set out.

Mr. MASSEY: No. There was a fairly long discussion. I have a perfect recollection of what took place. It was as comprehensive as it was possible to make it. In its original form it referred only to Customs tariffs, but in the form in which it was passed, it included everything to which preference can apply.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I asked whether the Committee had extended its recommendations into any field except tariffs?

Mr. HEWINS: The report which the Committee has drawn up deals with preferences on articles at present dutiable, preferences in respect of any new duties which may be imposed, and administrative preferences. The subject of shipping preferences has been considered.

Mr. MASSEY: Transportation?

Mr. BURTON: Including shipping preference?

CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. COOK: It seems to me, Mr. Long, this question of preference is not one which could be settled across a table like this at all in its final shape and form.

Mr. MASSEY: It is a matter for the British Government.

Mr. COOK: No, not quite that. It seems to me, in any question of preference, the point is as to where you can apply it, or in what form: it is not a continuous measure in operation, but a process to be exercised from time to time. And I cannot help feeling that the whole thing is adequately provided for, or is intended to be provided for, in No. III. of the Resolution as to control of raw materials.

Mr. HEWINS: That has no reference to preference.

Mr. COOK: Has it not? Then what is meant by appointing delegates to make reports?

Mr. HEWINS: This Resolution is only in regard to raw materials. I was answering Mr. Massey's question about tariff preferences and other forms of preference.

Mr. COOK: But it is included in the whole of these resolutions.

Mr. HEWINS: The effect of these resolutions would be to give a sort of preference on raw materials to the Empire.

Mr. COOK: Quite, and a Committee is to be appointed for the purpose of applying that preference, and studying it, as to the extent of its application, and the form of its application. It seems to me, therefore, that that third clause is a very useful one, provided a suitable verbiage can be agreed upon.

CHAIRMAN: That is the one in which "the Conference resolves that each of the Governments," &c., &c.

Mr. COOK: Yes. I cannot help feeling that the whole question turns largely on that. And therefore I suggest that there should be a Committee, a separate Committee, appointed to pass some of these propositions, as to their form and as to their verbiage. If that is done, it seems to me we shall get over all our difficulties. We are boggling, so far, at words, and some of them are unfortunate. Naturally we, in our Dominion, look askance at anything which seems even to suggest the possibility of our self-governing powers being interfered with and controlled in any way, as indicated in the first paragraph here: there can be no doubt the language will carry such a connotation as even that. And so we look at them in a more particular way than you do: and we read our own meaning into these words, as you read yours.

CHAIRMAN: Quite.

Mr. COOK: And there are several points on which all this discussion and criticism arises. I think if three or four men from this table were to re-draft these, so as to make the verbiage fit what we have in view, it would be the proper and useful thing to do. I support the suggestion.

CHAIRMAN: In the Second Report on Raw Materials,* paragraph 3 clearly expresses what our views were on the point Mr. Cook has raised, where we say we recognise that each Dominion and India must be mistress in her own house and must be left to decide in respect to each raw material she produces whether she will control it, and how she will control it, and for whose benefit she shall exercise that control.

* See p. 210.

Mr. COOK: Yes, that is quite clear. If that idea can be incorporated in these Resolutions it will be all right.

Mr. BURTON: Mr. Long, when we last discussed this matter I raised a question with regard to this word "control" and its interpretation by different people. I am not at all opposed to the idea of having a Sub-Committee to go into the matter, if that is really going to expedite our work. But I am bound to say, as far as we in South Africa are concerned, I think a very little alteration of the phraseology of these Resolutions will put them into a form in which we can accept them, and we might really do our work here more quickly with a little alteration of some of these terms than even by appointing a Sub-Committee. I was glad to hear you say it is desirable to get on with our work as quickly as possible. Our idea about the thing is that we are discussing your four Resolutions.

CHAIRMAN: Yes, please.

Mr. BURTON: Very well. Now a word about an expression which we all boggle at, and I think, with some reason. It is the introduction of the word "control" into that first resolution. That is open to great misapprehension and misinterpretation. I think I know what is intended, perfectly well, I think we all do. But that expression seems to connote, or may be taken to connote, some form of compulsion, legal or otherwise. If we could change that, so as to keep the sense but alter the expression, it would remove a good deal of our difficulties. I thought of some alternative phrase, it is difficult to get one, no doubt. I thought there, instead of saying "control," we might say, "and that for this purpose it is desirable to obtain command, as far as possible, of certain raw materials."

Mr. MASSEY: It is the same thing.

Mr. BURTON: No, I think not. To "obtain command" does not bite like "control" does.

Mr. MASSEY: Yes, there is a little bit of difference.

Mr. BURTON: I merely throw that out as a suggestion; some such phrase changing the word, would be better. Then we can accept it. The idea is that we should endeavour to get command of these supplies as far as we possibly can.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think it is better to import into that clause the idea of control by the properly constituted present Authority. Otherwise I think it will go some distance towards wrecking the very cause it seeks to help.

Mr. MASSEY: Would it not be worth while to settle the first proposal, as to whether we are going to have a Committee? If not, we can go on with the discussion.

CHAIRMAN: I suggested a Committee, because I thought we might arrive at general agreement in that way. Drafting resolutions at a Conference like this is difficult. It is, as a rule, better done by a Committee.

Mr. LLOYD: I think certain principles ought to be clearly laid down by the Conference before we go on with the proposal for a Committee. For instance, I am not clear at all as to what the object is. The first Resolution refers to proposals to enable the British Empire to repair the effects of the war. The second gives a list of articles which are suitable for such control, articles which are required by the United Kingdom and the Allies, the idea being that you are proposing to benefit the Allies as well. There is nothing set forward explicitly and expressly in these Resolutions as to what our position is with reference to this matter. Are we to benefit the United Kingdom by them, or the British Empire, or the Empire and the Allies? That ought to be clearly stated and the principle settled before we go into the matter of a Committee, because it is a very material matter. As far as we are concerned, our main market would be the United States.

LORD ROBERT CECIL: I entirely agree with what has been said, if I may venture to say so. I confess I would rather like to see paragraph 2 of the First Report on Raw Materials* set out as part of the Resolutions of the Conference, or at all events agreed upon by the Conference, as expressing the policy which they desire to see carried out. Perhaps you will refer to the First Report on Raw Materials, second paragraph. It was referred to by General Smuts on the last occasion. This is the paragraph: "The objects of control are:—(a) To secure for the British Empire and the belligerent Allies a sufficiency of essential raw materials in order to enable them to repair the effects of the war as soon as possible, and to safeguard their industrial requirements. (b) To exert pressure on enemy Powers, so as to induce them to conclude an early peace for fear of economic ruin after the war. (c) As a result of such pressure to strengthen our hands, and those of our Allies, in conducting the negotiations at the Peace Conference."

* See p. 200.

Mr. LLOYD: Yes. That puts the case clearly, and I think it should be set out in the Resolutions.

LORD ROBERT CECIL: I agree. I do not know whether I might make a suggestion, but I would like to see the Conference agree on those principles, and delegate to a sub-committee the duty of drawing up the necessary Resolutions to carry out those principles. That is what I venture to suggest might be done. I do not know whether the Conference will allow me to say a word from the point of view of our relations with our Allies. Some 18 months ago or more the French Government approached us very urgently with the view of our doing something to assist them after the war; it was part of the Paris Conference Resolution policy, and so on. And we felt that it was very desirable—indeed almost an obligation of honour—that we should do something for such a country as Belgium, for instance, that we should exert ourselves to help her, and also that we could do nothing without the assent of the United States, as was very well said in the Conference here the other day. And in order to achieve those objects we thought that the first step was to get the Empire, as a whole, to agree on a policy, so that we should be able to go to all foreign countries, not merely speaking for this country, but speaking for the Empire as a whole. That, we thought, would be desirable, both for the purpose of carrying out our obligations to our Allies and also—it is much better to be frank—in order also to obtain the best possible treatment in any commercial negotiations we had to carry out with the United States, for instance. If we speak as an Empire we have a far better chance of bargaining successfully than if we speak each of ourselves, and it would create a far better feeling. That was our feeling, and that was the main object of this proposal. And it is also, of course, very necessary that we should safeguard and restore our own position. But I agree very much with what was said, I think, by Mr. Hughes, on the last occasion, that if we have merely to consider our own reconstruction there is a good deal to be said for the view that we could do quite well without anybody's assistance at all. I do not think that is quite true—we should want some assistance from America at any rate—but still, there is much to be said for that view. Speaking for the Foreign Office, I felt very strongly that if we were to do our duty to our Allies, to make use to the full of our great economic superiority over our enemies, both for the purpose of bringing pressure on them to conclude the war now, and for the purpose of obtaining satisfactory peace terms at the Peace Conference, it was really essential that we should get the Empire as a whole to combine in a common policy for that purpose. And that is the reason why I have ventured to read these paragraphs from the Report, because I think they bring out more clearly the meaning than do those Resolutions which are before the Conference.

Mr. BURTON: Why were these words "and the belligerent Allies" left out in the Resolutions? The wording in your first Resolution follows this a good deal, but it deliberately omits any reference to Allies.

CHAIRMAN: I think the reasons which guided us were that it was desirable, as a first step, to secure the joint action, the co-operation, of the Empire, and that then, having secured that, the next step would be the one connected with the Allies, referred to in the paragraph which Lord Robert Cecil has quoted.

Mr. LLOYD: I think we could facilitate consent by settlement, because the United States is after all a very material factor.

CHAIRMAN: We have no objection. It would mean incorporating in these Resolutions the language of our Report, as Mr. Cook pointed out.

Mr. COOK: We are not now dealing, as a Conference, with our relations to our Allies, but with our relations to each other, which after all are the first to be faced. And then, of course, our attitude to our Allies could follow.

Mr. LLOYD: You cannot overlook the fact that the United States and Canada are in close proximity whereas New Zealand is very far away.

CHAIRMAN: Supposing we take paragraph 2 of the First Report which Lord Robert Cecil quoted just now, which sets out the object of control. Supposing we pass that, we could then leave it to a Sub-Committee, if the Conference so decide, to put the Resolutions into the proper language.

Mr. COOK: One could almost take this over bodily into the Resolutions.

Sir ARTHUR STEEL-MAITLAND: It would be quite simple, would it not, to take those principles as laid down, and re-draft the Resolutions in such a form as to be unobjectionable.

Mr. CALDER: I think it would help the Conference to come to a decision as to what is desirable.

CHAIRMAN: It is suggested that we might pass a Resolution to this effect:—"That the Conference agrees that it is desirable" and then quote paragraph 2 (a), (b) and (c) on the First Report on Raw Materials, "and delegates to a Committee of its members the task of drafting a Resolution to determine the method of carrying out these proposals."

Mr. MASSEY: That would do.

Mr. COOK: Yes. May I ask, Mr. Long, how far No. 3 takes you? I mean the phrase, "Power to make arrangements." Does that suggest that these delegates shall be given plenary powers definitely to sign and settle anything?

CHAIRMAN: Oh, no.

Mr. COOK: "Power to make arrangements" suggests that we are to give them plenary powers to conclude these arrangements.

CHAIRMAN: Everything will have to be referred to each Government for ratification.

Mr. BURTON: What is No. 3 intended to deal with—the list of articles individually?

Mr. COOK: Yes.

Mr. BURTON: Well, then, a delegate from each Government has to discuss the arrangements for securing control over each one of these articles. I would like to know exactly what the thing means.

CHAIRMAN: Would not the best plan be to agree on the Resolution I have just quoted—the one which quotes paragraph 2 of the First Report—and then refer the original Resolutions bodily to a Committee, and ask the Committee to give effect to paragraph 2 in, if necessary, a new set of Resolutions. It is not in the least necessary to take these—we can withdraw these if that course better meets the views of the Conference.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not see very much object in formally affirming now in advance what is to be the final resolution on the same subject. We know now that paragraph 2 of the First Report does, broadly speaking, represent our views of the objects to be sought, and knowing that, let us appoint a Committee to consider what resolutions we can pass as to control of raw materials, and be done with it.

CHAIRMAN: If the view of the Conference is that there is general agreement as to what we want to do, we can simply appoint a Sub-Committee and refer the preparation of the necessary resolutions to that Committee.

Mr. LLOYD: That is the simpler way.

CHAIRMAN: Is that the pleasure of the Conference?

[Agreed.]

CHAIRMAN: Who will be good enough to serve on the Committee? We had better have one representative from each Dominion and from India.

Mr. MASSEY: I suggest Sir Joseph Ward for New Zealand. I am afraid I have not the time. I have too much to do at present. I suppose Mr. Cook would represent Australia.

Mr. COOK: No, Mr. Hughes.

CHAIRMAN: Will Mr. Hughes do it?

Mr. COOK: I hope he will. I think he will.

CHAIRMAN: We had better leave the representation of Australia for you and Mr. Hughes to settle. Mr. Calder, I suppose, will represent Canada, and Mr. Lloyd Newfoundland. Who will go on for New Zealand. Will you, Sir Joseph?

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I would rather not, Sir.

Sir ARTHUR STEEL-MAITLAND: Could not the different Dominions settle as to who shall represent them?

CHAIRMAN: I think we had better get the names now, if we can. Mr. Burton, will you go on for South Africa?

Mr. BURTON: Oh, yes.

Mr. MONTAGU: Sir Satyendra Sinha will go on for India.

CHAIRMAN: That only leaves New Zealand. We must leave you, Mr. Massey, to make your own decision.

Mr. MASSEY: Yes.

CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the Conference that this question be referred to the Sub-Committee so appointed? We have got a Sub-Committee to our Committee already—Lord Robert Cecil, Mr. Hewins, and Sir Albert Stanley.

[Agreed.]

CHAIRMAN: Now the next business is the question of Imports and Exports.

Imports and Exports (Temporary Control) Bill.

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: Mr. Chairman, this Resolution on imports and exports raises the whole question of control, and I contemplated here going more into detail not merely on the question of control, but showing generally how the control of Imports and Exports is administered in this country, and our reasons for thinking that a measure of this kind is absolutely essential. But if the question of control is to be referred to a Sub-Committee of the Conference, it hardly seems necessary to cover the whole of the ground now in full conference, when this Sub-Committee will deal with it. It seems to me this might be left over, at least until this Sub-Committee makes its Report.

Mr. BURTON: Do you regard the Bill to control imports and exports for a period after the war as an essential feature of this control?

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: Absolutely essential.

CHAIRMAN: You have got a Resolution here—"That this Conference has considered the provisions of the Imports and Exports (Temporary Control) Bill now before the Imperial Parliament, and is of opinion that it is advisable that the Governments of the Empire should take early steps to secure the necessary powers (where such powers do not already exist) to exercise control for a limited period after the war over the importation and exportation of all or any classes of goods."

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: But it would be difficult to deal with that Resolution until the Sub-Committee has reported.

Mr. BURTON: If you are to give us an explanation, ought not this question of imports and exports to be considered by this Sub-Committee? We cannot deal with one thing without the other.

Mr. COOK: We might refer this to the same Committee. It is part of the same thing.

CHAIRMAN: That is an excellent suggestion. Is it the pleasure of the Conference that the Imports and Exports Bill and the Resolution thereon be referred to the Sub-Committee already appointed?

[Agreed.]

Non-Ferrous Metal Industry.

(See pp. 47-60 of [Cd. 9177].)

The part in [] relating to Imperial Meat Supplies was omitted from p. 58 of [Cd. 9177].

Mr. BURTON: I should just like, before we finish, to ask Sir Albert Stanley a few questions.

[CHAIRMAN: May I interrupt for one moment. I suppose we shall not be able to embark upon the Meat Resolution to-day? If we agree to make that our first business at our next meeting, then those who are in attendance to-day in connection with that Resolution might be released.]

Mr. MASSEY: Is there a Resolution on meat?

CHAIRMAN: Yes. It is one calling attention to the Report of the Committee, and recommending it as a basis for examination, &c. I think we will adjourn the meat question, and take it first in order at our next meeting, on Wednesday. In that case, anybody who is here in connection with that need not be detained now.

Mr. MASSEY: Would it be possible for a representative of the meat trade to come before the Conference and answer any questions which members of the Conference might wish to put?

CHAIRMAN: There are several branches of the meat trade, are there not?

Mr. MASSEY: Yes. I am speaking more particularly of the oversea meat trade, not of the question of meat as it is raised in Great Britain.

CHAIRMAN: Perhaps you will let me consider that.

Mr. MASSEY: Yes, and you could let me know. I was not able to answer the question myself, but I told the person who asked me that I would try and find out.

CHAIRMAN: I will consider the question. Now, Mr. Burton.

Mr. BURTON: I would like to ask Sir Albert Stanley one or two questions on this matter. I understand that there is legislation in existence now, not merely in the United Kingdom but also in Australia, and I think, in Newfoundland, &c., &c.

FIFTH DAY.

Wednesday, 26th June 1918.

THE IMPERIAL WAR CONFERENCE MET AT THE COLONIAL OFFICE AT 11 A.M.

The names of those present are printed on pp. 61, 62 of [Cd. 9177].

Order of Business.

CHAIRMAN: Before we begin the Agenda for the day I want to ask the Conference whether they are willing to consider if it is possible to take any steps to expedite our work. Several members of the Conference are very anxious to get away, and have spoken to me about it, and it seemed to me that there were two proposals which I might venture to make for consideration. The first is whether we could take some of the Resolutions—group them and take them in brief discussions. The second proposal is whether the Conference would like to refer all the Resolutions to the Committee that we have already appointed to deal with raw materials, in order that we should go through them and group them into two classes—first, a class to be treated, as I have suggested, rather formally; and, secondly, the class to be treated with rather more consideration, and then at once classify them in their order of importance, so that we might clear the paper of Resolutions which might be taken without much discussion, and then arrange in order those that require fuller examination. The Resolutions which His Majesty's Government submit to the Conference are mainly the result of the work of last year. We were requested to give effect to the Resolutions passed last year. We have done that in almost every case, and these Resolutions are the result. And if it were possible to take any of them without much discussion, then we should get on more rapidly with our work. A good many of the members, as I understand, want to get away, and some who do not want to get away wish to be relieved of their work here because they have other work which is of vital importance and more pressing. I therefore venture to make those suggestions.

Mr. HUGHES: What Resolutions do you particularly allude to, Mr. Long?

CHAIRMAN: Well, there are a whole group of them—a whole series. We are snowed under with Resolutions, and they really want examining. I thought if the Conference agreed to refer them to the Committee, I would have a list made of them, and possibly the Committee could meet to-morrow and go through them, and then make recommendations to the Conference.

Mr. MASSEY: Are there not Resolutions which it is possible to group, taking three or four at one time and having discussion on the lot, instead of each one separately? In that way we might save time. As far as I am personally concerned, I do not object to this matter going to the Committee, but I should like to point out that this is really going to increase considerably the work of the Committee. I find it impossible in the present state of things to attend the meetings of the Committee. I am not going back upon anything which the Committee has done—I am quite prepared to accept what they have done, and I believe, from what I have heard, that they have done very good work, and especially at the meeting yesterday.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I should think expedition would be accomplished by reference to a Committee. Possibly more than one Committee might be constituted. We meet here two hours a day, but the working time could be very much increased if, so far as the members' engagements permit, the work could be done outside these meetings, and, after a question had been thrashed out pretty carefully in Committee, I should think it would be possible to deal with it here with much less discussion.

26 June 1918.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

[5th Day.]

Mr. HUGHES: I think the theory is good, but in practice it amounts to this, as Mr. Massey has said. You refer a number of matters to this Committee. On this Committee there ought to be sitting persons who are fairly representative of the Dominions. Well, some of these matters affect some Dominions more than others. I do not know what we are going to deal with to-day, but supposing we are going to deal with meat. Taking the Resolution dealing with meat, the draft Resolution which is set out on the Agenda paper, no useful purpose would be served by referring that as it stands to a Committee, because in its present form I can hardly conceive that anyone would take offence at it, nor would it suggest the need of an amendment. But possibly when we had a discussion on the question, then, members' views having been expressed, the reference to a Committee might be of value, and I would suggest, sir, as a working compromise on what you have suggested, that we should have a general discussion on the major questions. After all, although we might have a policy on raw materials other than meat, that policy would not necessarily be suitable for meat. But when we have discussed what our policy is to be on meat, for example, and on raw materials other than meat, then a reference to a Committee might be, and would be, a very convenient way of expressing or formulating our opinion as far as we could agree upon it.

Mr. BURTON: Your suggestion, Mr. Long, is really, I understand, that the Sub-Committee should try and group these matters for discussion, so that we can deal with them—not necessarily to go into all of them as a Committee and discuss them in detail, but to bring about here a better grouping of the subjects. In that way I think a Committee would do good work.

CHAIRMAN: That is my proposal.

Mr. BURTON: That seems to me to be a good plan.

CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the Conference that we should ask the Committee to look into these Resolutions, and then if they can make any proposals, to make them?

Mr. HUGHES: What do you propose to deal with this morning, sir?

CHAIRMAN: We have got the non-ferrous metals question which was held over for Mr. Burton to have conference with General Smuts, and then we take meat and wool supplies—meat first. If that is your pleasure, we will take steps accordingly.

General SMUTS: What is the position of the Resolutions on Raw Materials, Mr. Long? Cannot we discuss them?

CHAIRMAN: I understand the Committee have a meeting to-day to approve of them finally in their amended form?

Mr. BURTON: I have had a look at the different Resolutions as the Committee amended them, and as far as they are concerned, I do not think the Sub-Committee need meet again. I think the Conference could take them now and discuss them round the table.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I thought the Resolutions which I saw this morning were approved by the Sub-Committee.

Mr. BURTON: Yes, they were approved by the Sub-Committee, and they were to be typed out, and we were to meet again this afternoon to consider them further in type. But I see no further necessity for the Sub-Committee considering them, and I think we might deal with them now.

CHAIRMAN: I will send for them.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Have you seen them, Mr. Hughes, as drafted by the Committee?

Mr. HUGHES: In reference to raw materials?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, and imports and exports.

Mr. HUGHES: No, I have not. I have here the Resolution on the control of raw materials; are you speaking of that?

Mr. COOK: Yes.

Mr. HUGHES: I have that, but that has not to do with imports and exports.

5th Day.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

[26 June 1918.]

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Are this Sub-Committee's reports, when they come back, to be open to general discussion in the Conference?

CHAIRMAN: Yes, certainly.

Mr. LLOYD: I was not present at the meeting, but I have read the Resolutions this morning, and I am perfectly satisfied without another Committee meeting.

Non-Ferrous Metal Industry.

(See pp. 62, 63 of [Cd. 9177].)

The part in [] was omitted from p. 62 of [Cd. 9177].)

[CHAIRMAN: Can we take non-ferrous metals and then come back to this?

Mr. BURTON: That was postponed.]

CHAIRMAN: The non-ferrous metal question was held over, &c., &c., &c.

Control of Raw Materials.

CHAIRMAN: Then the next subject is meat supplies, in regard to which there is a Resolution.

Mr. HUGHES: Wait a moment, sir. Are we not going to touch this question of the control of raw materials?

CHAIRMAN: If you are ready.

Mr. HUGHES: I am not suggesting the subject at all: I am only asking for information.

CHAIRMAN: You had not seen the Resolution as redrafted, Mr. Hughes. If you are ready to take it now, by all means let us do so.

Mr. HUGHES: No. I only wanted to know. I am quite willing to deal with meat.

The Resolution as redrafted was as follows:—

"I. The Conference agrees that it is desirable to secure for the British Empire and the belligerent Allies the command of certain essential raw materials—

"(a) In order to enable them to repair the effects of the War as soon as possible and to safeguard their industrial requirements.

"(b) To promote the conclusion of an early peace and to strengthen our hands and those of our Allies in conducting negotiations at the Peace Conference.

"II. The Conference is of opinion that the Governments of the British Empire should make such arrangements amongst themselves as will ensure that essential raw materials produced within the Empire shall be available for the above purposes, and should arrange with the Allied Countries to utilise for the same purposes essential raw materials produced in those countries.

"III. Amongst the raw materials which should be considered for the purpose of this policy, the Conference recommends the following:—

"Asbestos	Lead and its ores
Cotton	Manganese ores
Jute	Nickel, refined and matte
Wool	Spelter and zinc concentrates
Hides and skins	Tin and its ores
Leather	Tungsten ores
Rubber	Mica
Oleaginous products	Molybdenum
Copper	Steam Coal"

CONTROL OF RAW MATERIALS.

[5th Day.

Mr. MASSEY: Would it not be well to get these Resolutions out of the way if we are all prepared to deal with them? I have been looking at them. I am not quite clear about sub-clause (b)—I do not quite understand the object of it. It reads here: "It is desirable to secure for the British Empire and the belligerent Allies the command of certain essential raw materials." To promote what? "(b) To promote the conclusion of an early peace and strengthen our hands and those of our Allies in conducting negotiations at the Peace Conference." I do not quite understand that. I do not quite see the object of arriving at an understanding if what we are doing to-day, or have been doing, is intended to be used as a point in the Peace Congress.

Mr. COOK: It is liable to be misunderstood.

Mr. HUGHES: I think if we once start on this, then we shall never see any meat to-day. On this sub-clause (b) I agree entirely with my friend Mr. Massey. I do not know what it is doing in this galley at all. It is quite out of place. It is a plain statement of what is, of course, obviously true, that we are using this for a weapon. But it is here held in terrorem rather than to be exercised. It is to be used as a declaration that we want an early peace, and it is thought that this will strengthen our hands. Our military power, then, has become a poor and useless means of enforcing our national will, and we are to resort to this in the hope, pious and delightful, of these negotiations which are coming at the Peace Conference. I submit that what we are dealing with here—our "muttons" in this business—is what are the things necessary for the economic stability, or greatness, or development of Great Britain and the Empire after the War. It does not matter if there is an early peace or a late peace. It does not matter whether Germany wins or loses—we have got to get these things or else we have got to perish. That is perfectly clear, and I think, therefore, the less we say about it the better. We may have it, if you like, at the back of our minds, but why do you want to say it?

Sir JOSEPH WARD: If we are going to discuss this, I want to say a word or two.

Mr. HUGHES: Of course we all want an early peace. Everybody wants it.

CHAIRMAN: That was the reason why I thought we had better not take the Resolutions at once, because I had great doubts myself about (b). I only saw this late last night, and I referred it back to the Chairman of the Sub-Committee with a question as to (b). I myself largely share the views of the Prime Minister of Australia. This appears to be an indication of using these powers for bargaining, and not for an assertion of our rights, and a clear statement of our needs, and I thought it required further consideration. But I am entirely in the hands of the Conference.

Mr. MASSEY: I think the first thing to decide is whether we are going on with this, and then we shall know exactly where we are.

Mr. COOK: Let us get on to the meat question.

Mr. MASSEY: May I suggest, as I have taken the opportunity of expressing an opinion very briefly, and it has been followed up by the Prime Minister of Australia, that we should get this matter settled? It is not fair to other members of the Conference to allow two Prime Ministers to say what they want to say, and then to shut the others out.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I do not take the position that members of the Conference are to be shut out, and I do not think Mr. Massey means that. But I have come about 14,000 miles to attend this Conference, and I propose, in a respectful way, complying with the rules of the Conference, to put my views on record on every matter which I think to be of importance and interest to the members of the British Empire, and to the people I represent in my own country. There have been two discussions here already, sir, and some gentlemen have spoken twice or three times. I have wanted to speak, but unless one presses oneself and keeps people here over lunch time it is evidently impossible to do so. I have travelled over 14,000 miles as a representative of my country, and I find myself in the position that, owing to others speaking on the same subject more than once, I have then, for want of time, to keep my mouth shut, and take no part in connection with important matters which I have got to defend or support in my own country. Now, I think there ought to be some consideration shown to every member of this Conference. Surely each of us should have an opportunity of speaking once before any member speaks twice or three times. I am not referring to anybody in particular, but if that is to be allowed to go on there will be no satisfactory decision, and there will certainly be no proper discussion on these great matters which are before us now, and which all of us take an interest in. With regard to the matter now before us, I want to put on record the strongest protest I can about that recommendation in sub-clause (b). That the Imperial Conference should suggest bargaining about raw materials with the enemy in peace negotiations for the purpose of obtaining some decision or other, looks to me an outrage. It is, to my mind, indefensible to suggest that these very articles that have been so vital and so important to our enemies since the starting of this war should be brought down in this clause as a recommendation for the purpose of bargaining at the end of the war when we are negotiating for peace terms. I agree with every word that Mr. Hughes has said. The whole thing would be absolutely indefensible.

On the general question here, I want to say that in war time it is perfectly easy for the whole of the Oversea Dominions, in association with the Motherland, to do all that is required with these raw materials. But in peace time it is not going to be by any means so easy. You are going to be confronted, after the war is over, with the competition of the United States, and of Japan, and quite right too in my opinion. It is clearly our duty to come to a definite and an inflexible resolution upon these matters, and it is the duty of the oversea countries to put it into operation by statute if they are going to aid the Mother country so as to prevent these huge organisations coming in here and diverting raw materials from England to the advantage of our enemy. In my opinion, we are going to be handicapped through the whole proceedings of this and any other Conference, from beginning to end, until we know what the policy of the British Government is going to be upon the all-important policy of dealing with the trade of the British Empire, and until we know positively and definitely what the system of preference is which is to be established, and what treaties are to be entered into with the United States of America and, if need be, with Japan also. We are going to pass a number of Resolutions expressive of good intentions, and at the end of the war these greater issues in connection with the Motherland and the oversea countries all have to come up for consideration; and after all, until we know what the actual policy of the British Government is going to be, which is the kernel of the whole business from top to bottom and beginning to end—until we know what the fiscal policy of this country is going to be regarding the pre-war system of dumping from Germany into England, none of us is in a position to deal intelligently with the situation. We affirm things at one meeting of the Conference and we get important papers upon them, practically suggesting something else, at the succeeding Conference. I want to say, as far as I am concerned, that I cordially support the proposal as to the omission of sub-clause (b) altogether.

Mr. COOK: I think it would be most mischievous to let sub-clause (b) go out just now, or any other expression or consideration whatever which would lead our enemies to suppose that we were after peace. Nothing could be more mischievous than to send a thing like that out.

Mr. HUGHES: That sub-clause is bad.

Mr. COOK: The whole thing means nothing.

Mr. HUGHES: I should say that (a) is sufficient, because, it does not matter whether we have peace early or late—if we gave up these things, then it would be for us the end; we must have raw materials or die, and if you mean to say we are to purchase peace by giving our life over to Germany, then we had better go and die on the field of battle and be done with it.

Mr. MASSEY: If I am in order, sir, I should like to move that sub-clause (b) be struck out.

CHAIRMAN: Very well, it is proposed that sub-clause (b) be struck out. It is a question, however, whether that ought to be done in the absence of any representative of the Foreign Office. The Foreign Office were concerned in this, and it is a question whether we ought not to send for Lord Robert Cecil to come in before we decide definitely.

General SMUTS: I wish to submit, sir, for your ruling, whether (b) is appropriate to our purposes here. It seems to me that (b) is rather a question for the Imperial War Cabinet to consider. The question of what weapon we are going to use in making peace is not a question really germane to our business in this Conference, and therefore I think (b) might very well be deleted from our Resolutions here, and be dealt with, if considered advisable, by the Imperial War Cabinet.

CHAIRMAN: I quite share that view.

Mr. HUGHES: I think that this should be omitted.

CHAIRMAN: It is proposed by the Prime Minister of New Zealand and seconded by the Prime Minister of Australia that sub-clause (b) be deleted. Is it the pleasure of the Conference that (b) be struck out?

[This was agreed to.]

CHAIRMAN: Now is the Conference prepared to adopt the Resolution with the exclusion of (b)?

Mr. HUGHES: In part (3) of the Resolution I question very much whether it is a desirable thing to enumerate the list of articles. These are words, as the lawyers say, of limitation, and they will be so regarded. Take the last item in the first column—oleaginous products. One of the essentials of modern industry is petrol. Petrol is not an oleaginous product at all. It might be fairly excluded from that designation. Tallow is, and of course olive oil and coconut oil. But surely oil ought to be there, and you might add, if you like, oleaginous products. Oil should stand by itself.

CHAIRMAN: Petroleum.

Mr. HUGHES: Yes, petroleum.

CHAIRMAN: Before we consider the addition of the word petroleum, I think the Conference ought to decide upon the major question raised by the Prime Minister of Australia—whether you should have a list at all. The danger of a list, as he points out, is that it may be taken to be complete and comprehensive, to the exclusion of everything else.

Mr. COOK: Hardly that. This list will not do any harm.

Mr. MASSEY: It says "amongst the raw materials."

CHAIRMAN: It says "amongst." Then I take it the Conference decides to have a list.

Mr. HUGHES: With America we are quite independent of the oil wells of Roumania, even if Germany continues to hold Roumania. And as this relates to the British Empire and the Allies, it is quite right to put petroleum there, from any point of view.

CHAIRMAN: Then is it your wish that petroleum be added to the list?

[Agreed.]

Sir JOSEPH WARD: May I point out to the Conference that there is nothing in the proposals here to prevent sales of the raw material products after they come to England to the enemy? I think a definite restriction ought to go in. There is a proposal here that it is to secure for the British Empire and the belligerent Allies the control of certain essential raw materials, but there is nothing whatever in this recommendation to prevent the sale of these to the enemy. That ought not to be.

Mr. LLOYD: It says "command." Surely that means control.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: What is to stop their being sold to the enemy?

General SMUTS: If you command it, and you have satisfied your own requirements, and have a surplus, you are not going to throw it into the sea. I suppose you will sell it to the best advantage you can.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: To the enemy?

General SMUTS: I think the word "command" or "control" in Part I. of the Resolution is sufficient for our purpose.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: But, Mr. Long, is not the whole object of what we are proposing to do here to prevent the enemy getting into a position in future of building up a situation not only inimical, but dangerous, to our future, and if you allow the assumption to go forth here that this control and command means, as General Smuts apparently thinks it does, that you can sell to the enemy when peace comes, what is the good of our trying to centralise everything connected with our raw materials in the British Empire?

Mr. HUGHES: I think the point is this. The Paris Conference resolutions, in effect, stated that in a more definite way than that you now lay down; but, after all, here we are in a rather different position. Our functions are different. Our powers are different. The purposes for which we meet are different. I think if we get, as General Smuts says, enough for ourselves, really the thing settles itself, because there is not enough for ourselves and for them. That is what it amounts to—there is not enough for ourselves and for them. That is the whole matter.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: If they offer a higher price than our people are prepared to give, and there will, as a result, not be enough for us, what then?

Mr. HUGHES: I understand that what we mean by this first part of the Resolution is that we shall make such arrangements, price or no price. Of course, I am assuming we shall do this thing on a commercial basis. It must rest on a commercial as well as on an Imperial basis, and it must rest on a commercial basis between the Allies. Take a case in point. If Germany offers, say, 150*l.* for copper, and the Empire offers 110*l.* for copper—well, nobody can go on producing copper. Nothing will hold that. The pressure is too severe, and you have simply got to make such arrangements as will be satisfactory to the producer.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: So to get ready for a war ten years after peace is arranged between the belligerent countries now, if the German Government come along and offer 40*l.* a ton more for copper, they are to command the supplies for ten years, and so enable them to prepare to kill us afterwards.

Mr. COOK: "Command" means command surely.

Mr. HUGHES: The point is this—they would not get it under this Resolution. You could not permanently maintain an arrangement of this sort unless you had regard to the cost of production and the operations of the market. But, unfortunately, the Empire would be pledged by this Resolution, so far as it is binding, to sell to itself, within itself, and to its Allies, and not to its enemies. That is what it is pledged to. Of course, if the enemy comes along and offers 900*l.* a ton for tungsten, and Britain offers 500*l.* for tungsten—well, that will create a lot of trouble. But unfortunately the thing is binding.

Mr. LLOYD: We still retain the command.

Dr. ADDISON: It is a question of arrangement with tungsten producers, so far as tungsten is concerned.

Mr. MASSEY: I should like to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether tungsten ores includes scheelite.

Mr. HEWINS: That is so.

Dr. ADDISON: It includes tungsten and its alloys.

Mr. MASSEY: It really includes molybdenite.

Mr. HUGHES: To follow the matter out, the other side of the raw material is the manufactured article, and although the Resolution does not say so, the object is that the manufactured article shall find a market within the Empire, and shall have preference within the Empire and amongst the Allies. It follows, of course, that if the other people can put out a manufactured article at a lower rate to compete with the British article, there is going to be trouble.

CHAIRMAN: As the Resolution reads now, does it not meet the difficulty raised by Sir Joseph Ward? You see (a) disappears; when (b) has gone (a) disappears. You do not want (a) at all. The Resolution now reads: "The Conference

CHAIRMAN—cont.

"agrees that it is desirable to secure for the British Empire and the belligerent Allies "a sufficiency of essential raw materials in order to enable them to repair the effects "of the war as soon as possible, and to safeguard their industrial requirements." Do not those last two lines clearly indicate sale to and purchase by—

Mr. HUGHES: The first line might be strengthened by striking out the word "desirable" and putting in the word "necessary." It really is a fact that it is not merely desirable, but absolutely necessary. "The Conference agrees that it is "necessary to secure the command of certain essential raw materials." It is necessary—absolutely necessary—and if you put in "necessary" there, nobody can misunderstand what we mean.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I look upon the point as very important, because even with the word "necessary" you do not meet the position, in my opinion. We suggest we are going to protect the British Empire and friendly Allies under what we are doing, but we are leaving the door open immediately when this is in operation, and the raw material reaches England, to anyone offering a higher price to get what they want: if Germany offered a higher price for any of these articles—say copper, tungsten, molybdenite—unless you came up to, or overbid, them, you would at once be in a dangerous position.

Mr. HUGHES: Well, of course, Sir Joseph, we shall carry on business after the war to a large extent, as before, on a commercial basis. In the end no competitor can afford to give much more for raw materials than the man he is competing with—not very much more. Take wool as a case in point. Germany will be in very sad straits for wool after this war. She can only buy wool in big quantities from the Argentine and from the Empire. She will not get it from the Empire, and there is not enough in the Argentine. She will sink therefore—all her wool industries will be paralysed. She will come on our markets. Britain offers a flat rate of 1*s.* 3½*d.*, and Germany will say "I will give you 20*d.* or 30*d.*" She can afford to give anything. But I do not think it will have the slightest effect on our wool people—not the slightest. You must give a proper price, and pay well for producing the article; and beyond that you have to consider national welfare.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: But there is one reservation in connection with the statement Mr. Hughes makes regarding wool. How are you to stop a representative of a German house—not a German—going to Melbourne, Sydney, Wellington, or any other part of our Dominions, and going into an auction room and outbidding anyone on behalf of Germany?

Mr. HUGHES: I said the other day there is only one way in which you can get raw material, and it is by direct purchase. Britain says, "We want so much wool." She must not leave it to the higgling of the market, to Smith, Brown, and Jones—she must buy the wool.

Mr. MASSEY: That, of course, is what is being done now.

Mr. HUGHES: That is what is being done now, and you will have to go on in that way. If Britain wants 500,000 tons of lead, she must buy 500,000 tons of lead straight out.

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: I only want to point out that purchase alone, in my opinion, does not completely meet the situation, because it does still leave it open to producers—owners—to sell to the enemy. If you are trying to prevent goods reaching the enemy after the war, you must couple with direct purchase, which I agree is desirable for securing the control—you must associate with that some legislative action which will prevent the products of any country from leaving that country except as it may be directed. The two, I think, hang together.

Mr. HUGHES: I agree. We have a very effective weapon there—destination.

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: The two together—direct purchase and destination.

Mr. HUGHES: Still, the matter must be one of direct purchase. We used to sell wool, and, of course, the buyers of the world came in, and an agent might be a Britisher, but he might be buying for a German, or an American, or a Frenchman—and, as Sir Joseph Ward has pointed out, that might happen again, and we cannot allow it to happen. There is only one way: you must sell the wool straight out, direct to the Government, until the period of reconstruction is over and we get on our feet again.

CONTROL OF RAW MATERIALS.

[26 June 1918.]

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: Might I explain the steps we have taken to deal with Egyptian cotton, which is perhaps on all fours with some of these other raw materials we are now discussing. The arrangement we have made there is that the two Governments, the British Government and the Egyptian Government, associate themselves together in the purchase of the entire crop. But it is not compulsory upon the grower, the fellahen, to sell his cotton at a price that has been fixed in advance. He need not sell it, but if he does not sell it, he cannot export his cotton except by licence. There is a prohibition. So that you secure the result in another way. Without that it would be impossible to make any arrangement with the fellahen whereby you would secure his cotton at the price arranged.

Mr. HUGHES: I am sure the fellahen appreciates the economic liberty he enjoys.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Sir Albert Stanley, would you tell me what the position would be with regard to cotton in a case of this kind? Supposing the United States of America were not producers of cotton, and they wanted cotton, from Egypt, would you put a bar up against America? Could you do it?

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: We agree a system of rationing between ourselves and Allies, so that each gets a fair share.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I mean after the war, unless you safeguard the sale of these things to the enemy, you are going to get into this position with regard to wool. Who is going to stop the people of the United States of America, who will be big wool purchasers, and who will be certain to trade with the enemy at some time after the war is over—who is going to stop America coming in, even though you make a declaration in your country that this wool is going to be sold to the British Government during the period of reconstruction or for some time afterwards? No power on earth is going to stop the United States of America from trading with the Oversea Dominions, unless you make them an enemy, which, of course, is too ludicrous to contemplate. And if the enemy cannot get it through Britain, they will get it through their representatives in the United States of America; their people will buy wool in Melbourne and Sydney, and all over the place, and you cannot stop them unless you say to America, "We will not allow you to trade with us."

Mr. HUGHES: We do these things now.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Yes, in war time.

Mr. HUGHES: We are stopping the export of wool to A or B country. We have to have regard to the fact that conditions have changed fundamentally, and you must have wide powers vested in the Ministry, who will say that certain things can only be exported under licence. That would be one way. But, of course, there is a tortuous channel through which they could get to Germany through Scandinavia or Holland. They would have to be watched closely, and arrangements made for the British Government and ourselves to see whether, and to what extent, if at all, we are to sell to Scandinavia or Holland.

Mr. MONTAGU: Is there not this difficulty about the Resolution? Mr. Hughes, in a sentence he used some time ago, said that the Resolution meant that you were to command the raw material in order to sell to the Allies and the Empire, and not to the enemy. He used the words, "not to the enemy." As Sir Joseph Ward very well, I think, points out, there is nothing in the Resolution which carries out Mr. Hughes's last phrase, "not to the enemy." That is not in. I want to ask the question—Is it the intention of the Conference that these goods shall not be sold to the enemy?

Mr. MASSEY: What is your own opinion, Mr. Montagu?

26 June 1918.]

CONTROL OF RAW MATERIALS.

[5th Day.]

Mr. MONTAGU: I say you will have the enemy scrambling and competing for these things. You will be using the resources of the Empire, and the prices which the enemy will be prepared to pay in their disastrous state will be enormous, and you will be using the resources of the Empire to build up Germany. I should like to see the clause put in. Then comes Sir Joseph Ward's difficulty, which seems to me a very great difficulty. If you do that, then you must make an arrangement with your Allies to do the same thing. You notice that part 2 of the Resolution fits in with part 1. Part 2 says that the Allied countries are to be negotiated with for the same purpose, namely, to secure essential raw materials. And that seems to be eminently right, because we are not going to help belligerent Allies to get certain raw materials if they are not going to help us. If you want to prevent, as Sir Joseph Ward wants to prevent, and as you should prevent, the enemy getting these raw materials, you must insert something in part 2 that the Allied countries shall do the same thing, because, as Sir Joseph Ward says, if we do not sell to the enemy and yet sell to our Allies, there is nothing to prevent our Allies selling to them.

Mr. MASSEY: We cannot compel the Allies to agree to this, that, or any other line.

Mr. MONTAGU: You cannot compel them, but you can negotiate with them.

Mr. MASSEY: The thing is full of difficulties, but something requires to be done.

Mr. MONTAGU: I agree, and what seems to be the purpose of this Conference is so to arrange what the Empire as an entity is going to do, that you can then go as an Empire to your Allies and get them to do the same thing.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: It must be remembered that the Allies cannot get these things from any other place except the British Empire, and the condition of people in England getting them ought to be that they should not sell them to any of the present enemy countries.

Dr. ADDISON: In the first place, I agree with Mr. Hughes that you must have a system of purchase in some form; otherwise your command is never effective. Then, in the next place, you must have some agreement, first between yourselves, and then between the British Empire as a whole, as a unit, and the Allies or neutrals. You must have some system of rationing. That is to say, each community is represented by a certain proportion; that would be calculated on the basis of its ordinary peace or commercial requirements. There would be some basis for that figure, and it would be that basis probably. But if the total available supplies met all those requirements, it would then be considered what you were to do with the margin. There will be two ways in which that margin will be absorbed—either by an increase in the industry in any of the Allied or neutral countries which are getting material, or by selling to the enemy. There are only those two ways in which it could be disposed of, as it seems to me. The first step is that you get a system of purchase and then a rationing agreement, and if a State takes what is its normal peace requirement, the amount they will have to sell to somebody else will be negligible, because they will need it for their own industry. So that we need not bother ourselves about how much leaks out to the enemy. If there is a rationing basis on the basis of the ordinary requirements, people will keep most of it for themselves; they will want it. Therefore, I think that will automatically exclude enemy trading. Where there is a surplus of goods, I cannot imagine it being disposed of except in one of the two ways which I have mentioned.

Mr. LLOYD: Of course there are the neutrals outside the enemies.

Dr. ADDISON: I include the neutrals.

Mr. HUGHES: It does appear to me that it is a matter of arrangement, or negotiation, by treaty between ourselves (I am now regarding the British Empire as an entity, as Mr. Montagu says) and other foreign nations, whether Allies or neutrals, but in each part of the Empire the circumstances may be widely different. Australia has so many million tons of this or that, New Zealand has so many tons of the other, and Canada so many tons of something else. Very well; the thing has to be regarded in detail as well as in general. How is it to be done? The Dominions must sell their products, and you must find them a buyer. You, or we, may buy some things from Canada; they may buy some things from us. Then there is left a residuum, and even though the Empire does not want it, it may be a very good thing to prevent Germany getting it.

Mr. LLOYD: The neutrals come in between.

Mr. HUGHES: The Empire as a whole must bear the loss, just as a man corners goods to prevent his competitor having them. There may be some things concerning which the Empire will have to do that, though I cannot think of them at the moment.

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: In any event they are not perishable goods, and even though there is a surplus they can always be stored away.

Mr. COOK: I should like to point out that there are many things down in this list which are not the exclusive property of the Empire at all. Wool, for instance. And Germany must get her wool.

Mr. HUGHES: Where will she get it from?

Mr. COOK: The Argentine and other places.

Mr. HUGHES: No, she could not.

Mr. COOK: Why could she not?

Mr. HUGHES: Because they do not produce the kind of wool from which can be made the kind of cloth that will enable Germany to compete with the markets of the world.

Mr. COOK: No, but for war purposes.

Mr. HUGHES: During the war—oh, yes, that is different; to make khaki.

Mr. COOK: So that we have not an exclusive monopoly of all the things named in the table.

Mr. HUGHES: It is the post-war problem that we are talking about.

Mr. MASSEY: The transition period, really.

Mr. HUGHES: After the war there is not the slightest doubt that, so far as merino wool is concerned, the Empire has what in effect is a monopoly.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I move that these words be added to Part 2 of the Resolution—"and to prevent as far as possible these raw materials being available to enemy countries."

CHAIRMAN: After the word "countries"?

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Yes.

Dr. ADDISON: Do you mean during the reconstruction period, Sir Joseph?

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I think, after all, we are only dealing with the reconstruction period. After the reconstruction period there is no doubt that at some period there would be a further Conference here, and that Conference would deal with the new circumstances that might arise after the end of the reconstruction period. But in the meantime no one can tell how long the reconstruction period may last—it may be two years or it may be five years—and in the meantime we should guard against these materials being available to enemy countries.

CHAIRMAN: I do not know how far that is a question of policy. It seems to me it is a matter for the Cabinet rather than for this Conference.

Mr. HUGHES: Your amendment relates to part 2 of the Resolution, Sir Joseph?

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Yes.

Mr. HUGHES: It appears to me that in the latter portion of part 2 we have gone as far as we, in our capacity as delegates to the War Conference, can go. We are delegates of the British Empire. It must be the British Cabinet, or the War Cabinet, who will have to approach Allied countries. That is not the purpose for which we are meeting here at all. What we say is, I think, sufficient to indicate what we conceive ought to be the policy of the British Government in regard to Allied countries. But with regard to the Empire inter se, we are to declare what that policy should be, and to endeavour to give effect to it as far as direction is concerned. There is a sensible distinction to be drawn between Allied countries and the Empire, and therefore I think we ought not to go any farther than we have gone here—arrangements with Allied countries to utilise raw materials produced in those countries.

Mr. BURTON: I quite agree with the view which Mr. Hughes has just expressed. I think we should be rather spoiling our Resolution as it stands, and getting into extraordinarily deep water indeed.

Mr. COOK: We shall break it down altogether if we are not careful.

Mr. BURTON: The thing bristles with difficulties. We found in discussing it yesterday afternoon how many difficulties there are, and if you are to put in an additional clause to say that nothing is to be allowed to get to our present enemies after the war, we shall not only be doing what it is not our business to do at all, but something which you may find it impossible to carry out. One difficulty strikes me at once about the matter—I pointed it out the other day and it has been referred to again to-day. These Resolutions are all in the direction of getting the Dominions who are producers of raw materials to act in such a way that these raw materials shall be available to the British Empire and its friends, and not to others. I have not heard any answer to the question which Mr. Hughes raised this morning, and which I raised the other day: What is to become of the manufactured article? We are to take every action to tell our people that for the sake of the Empire and our future you must see that your raw material is available for the Empire and its friends. When that raw material is manufactured here into clothes and other things, is the manufacturer to be tied down not to sell these things to our enemies, or is he not? Is he going to have a free market for his manufactured articles throughout the world, including our enemies, or not? What is the policy of the British Government about it?

Mr. HUGHES: I think the position is not analogous at all. Putting it fairly, the struggle between the two races is for economic domination or supremacy. Goods, of course, reach the consumer in manufactured form, or in some form other than that which we term raw material; and in order that a nation may achieve economic greatness it must get hold of raw materials. But that is not sufficient. It must sell those raw materials in a manufactured form, in the form in which they are ultimately ready for the consumer. The more people that nation can sell them to, the better. The more completely it can prevent other people getting raw materials, the better. So the two things are quite different. The ideal would be to prevent Germany getting any raw materials, and to sell to her, amongst other people, our manufactured goods. So I do not agree that there should be any prohibition upon manufactured articles, properly so-called—that is to say, manufactured articles which are not in themselves articles which form the raw materials of other industries. For instance, hides are the raw materials for a tanner, and leather is the raw material for a shoemaker or a harness-maker. I agree with Mr. Burton entirely that the British tanner must not sell his leather to Germany, but the shoemaker may sell his boots there if he can.

Mr. BURTON: What is the purview of the Government now with regard to this matter?

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: I think, Mr. Chairman, it would best expressed in this way. The question which is asked us now rather projects us forward to the time when we come to peace terms with the enemy. That seems to be the position. And what we are proposing to do here is, to suggest that two steps should be taken. One would be to secure the command of these essential raw materials, and the other would be to legislate, so that, whatever the policy may be when peace is agreed upon, whatever the economic policy between the British Empire and our present enemies may be at the time peace is arranged, we have a measure which can give effect to that policy. That brings us back again to the Imports and Exports (Temporary Control) Bill. If it is agreed when peace is arranged that Germany shall have a certain amount of raw materials, that can be done. You have the command of raw material, and you command the amount she shall receive. And the same is equally true of manufactured goods, not only with regard to enemy countries, but in regard to other countries as well. In the case of manufactured goods, we think it is equally important—

Mr. HUGHES: You say, if it should be deemed expedient, Germany shall have a certain amount of raw materials. Who is to decide that?

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: That can only be decided by the respective Governments of the Empire when you deal with peace.

Mr. HUGHES: I want to make this quite clear; that it cannot be decided by you without our having a voice. It must be a decision of us all, because we are all bound. If you say that you want our wool, and that we must not trade, we must not sell to the enemy, but you may yourselves, that will not do. It must be a decision arrived at really on an Imperial basis, in which we all have a voice.

Mr. BURTON: What about the German manufactured article? Is that to have a free run on the markets?

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: There, again, the control we have under this Bill will deal with imports. Already we have taken steps to deal with one manufactured article from Germany. We have said now—it is the decision of the Government, and requires no legislation to give effect to it—that dyes shall not be imported into this country, except under licence, for ten years after the war. That is settled; there is no further legislation involved in that; that German dyes shall not be imported into this country.

Mr. LLOYD: That has not been settled by recent legislation?

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: No, we have the power to do it without new legislation; we have the decision of the Government.

Mr. HUGHES: By Statute?

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: It is a legislative enactment, of old date, which we can operate under. The position is that we have the power, either in peace or war, to restrict any class of import, so long as we do not distinguish as to the source of origin of the import. That is our power to-day, and no further power is needed. And so if we say no dyes are to be imported into the United Kingdom except by licence, and do not distinguish as to source, no further power is needed.

Mr. LLOYD: That is merely a matter of policy of the existing Government?

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: Yes, that is so.

Mr. LLOYD: And immediately there is a change of Government there may be a change of policy? Without reference to Parliament it may be rescinded?

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: It might be that some succeeding Government would take a different view, and that would also be true of legislation.

Mr. LLOYD: But there would have to be a discussion in Parliament before it was altered.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: That applies to all Governments.

Dr. ADDISON: It would be impossible without it being brought before Parliament—

Mr. LLOYD: It is not done simply round a table?

CHAIRMAN: It is only a difference of degree. It is obvious that any act of the Government not necessarily involving legislation, but involving a complete change of policy, is open to the same discussion in Parliament as is a Bill, the only difference being that the discussion takes place on one or two occasions, instead of during the whole series of occasions during which the Bill is under consideration. That is a difficulty which we have always got to face, and I do not think it is one which we can deal with, even by legislation. If we passed a law, and if a succeeding Government determined that that law was a bad one, they need not give effect to it.

Mr. HUGHES: Would it be possible to ascertain the opinions of delegates on the whole Resolution?

Sir JOSEPH WARD: The discussion has been an interesting, important, and useful one, and I suggest that as it is evident there could not be agreement on this suggested amendment, I should withdraw it, so that the matter can occupy the attention of the War Cabinet in due course.

CHAIRMAN: Very well. Sir Joseph Ward withdraws his amendment. Is it your pleasure that the Resolution, as amended, be adopted?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is amended by the deletion of (b).

CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is only a small point, and that is that aluminium is a necessary article for high-class aeroplanes, and should be included.

CHAIRMAN: You want it added?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know that it is necessary to add it, but it is important.

The Resolution was then carried, as amended, in the following form:—

"(1) The Conference agrees that it is necessary to secure for the British Empire and the belligerent Allies the command of certain essential raw materials in order to enable them to repair the effects of the War as soon as possible and to safeguard their industrial requirements.

"(2) The Conference is of opinion that the Governments of the British Empire should make such arrangements amongst themselves as will ensure that essential raw materials produced within the Empire shall be available for the above purposes, and should arrange with the Allied Countries to utilise for the same purposes essential raw materials produced in those countries.

"(3) Amongst the raw materials which should be considered for the purpose of this policy, the Conference recommends the following:—

"Asbestos.	Lead and its ores.
Cotton.	Manganese ores.
Jute.	Nickel, refined and matte.
Wool.	Spelter and zinc concentrates.
Hides and skins.	Tin and its ores.
Leather.	Tungsten ores.
Rubber.	Mica.
Oleaginous products.	Molybdenum.
Petroleum.	Steam coal."
Copper.

Imperial Meat Supplies.

CHAIRMAN: Now we go on to meat. With reference to meat, the Prime Minister of New Zealand asked, at the last meeting, if it would be possible to have some representative of the trade present. I have consulted our previous practice, and I find it would be contrary to the previous rules of the Conference to have any representatives of the trade present. There is also a special reason in the present case in that, as the President of the Board of Trade points out in his covering Note* to the Report* which is before the Conference, the Committee did not think it advisable to consult representatives of the trade for fear of premature disclosure of their proposals. Sir Thomas Robinson is, however, present, who was on the Committee. I do not think it would do to adopt the suggestion, because it would be quite a new departure.

Mr. MASSEY: It was not a suggestion: I only asked a question.

Imports and Exports (Temporary Control) Bill.

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: We have also a re-draft of the Resolution on the Imports and Exports (Temporary Control) Bill.

* See pp. 279-290.

CHAIRMAN: It has not been circulated.

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: It was circulated this morning with the others.

Sir S. P. SINHA: It was not fully discussed in Committee.

CHAIRMAN: I have not seen it. It will come up again in Committee.

Mr. BURTON: If I may say so, yesterday, when we discussed this matter of the Imports and Exports Bill, it was suggested that this was hardly a matter for the Committee to sit and discuss, but that as it was a matter of first-rate importance, of policy, instead of going to a Sub-Committee it should be before us. I still think so. I do not see what more we can do with the Imports and Exports Bill in Committee.

Sir S. P. SINHA: We wanted to see if we could do anything further, and a further meeting is fixed for this afternoon for that purpose. A further meeting of the Committee is fixed.

CHAIRMAN: I think we must wait until the Committee makes its decision, because this Bill on Imports and Exports was referred to them and is before them, and I do not think we can take the matter out of order. Therefore meat is the next. The Resolution is before you.

Imperial Meat Supplies.

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: Do you wish me to say something on the Resolution, Mr. Chairman?

CHAIRMAN: Yes, please.

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: As Mr. Hughes said, as this Resolution stands now, it is one on which no possible objection could be taken by anyone. The Resolution as drafted in its present form, was done deliberately, and I will explain, later, why we suggested the Resolution should take the form it has. It is not necessary for me to recall to members of the Conference, Resolution XX. of the previous Imperial War Conference on the question of meat supplies.* Perhaps I had better describe, briefly, what steps have been taken since the last meeting of the Imperial War Conference to give effect to that particular Resolution. We arranged for a Conference, composed of representatives of each of the Overseas Dominions, of the Colonial Office, and of the Board of Trade. And at our first meeting, as a sort of preliminary review of the position, we determined that this question should be referred to a Sub-Committee, so that experts might go into the matter, who would be competent to make a Report to the Conference. This Sub-Committee was formed, and Mr. Shirley Benn—now Sir Arthur Shirley Benn—was appointed Chairman of that Committee. And the Committee has made a Report,† of which copies have been circulated. Now, the members of this Meat Conference were not in a position, nor was any member of it in a position, to make any definite recommendation, although agreeing that the recommendations of the Sub-Committee might, in their personal opinion, be acceptable, and form the basis upon which some agreed scheme could be determined. But in the absence of an opportunity of consulting with their respective Governments—and I was myself in a similar position—we felt we could not take the responsibility of making any definite recommendation to this Conference, but that we should simply forward the Report of the Committee, with the suggestion that the suggestions laid down in this Report might form a basis for the discussion and for the consideration of this Conference. That explains why this Resolution is not more definite, and why we have had to draft it as it is. There is another point I should like to mention, and that is, that neither the members of the Sub-Committee nor yet the members of the Conference itself consulted any representatives of the trade interests affected. We all felt that we had a sufficient knowledge of the position, so that we could come to a certain conclusion without consulting any of the trades affected. But we did feel that if this Conference came to the conclusion that some definite steps should be taken to deal with this matter, whatever they may be, that before any legislative action is taken by any of the Governments affected, an opportunity should be given to the trades affected of presenting their case for the consideration of the Governments concerned. Now, the position is carefully reviewed in, I think it is, the second paragraph of the Report on Imperial Meat Resources, and this paragraph reads as follows: "Briefly the position of affairs which led to the foregoing Resolution (i.e., the Resolution of the 1917 Conference) was as follows: "Before the war the United Kingdom drew from abroad 40 per cent. of its supplies of beef, 50 per cent. of its supplies of mutton, and 45 per cent. of its supplies of pig products. About half the beef and a large proportion of the pig products were in the hands of a group of American companies popularly understood to be working together. India and the West African Colonies received some supplies of meat (both British and foreign), and the Union of South Africa some bacon from the United Kingdom, while British Possessions in the Mediterranean and the East, as well as Canada, imported from Australia and New Zealand." I think that briefly explains the position, without my needing to go into it in any greater detail. The Report, as those who have read it will see clearly, deals with this subject under two different headings: (1) to secure an adequate supply of meat for the British Empire and for our Allies during the reconstruction period, (2) to take steps to secure that the meat supplies within the British Empire should not be brought under the control of foreign countries, particularly having in mind the big American Beef Trusts. Now, the Report goes on to point out, in dealing with the first point—securing an adequate supply—that there will be a very heavy demand for meat and for cattle after the war; that the herds and flocks, in some of the belligerent countries at least, will have been considerably depleted, and, beyond that, some of the belligerents will have established, upon a broader basis, the habit of consuming meat as an article of diet—particularly, for instance, in France, and perhaps in Italy as well, because of the great number of their men in military service who are being fed upon meat to a very considerable extent, that habit will have become fixed, and will secure a much wider market for meat than was the case before the war. The Report goes on to point out that as regards mutton and lamb, the Empire, as a whole, is self-supporting, but that as regards beef it is very far from being independent. The Report suggests—

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I do not like to interrupt, but you tell us that the Empire is self-supporting as regards mutton and lamb. Then 75 per cent. of the imports is sufficient to make it self-supporting. You say that 75 per cent. of the mutton and lamb for the United Kingdom comes from Australia and New Zealand. Is that sufficient to make the Empire self-supporting?

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: What the Report means is that as regards the quantity of mutton and lamb produced within the Empire, that in the aggregate is, or will be within the next few years, sufficient to make the Empire independent of foreign supplies.

Mr. MASSEY: But you say you obtain supplies from the Argentine as well.

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: It may be that we are securing supplies from foreign countries, but I think statistics show that the amount produced in the Empire itself of mutton and lamb is, or will shortly be, sufficient for our needs. But that does not apply to beef, of course.

Mr. HUGHES: One question, by the way. Refrigerated tonnage is very short, and without it you can do nothing. Is it contemplated, and is it possible, to make arrangements for supplying that?

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: That is what I was going on to say—that the Report does recommend that one of the steps necessary to secure an adequate supply of meat for the Empire and for our Allies would be by securing the continued control of shipping after the war.

Mr. MASSEY: There is a recommendation about an increase of refrigerated shipping later on.

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: Yes. And that some priority should be given to the construction of refrigerated shipping; so that, having control of the shipping, they would be able, while not having control of the product itself, they would at least be able to direct the destination of the product through the control of their shipping. I will deal later on with how they propose to deal with the control of the meat itself. In order to secure the product itself, the Committee suggest that the present arrangement which exists between the Imperial Government and the Government of Australia and the Government of New Zealand should be continued after the war, and that a similar arrangement should be made with the other meat-producing parts of the Empire, if they should so desire. Those would, of course, apply to live cattle, as well as to meat itself. The arrangement with Australia and New Zealand is this: that the exportable surplus of meat is purchased by the Imperial Government—purchased, of course, through the Governments of those countries, but the Imperial Government is the actual purchaser. And it is suggested that a price should be agreed with the producers for their meat and for their cattle, that is, the price that would be guaranteed to the grower, a fair price.

Mr. MASSEY: From year to year?

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: From year to year, if need be. But it might be that the meat which was sold by the Imperial Government, and which would be sold through the ordinary trade channels, might fetch a higher price than that which had been paid to the grower, because it is suggested that the meat should be sold on a commercial basis, that it should be sold at the prevailing market price at the time. If there is any profit arising out of the transaction—in other words, if a higher price was received than was paid to the grower—it is suggested that there should be a division of this profit, as between the Government and the grower. On the other hand, if the meat is sold at a lower price than has been paid for it, the loss must fall on the Government itself. That would deal with the meat situation within the Empire. It would, on the one hand, secure the control of the shipping during this reconstruction period, and it would also secure the control of the product itself. And we should, in that way, be able to direct the destination of the supply. And here the Committee make a suggestion which, I think, is very important: that is, that every effort should be made, and must be made, to maintain our markets on the Continent, that a reasonable proportion of the amount of meat produced within the Empire should be sold to the Continental markets, even though it might mean that Great Britain, on the other hand, would go somewhat short. The object of that is to maintain, during the reconstruction period, the markets upon the Continent for meat produced within the Empire. And, as the time went on and conditions became improved, they would be able gradually to extend their activities, and would not, during the reconstruction period, have lost their markets upon the Continent. I think that is a very important point. They deal also with the meat produced in foreign countries, and here they suggest a continuation and an extension of the arrangement which the British Government has now with one of the British meat companies of the Argentine.

Mr. MASSEY: What paragraph is that?

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: It is paragraph 49. The arrangement proposed is, that the British meat companies which are established in the Argentine should be, through the Imperial Government, guaranteed a certain rate of interest upon their investment for a period of years, that British companies should be encouraged to establish undertakings in some of the great cattle-growing countries in South America, and that they should be given some sort of guarantee such as I have described. In return for that, the meat companies would be bound by an arrangement to produce meat, and to sell it at such a price as the Government might direct. The particular object of that recommendation is to secure all British companies against the attempts of foreign undertakings to secure a controlling interest in their property. It is suggested by the British undertakings—and it is true—that the British undertakings in South America to-day are completely dominated by some Convention arrangement with the American companies, that they can only expand up to a certain point, and that if they attempt to go beyond that, the American companies can throttle them. That was what was in the Committee's mind. And it is suggested that if the British Government stood at the back of these British undertakings, then it would not be possible, of course, for these undertakings to form any arrangement with any of the foreign undertakings without the consent and the knowledge of the British Government, and in that way it would be an encouragement for British companies to establish themselves in South America in competition with the foreign companies, particularly American companies.

Mr. MEIGHEN: While not disputing your right to take that course, it does seem incongruous to place that item of policy under the heading of making the Empire self-supporting in meat, because the recommendations made are heading in exactly the other way.

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: I was going to explain that point, that as a result of that policy we might be discouraging the development of this industry within the Empire. I think the suggestion is that, as far as one can see ahead, there is no likelihood of more meat being produced than is required by the Empire.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You will crush out competition in the meat industry in the interests of favoured countries.

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: You might do it in South America, for instance, and not in Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If you do it in South America, you are heading towards the extinction of the Canadian export cattle trade—that is to Great Britain.

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: Unless you make a move in South America and establish a British industry, it will be completely dominated by the Americans.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That may be.

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: But if it is argued, on the other hand, that this would be prejudicial to some parts of the Empire, I suggest that there is no reason why any arrangement which might be made in respect to these undertakings in South America could not also be applied to the Empire.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But you are making the Empire non-self-supporting in meat instead of making it self-supporting—in so far as you apply this suggestion.

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: These are the suggestions of the Committee, and perhaps we shall gain a good deal of light during the debate upon this Report. We must look after the interests of South America, because we must take beef from South America. The experience we have had during the war with the undertaking in the Argentine in which we are interested, shows that very considerable profits are made, and it has given us a very valuable insight into the costs in connection with this industry. Now, the Committee make a further recommendation on this particular question of foreign control, and that is that all of those who are engaged in the export trade, and in the import trade, and those who are interested in cold-storage plants, should be brought under some system of licence: that is the suggestion of the Committee. The idea is this: that there should be a record of everybody engaged in the trade, not growers, but those engaged in import and export and cold storage, so that they should be required, as they will be required, to make certain returns to the Government. The object of securing those returns is, that the Government might have a knowledge immediately of any financial arrangement, or any agreements, which these people might enter into, which might have the effect of transferring their interests and control to any foreign group. It does not follow that this system of licensing should be the principle adopted: the underlying idea is that there should be some way whereby the information with respect to the activities of people engaged in this trade should be known by the respective Governments, so that, if necessary, steps could be taken to prevent their operations from falling under the control of any foreign undertaking.

Mr. BURTON: "Foreign undertaking" in this connection means not only our present enemies, but our Allies?

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: Foreign in the widest sense of the word, yes, that is true. I will only mention, in conclusion, that the proposals of this Committee—which I have only briefly, and very sketchily, I am afraid, dealt with—are only intended to cover what is generally termed the reconstruction period; they are not intended as permanent measures. But the suggestion is, that if something similar to what I have described is done, and it is in operation during the reconstruction period, it will give the Governments an opportunity of acquiring information and experience on this matter during that period. And arising out of this experience we can then determine what permanent measures should be adopted. Sir Thomas Robinson was a member of the Committee. He has a very wide knowledge of this whole matter. I have covered the ground very imperfectly, but I am sure he will be glad to add to what I have said, and to give any information which the Conference may desire.

Mr. MASSEY: I am not going to make a speech, but as it is now one o'clock and it would be quite impossible to finish this subject to-day, we might perhaps adjourn.

CHAIRMAN: I think that would be the better course.

Mr. MASSEY: We adjourn till Friday?

CHAIRMAN: If you please.

SIXTH DAY.

Friday, 28th June 1918.

THE IMPERIAL WAR CONFERENCE MET AT THE COLONIAL OFFICE AT 11 A.M.

PRESENT:

The Right Honourable WALTER H. LONG, M.P., Secretary of State for the Colonies (Chairman of the Conference).

 Lieutenant-Commander J. G. LATHAM, Royal Australian Naval Board.
 Major-General Sir G. ASTON, K.C.B., of the War Cabinet Secretariat.
 Mr. H. W. CARLESS DAVIS, C.B.E., Deputy Chairman, War Trade Intelligence Department.
 And Private Secretaries.

Order of Business.

CHAIRMAN: Is the Committee which is representative of all the Governments, which considered the question of Raw Materials in Mr. Hewins's room, prepared to meet to consider the agenda at 11 o'clock on 5th July, that is to say, on Friday of next week. It does not seem likely that we shall be able to get a meeting of the Conference next week, as everybody will be elsewhere, and we thought we might utilise Friday, getting as many members of the Committee as we can to attend, to discuss the agenda for the rest of our meetings.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We shall be here on Friday, Mr. Long.

CHAIRMAN: I would ask any member of the Committee who cannot attend to be good enough to appoint one of his colleagues, so that each Government can be represented, if possible.

Mr. LLOYD: What Committee is that?

CHAIRMAN: It is the Committee which we appointed at the meeting before last of representatives of the Governments to consider the raw materials Resolutions.

Mr. LLOYD: The reason I ask that is, that the same matter arose at the Committee meeting. It was said—though I do not know on what ground—that this matter was to be referred not to that Committee, but to the original Agenda Committee.

CHAIRMAN: That is so, but this Committee seems to be rather more representative. It does not seem to be worth while to have two Committees sitting for practically the same work, and the Committee that was sitting in Mr. Hewins's room is representative of all the Governments.

Mr. LLOYD: I do not raise any objection, but the point is that of one Committee I am a member, and of the other I am not a member, and I want to know what my position is. I am not a member of the original Agenda Committee.

CHAIRMAN: No, but you are a member of the larger Committee, and that is why we formed the larger Committee, because it represents all the Governments, instead of only some of them. And the Committee might also wish to discuss the terms of a draft Resolution about emigration. We shall probably consider that later. It might be well to agree on the terms of a draft Resolution.

28 June 1918.] IMPORTS AND EXPORTS (TEMPORARY CONTROL) BILL. [6th Day. 221

Mr. HUGHES: Is it suggested that the Conference shall reassemble next Friday?

CHAIRMAN: No, only the Committee; the Conference will reassemble on Monday week.

Mr. HUGHES: All right.

Imports and Exports (Temporary Control) Bill.

CHAIRMAN: The first subject on the agenda is the Imports and Exports (Temporary Control) Bill, on which a Resolution has been brought up which has been agreed to by the Drafting Committee. The terms of this Resolution are:—

"That this Conference has considered the provisions of the Imports and Exports (Temporary Control) Bill now before the Imperial Parliament, and is of opinion that, whilst the circumstances of the different parts of the Empire differ widely as regards the extent to which it may prove desirable to pass similar legislation, the respective Governments should nevertheless take such action as may be deemed expedient to enable the objects of Resolution III. to be fully carried out. To assist the Governments in determining their action in this respect, the Conference recommends (1) that a Committee of its members should first consider the possible methods in each part of the Empire of obtaining command of each of the essential raw materials specified in Resolution III.; (2) that the Governments represented at the Conference should, in the light of the information collected by their representatives on this Committee, consult with the representatives of the producers and traders concerned as to the method of obtaining command most suited to each individual commodity."

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: "Best suited," instead of "most suited," would be better.

CHAIRMAN: Yes, "best" instead of "most," on the last line but one. (Agreed.) Does anyone wish to raise any point on this Resolution, or is the Conference prepared to adopt it?

Mr. HUGHES: On this Resolution?

CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. HUGHES: Yes, I do, sir. I have only just seen this Resolution, but it appears to me that unless the deliberations of this Conference are to end where they began, we must have something much more definite than this. After all, it is perfectly well known to those who have to deal with these matters in a practical way that if you have not control over exports you might just as well abandon the whole struggle; you cannot succeed. The power to control exports resides—must reside—in the Government of the country, and if the Government needs its authority reinforced by Statute, then statutory authority ought to be given. Personally, I am inclined to think that such power is inherent in Governments; but whether that be so or not is not very much to the point. In Australia we have taken this power, and during the war, I suppose, every Government is taking that power. Is not that so, Mr. Meighen.

Mr. CALDER: I have not seen the British Imports and Exports Bill.

Mr. HUGHES: Have you seen it, Mr. Massey?

Mr. MASSEY: I have.

Mr. HUGHES: Most of us have not seen this Imports and Exports Bill; or an Act, is it?

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: A Bill.

Mr. HUGHES: I have not seen it. I do not know what it does.

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: I thought copies had been circulated.

Mr. HUGHES: Anyhow, I have not seen it.

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: It has been sent to the Dominion Premiers.

Mr. HUGHES: I will tell you what we do. Under a section of our Customs Act the Governor-General in Council may prohibit the importation of any goods, and that is a power that does not require more legislation. As to exports, the power under the principal Act is limited to specified classes of goods; but there is a dragnet clause which enables us to include in that any goods the exportation of which the Governor-General thinks harmful to the Commonwealth. You could not have anything wider than that, provided you have a discreet and firm Executive.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is that in your Customs Act?

Mr. HUGHES: Yes, it is in the Customs Act.

Dr. ADDISON: Does your power extend beyond general prohibition, or does it enable you to give a licence to allow an export to go to a certain destination?

Mr. HUGHES: Yes, it does. Any class of goods, or any particular person's transactions, may be taken out of the general prohibition by licence. Of course, most of our business now is carried on under licence as it were, that is to say, there is general prohibition, and there are exceptions taken by licence. What I do hope is, that the Conference will not agree to the Resolutions of the Sub-committee, but that it will agree, without committing itself to the verbiage of the Imports and Exports (Temporary Control) Bill of the United Kingdom, to that kind of legislation which will clothe each of the Dominion Legislatures with the power of controlling imports and exports. They must now have the power of controlling imports.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Legislature has the power, of course, not the Executive. We have during the war, but not after the war.

Mr. HUGHES: I see what you mean; you have your tariff.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is legislative.

Mr. HUGHES: Yes, I see what you mean. Of course, the tariff does not prohibit the entry of anything; it says, if they come in they must pay a tax. But have not you any additional power to prohibit any articles coming in or going out?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have what we call an anti-dumping clause, and there is a general power, but I do not think any Executive in Canada would lodge upon that a plan or policy of controlling its imports and exports so as to meet the objects of the Imports and Exports Bill, without the express authority of Parliament.

Mr. LLOYD: It is the same in Newfoundland.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am disposed to think, Mr. Hughes, that Parliament would prefer that the question of giving that authority should come before it pursuant to a Resolution of this character rather than pursuant to a more specific or dictatorial one from the Conference, which would be much less likely to succeed.

Mr. HUGHES: I see. But what do we want a Committee for, as proposed in the draft Resolution, if, in effect, we are going to leave it to each Dominion to deal with this matter, to give effect to Resolution 3 each in its own way? What do you want a Committee for?

Mr. LLOYD: To gather information as to methods, and supply the information each to its Dominion.

Dr. ADDISON: Is it not the case that we should try and ascertain with respect to any particular commodity which may be unequally distributed, of which the Empire may or may not have a very limited share of control, whether it may not be possible to pursue a similar course of action. But until you obtain your general powers you cannot exercise control. And so with respect to any particular commodity: it depends upon how it is produced and distributed. So, in order to get down to business, we must do so finally in reference to commodities. The information is already got for consideration.

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: Perhaps I may give some explanation to Mr. Hughes. At this Sub-committee it was suggested by one or two representatives that it would be very difficult, if not impossible, for them to secure legislation on the lines of the Imports and Exports Bill. Nevertheless, they agreed that it is desirable, that it is necessary, there should be some control, some command, over the essential raw materials, certainly, at least, during the period of reconstruction. And it was because they were so anxious that something should be done in that direction, and to meet the desire that we should explore all the possibilities of securing command of these materials by some means other than by legislation such as that provided in the Bill, that we agreed that we should prepare a Memorandum at the Board of Trade setting forth the different possibilities of control for the consideration of this Sub-committee. It might be that, as a result of the Memorandum we should prepare, arising out of the many investigations that have been carried on during the last few months, they would come to the conclusion that there was no alternative other than by prohibiting imports and exports except under licence. Nevertheless, they wanted an opportunity of reviewing the whole problem in all its aspects, so that they might be fortified with that information when they went back to their respective countries and considered it with their Governments.

Mr. HUGHES: I think that is a very good idea. Of course, I do not see what a Committee can do in this matter. A Committee does not draw up this Memorandum; you draw it up yourself.

Dr. ADDISON: In the case of some commodities, the only way to secure control might be by some scheme of purchase.

Mr. HUGHES: But if you are going to deal with a concrete thing no Committee can help you. You say to me, to Mr. Massey, to Mr. Meighen, We want bacon, or we want butter, or lead—whatever it is. You say, Can we have it? He says, I want you to have it. You say, How can we best secure it? That is a business for you and for Mr. Massey; no Committee can help you there. And how can Mr. Massey say what is the best way for Mr. Meighen? How can Mr. Meighen say what is the best way in which you can buy things from me? You can't; it comes down to a business proposition. You cannot deal with it in any other way.

Dr. ADDISON: But now we have got Mr. Meighen and Mr. Massey here, we may discuss it with them together. Is it not an advantage that we can discuss it together, to come to an arrangement with them both together?

Mr. HUGHES: No, you could not, because you do not deal with the things in detail; you are dealing here with things in generalities. But if you say to Mr. Massey, "We will take your New Zealand butter," he can deal with that. And it would be helpful if Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Burton and Mr. Massey and myself, all five of us, were to deal with that; we could then help each other.

Dr. ADDISON: That is what the Committee will do.

Mr. HUGHES: When you come to that, you will deal with it, but I shall say it is his business.

Mr. LLOYD: It is suggested we shall do that.

Mr. CALDER: It may be quite possible to deal with Mr. Massey in one way, but he might be able to deal by a method which would not be applicable in Canada at all. And the same is true of other matters. What we desired, on the Committee, was a list of all the possible methods of control, so that we might have it for reference in determining what particular method is applicable to any commodity in each Dominion. The object was to get the Board of Trade to submit to our Committee a list of all the various methods that they thought might be adopted.

Mr. HUGHES: Each go to our own Houses?

Mr. CALDER: As to this question of giving the Executive full control of imports and exports, the plan would be very simple, but we feel we cannot do that; public opinion would not allow us to do it, and South Africa, I expect, is in the same position. We are anxious to come to some means whereby we can secure the object which is sought. All that we want to know is, the various possible methods by which that can be done. We may be able to think out some; you may be able to think out some. Let us get these together, so that we can carry them back, and, if possible, apply them.

Mr. HUGHES: I agree with what you say, but I repeat that if I attend a Committee I can give no suggestion whatever. There is only one way of dealing with the raw materials in the Empire, and that is an end of it. And I think it would strengthen your hands enormously in Canada if we pass a Resolution saying the only effective way of doing it is to take control of exports.

Mr. MASSEY: That ought to be done by the Parliament of the United Kingdom.

Mr. HUGHES: I will not say any more: I will not press a Resolution.

Mr. MASSEY: Speaking from memory, I would say we have all the power that we require. I cannot guarantee that I can recollect all the provisions of the different Acts which deal with this subject, but before the war we had a very great deal of power in our Customs Act, by which we were able to prevent the exportation of certain commodities and to approve the exportation of certain commodities, and that power has been greatly extended by our war legislation. And now, during the war period at all events, and for six months afterwards, we can do practically anything we like by an Order in Council. We can prevent anything leaving New Zealand which we think should not leave the country, and we can prevent anything coming into New Zealand which we think should not be imported. And we can say that certain commodities can only be exported to certain parts—the United Kingdom, for instance.

Mr. HUGHES: And I do not doubt that will be extended to cover the period of reconstruction.

Mr. MASSEY: There will be no difficulty whatever. I am absolutely certain there will be no difficulty whatever. I am very strongly of opinion that where that power does not exist, then it should be taken. But if we are going to allow matters to run back into the groove in which they were running prior to the war, we must conclude that a very great deal of our war effort will have been wasted. And that is the danger that I see in front of us. And I am pretty certain, from what we hear of the way matters are being arranged in present enemy countries, that preparations are being made so that directly the present war comes to an end we shall enter upon a commercial and industrial war such as we have never experienced up to the present. And I believe that in that war we hold what I may be allowed to call, in this connection, the trump cards, because we possess a great deal of the raw material of the world, and it is hardly necessary for me to say I think that we should do our best to prevent that raw material again finding its way into enemy hands. And there is this difficulty, which has not yet been faced in the United Kingdom, we do not know what is going to be done with regard to fiscal matters here. I know how difficult it is to deal with such a matter during the war period: I know that public men in the United Kingdom are looking forward to a General Election in the not far distant future; we are given to understand that a General Election will come along at the end of this year or at the beginning of next—I am only repeating the opinions I have heard, or part of them—and from them people argue that it would be wrong to take up, or attempt to deal with, such matters as legislation in connection with Customs Duties, or alterations in the fiscal policy which has been in operation in Great Britain for many years past. I am not now expressing my own opinion. But this has got to be taken in hand, and for the sake of the whole Empire, the sooner we know what the policy of Great Britain is going to be, the better it will be, and the sooner we shall be able to make the necessary arrangements. But it all comes back to this, that we shall have to do a great deal more in the way of preferential treatment with regard to the countries of the Empire than we have in the past, and if we do not, the Empire will not progress as we, every one of us, would like to see it progress. That is my opinion.

Mr. HUGHES: I would make a suggestion regarding the opening paragraph of this Resolution to see if Mr. Meighen, Mr. Burton, and Mr. Lloyd can accept it. In the fifth line, where it says "the different parts of the Empire differ widely as regards the extent," say "differ widely as regards the form of the legislation necessary," and then go on "the respective Governments should nevertheless," &c.

CHAIRMAN: It would now run in this way: "and is of opinion that whilst the circumstances of the different parts of the Empire differ widely as regards the form of the legislation necessary, the respective Governments should nevertheless take such action as may be expedient to enable the objects of Resolution III. to be fully carried out."

Mr. HUGHES: "Take action effective to control imports and exports as required for the purposes of Resolution III." I am not going to press that any further than just to put it forward that, in my opinion, it will not hamper you at all, or the Legislature of Canada, or of New Zealand, or South Africa. They will have ample discretionary power, and at the same time we shall indicate, without definitely declaring, our opinion that it can only be done by interfering in some way with imports and exports, which is, of course, absolutely true. I suggest, therefore, that we might accept that as a working compromise on the different views that have been expressed.

CHAIRMAN: What do the representatives of the other Governments feel about it?

Mr. BURTON: May I say, Mr. Long, a word on this subject at this stage? This whole question was very thoroughly and fully discussed by our Sub-committee on, I think, two occasions. And the position, as far as South Africa is concerned—which, I gather, is very much the same in Canada and Newfoundland—is this. I think we all agree that it is desirable, and, in fact, necessary, that every effort should be made to secure these raw materials for the use of the Empire and its Allies during the reconstruction period. The question is what the best line is to adopt in order to secure that. Now, it is no use whatever dealing with a matter of this kind simply on broad lines of patriotism or of national necessities; you have got to deal with it as a question of business, because business it is, and business lies at the heart of the whole thing. Now, it would be wrong on my part if I were not to state, what I believe to be the fact—what my colleague and myself and my colleagues in the Government in South Africa are certain is a fact—namely, that while we, and I think the great majority of the people of the country, are well disposed and would be prepared to do what they could in this direction, if you are going to adopt the method of legislative control of imports and exports, that is to say, to give the Executive power to dictate to the people what they are to do with their goods, you will wreck your whole scheme. The thing will die in its inception, because the people are of a very independent character, as they are elsewhere, and they do not like this sort of thing. Quite apart from the inherent merits or demerits of the matter, I do not think there is the faintest probability of our getting it through; I do not think there is a Government that could hold if it would do it. And by taking such a step you will set the temper of the people against the measures which you may be able to adopt, with their consent alone, in this direction. It is a question how much can be done without this legislation, which Mr. Hughes refers to, and which has been put before us, quite frankly, by the President of the Board of Trade as the only effective way of doing it, in his opinion, which, of course, I can see the force of. Apart from that, no doubt, it is very difficult to see the ways of achieving our object. I think it is true to say that with regard to one commodity there may be different ways of dealing with it, and not only as regards that commodity, but as regards a different commodity, or a different country which you may be dealing with, according to particular characteristics, and so forth, the conditions affecting it. And what I am saying certainly was expressed by the Canadian representative and by Mr. Lloyd. It would be, in my opinion, not merely difficult, but it would be impossible for legislation of this sort to be carried—I speak for my own Dominion. So it is of no use discussing the means, as far as I am concerned. If we are going to deal with things of this sort, we must deal with the situation on facts, and not as we would like it to be. You must, after all, take your situation as you find it. I do not think there is the slightest doubt that this will not do; it will tend towards spoiling the whole object which you have in view. So, if you speak of legislation in the way the amendment of Mr. Hughes does, the form of legislation which may be necessary, you will be introducing some element into a frank policy which is not so frank. We Sir ALBERT STANLEY: I do not want to interrupt, but it might be of interest to the Conference to know, that, as far as that particular recommendation is concerned, the British Government already have the power to prevent transfer of any ship under the British flag for, I think it is, three years after the war, without the consent of the British Government.

Mr. MASSEY: I trust that power will be exercised. I know this is not going to be published, or I would not repeat it, but what has happened is this: Take, for instance, the convoy by which I myself and some other Representatives came over to Britain only three weeks ago. In that convoy there were several New Zealand ships—I mean ships that were built for the New Zealand trade, and expressly built for the purpose of carrying frozen meat, carrying troops and supplies from the United States to England. I am not finding fault, but that is what is causing the difficulty—the necessity of shipping these troops, and their supplies of food and equipment and all the rest of it. The ships are required for that purpose, and I suppose, until the American troops reach England, at all events, it will not be possible to release many of these ships. And the difficulty, to a certain extent, will continue, because those men have to be supplied with food and munitions, and all their other requirements, and ships will be required for that purpose. But I hope it will be remembered, if it is possible to make the arrangement, that ships which are not insulated will carry supplies and convey passengers as well as those which are insulated—better, as a matter of fact, because there is more space available, and I hope that insulated ships will be, as far as possible, left available for the purpose of carrying meat supplies from the countries which are represented at the Conference to-day, of which South Africa is one.

Then there is the third Recommendation under the heading "Oversea Transport"—"The control of insulated ships by the Imperial and Dominion Governments, acting in concert in all matters affecting both the United Kingdom and the Oversea Dominions, during the reconstruction period, so as to ensure, where necessary, the determination of the cargo, of the movements of the ships, and of the rates of freight." This is a very important Recommendation, and evidently the result of considerable thought on the part of the Committee. I see it is intended that the Dominion Governments shall have a say in the control of insulated ships, and I do think it is necessary, in justice to the Dominions, that they should have a representative on the controlling authority. That is scarcely the case so far as New Zealand is concerned at present, but it is a very important point and should not be overlooked. So too with reference to the rates of freight. The rates are very high at present—in the opinion of many people, unnecessarily high. Of course we do not feel the increase in the freight, on account of the arrangement I have referred to between the Dominions and the United Kingdom. The Government of the United Kingdom is, so far as New Zealand is concerned—and the same applies to Australia—responsible for carrying the meat from those countries to this side of the world, and of course the freight is paid by them. But I do hope that when a change takes place something will be done to see that the freights are reduced to a reasonable amount. The trade simply could not stand the freights which are being charged at present. It would be ruin to attempt to carry on under such conditions.

Then there is a point arising out of that, and that is with regard to the prices which are being charged in the United Kingdom at the present time for meat imported, say, from New Zealand. It may be said, of course, that we have nothing to do with that. I do not quite admit that. I hold in my hand a document which has been supplied to me by a gentleman who is not connected with the trade, as a matter of fact, but who, as part of his duty in connection with the position he holds, found it necessary to purchase a quantity of New Zealand meat just recently. The wholesale price was 1s. 1½d. per lb. In his communication to me—and I have looked through his figures and believe them to be absolutely correct—he points out that the average price to-day in New Zealand for mutton is about 5½d. per lb. He points out that all the costs—freight, insurance, landing charges, and agents' commission—bring the cost to the British Government up to 8.409d.—that is less than 8½d. per lb. Well, if his figures are right—and I cannot find a flaw in them—then there is a very large profit accruing to the British Government on this purchase of meat. Either we are not being paid enough in New Zealand—and I do not suggest that—I think we are being paid a fair price—or else the British consumer is being charged too much. There is the position, so far as I am able to see it from the document supplied to me. And this has caused a certain amount of dissatisfaction in New Zealand. I was able to tell them last session when the House met that a better arrangement was being made, but member after member raised the point in the House, that while there was no objection to the price which was being paid to the New Zealand producer, or exporter, too much was being paid by the consumer in Great Britain. I hope now that the attention of the proper authorities will be called to this point, and that it will be looked into.

Then I come to the fourth Recommendation under the heading "Oversea Transport": "The use of British insulated ships so as to give a priority to meat produced within the Empire, subject to the suitability of the ships for the service proposed and to the need for bringing to the United Kingdom a full supply of beef." Beef is especially referred to, and let me say this follows up the theory of preference, in which most of us have become very strong believers. I do think that British citizens should have the first claim upon British ships, and especially British insulated ships, particularly in connection with the conditions likely to exist during the transition period.

Then the fifth Recommendation under the same heading says: "When Government control terminates, shipowners should be forbidden to charge differential rates on refrigerated produce to large and small shippers at the same time for the same service; shipowners are also recommended then to fix rates from time to time in consultation with groups of shippers, with, where necessary, the friendly assistance of the Government concerned." The point referred to here has led to a very great deal of friction and dissatisfaction in meat-producing countries in the past—the fact that shipowners were able to make arrangements with large producers, with dealers in meat, so that their carcasses, their meat, should be carried at a lower rate than meat belonging to the small man who shipped direct to his agent in London. I think anything of the sort should be avoided. I am in thorough sympathy with the object of this recommendation, and I hope again it will be given effect to. This raises again the question of interference with business men. As I said just now, I am not a believer in Government interference unless it is absolutely necessary. I believe that in nine cases out of ten private individuals can carry on a business better than the Government of the country. But where the business is of national importance—and this meat business is undoubtedly of national importance—then I think some supervision on the part of the Government, whether the British Government or the Government of the Dominions, or both, probably both, is necessary. In the United States of America, and I think in Canada too, they have a Commission whose business it is to look after rates of freight, both on railways and in connection with shipping. You have never attempted anything of the sort in the United Kingdom as far as I know, and up to just recently we have never attempted anything of the sort in New Zealand. I believe they have an authority in Australia which makes it its business to look after this sort of thing occasionally, but I do not think that any one of us has gone farther than that. And I do think there should be something in the way of an Inter-Empire Commission arranged to look after rates of freight charged by shipowners, not only in connection with meat, but in connection with other commodities carried between the Dominions of the Empire and the heart of the Empire itself. The mere fact of supervision, even if we go no farther than that, will be useful—and, by the way, I have a Motion dealing with the subject which, I hope, will come up for consideration before the Conference comes to an end. I believe something of the sort is necessary and ought to be taken in hand. A body such as this Commission would not only regulate—and the effect of supervision would be to regulate the rates of freights, and passengers' fares for that matter—but it would be an encouragement, on the other hand, for shipowners to keep abreast of the times, and provide ships of the speed and tonnage required. I think it would be a very good thing, and I express my opinion so that the Board of Trade may consider it if they feel inclined so to do. I think the importance of the subject warrants something of the kind being done.

Mr. MASSEY: Referring to what has been said by Mr. Hughes, just let me say, that, as a rule, I am not a believer in Government interference unless such interference is shown to be absolutely necessary. I believe such interference was necessary during the present war, and may be necessary during what is often referred to as the transition period, and perhaps even longer than that. It is the duty of any Government to prevent exploitation of its citizens, and there is the danger which has been referred to by Mr. Hughes—the danger of the exploitation of producers in the producing countries, and the exploitation of consumers in the consuming countries.

Mr. HUGHES: Hear, hear.

Mr. MASSEY: And I am inclined to think the danger at this end—that is, the exploitation of the consumers—is even more serious than the possibility of the exploitation of the producers at the other end, especially in British countries.

Now, I understand that the objects of the Resolution and of the Recommendations of the Committee* were intended to meet the difficulties which I have referred to, and which were previously referred to by Mr. Hughes. I want to say that I appreciate the work which has been put into this question by the Committee. I have looked through their Report and, speaking generally, it is a good Report. There are evidences in the Report of intense application on the part of the Committee. I may not agree with the whole of the Recommendations—I shall come to some of my objections presently—but I want to say, while I am on that point, that I also appreciate the candour of the President of the Board of Trade, Sir Albert Stanley. It is better to be told exactly what is in the mind of the Board of Trade, and then the members of this Conference know exactly what they have to deal with, and that is the position now.

Mr. HUGHES: Hear, hear.

Mr. MASSEY: Now, so far as the recommendations of the Committee are concerned, just let me deal briefly with one or two of them, and then I shall come to some other points in which we are concerned from the New Zealand point of view. I am sorry I shall have to quote part of the Report, but I am afraid I cannot avoid doing so. I will turn to page 10†, at the foot of the page. I do not think it is necessary for me to deal with the question of "Development of Sources of Supply" there referred to, but I come to the first recommendation under the heading of "Oversea Transport," where the Committee say:—"The speedy completion of "insulated steamers now under construction or on order, and the grant of priority "during the first five years after the war for the construction of insulated steamers "for British owners, sufficient to carry the imported meat required by the Empire "and the Allies"—and they refer to paragraph 33 (a); this is one of the Recommendations which is summarised, and I may say I thoroughly agree with what is recommended here. One of our difficulties, especially during the war period—but it was a difficulty which was experienced to a certain extent before the war broke out—was the insufficiency of insulated steamers for the purpose of carrying our meat products to the United Kingdom. As a matter of fact, we send very little meat to any other country but the United Kingdom itself. A little goes to the West Coast of America, but very little compared with what comes to Britain. After the outbreak of war, I think it was in the beginning of 1915, an arrangement was made between the Government of the United Kingdom and the Government of New Zealand to take over, for the purposes of the British Government, the whole of our export of meat; and I am bound to say that the arrangement has, on the whole, worked very well. There have been complaints, of course, and defects have been pointed out from time to time to the Government of New Zealand, and the British Board of Trade and those working in connection with the British Board of Trade have endeavoured to remedy the defects. But the big difficulty has been this—the insufficiency of the supply of insulated steamers.

Just let me call your attention to the position as it is to-day. It was pretty bad at the commencement of last season—I am bound to admit that—but we got on very much better as the season advanced than we had reason to believe we should at the commencement. The Argentine season, as it is called, came to a close, and steamers which were carrying meat from the Argentine were released, and were thus able to carry meat from Australia and New Zealand. I may point out, in passing, that the export of meat from New Zealand has, for some years past, been second in the world. Argentine has been first, New Zealand second, and Australia third. No doubt Australia will come along with a larger supply presently. Very well. The position in New Zealand at the present moment is this. When my colleague and myself went back to our country at the end of the Conference of last year, we saw that there was likely to be considerable difficulty with regard to this branch of trade, and we recommended that the owners of frozen meat works in different parts of New Zealand, of which, I think, there are 48, should, wherever possible, increase their storage, and we arranged that if they wanted capital for the purpose, the Government should advance part of the capital required. Our advice was followed and the storage was increased, but even now we are up against this difficulty. Here we are in the off season, fortunately, but we are looking forward to the commencement of next season, and our stores are absolutely full. I do not think there is room for another carcass in any of the cold stores in New Zealand. We have storage for five million carcasses, and there are five million carcasses ready for shipment now. I do not say we are not getting any away; every two or three weeks a ship comes along and takes a few, but the supply of shipping is totally insufficient to deal with this immense accumulation.

Mr. COOK: We think you get our ships.

Mr. MASSEY: Yes, I know, but we will not squabble about that in the meantime. Not only is that the position with regard to meat, but there is an immense quantity of butter which requires frozen storage, and of cheese, which requires cool storage. There is the difficulty we are up against, and I am afraid the position in New Zealand, from the point of view of getting our provisions away owing to the scarcity of shipping, and owing to the fact that the shipping is required by the British Government for more urgent purposes (and on that point I am afraid I must agree), is such that I do not see how we can possibly get our products away during the coming season. We shall be able to get part of them, but I do not see how we can possibly get the whole away, unless a very great improvement takes place in the supply of New Zealand shipping. And it is not necessary for me to say that ships are not built in a day. New ships are being turned out gradually, but those which are being turned out are mostly ships which are not suitable for carrying New Zealand meat or dairy products, or other products of that sort. It is a difficulty of national importance, and it should be remedied as soon as it is possible to do it. I am optimistic enough to think that probably an improvement will come along in a few months, but we have to face the commencement of the season, and our season really commences in August. I do not think there will be serious difficulty before the middle of September, but unless something is done then there will be serious difficulty. And let me point out in passing that this affects not only people especially connected with the meat trade—not only the producers in New Zealand and the people who deal with it before it reaches the Imperial Government, but other classes of the community. It affects our ability to carry on the war, because if we do not get our supply of meat away we shall not be able to finance our share of the war in the way we have been doing in the past. Nothing could be more serious, from the point of view of New Zealand, than the scarcity of shipping which unfortunately exists. I trust the President of the Board of Trade, Sir Albert Stanley, will take this matter up with the Shipping Controller, and, while I know that they cannot do impossibilities, I hope they will do everything they can to give New Zealand and Australia—what is now referred to as the Australasian trade—the opportunity of getting their products away to the British markets, where those products are urgently required under existing circumstances.

What I have said with regard to the first Recommendation under the heading "Oversea Transport" covers, to a certain extent, the second Recommendation under that heading, "The prohibition of the sale or transfer of British insulated ships "to foreign control during the reconstruction period except with Government "permission." I trust this will be given effect to.

admit legislation is necessary, that is, legislation to control imports and exports, and, after all, that is the only thing that there is. And this legislation which, I am perfectly certain, even during the reconstruction period, well-disposed people will do much towards, they will not swallow, they will give no Government power to say "You may or you may not send your goods here and there."

Mr. HUGHES: Why?

Mr. BURTON: Because they are independent folk, and do not like interference with their business.

Mr. HUGHES: That is a reflection on Australia. I wish you could deal with the people there; you would think you had got amongst a lot of helots.

Mr. BURTON: But these helots of ours will not take that, I am sure. It is not practical business.

Mr. HUGHES: What I want to point out is that, after all, it is not whether they are independent people of independent ideas; the question is what they desire. Do they desire to build up the resources of the Empire, to assist it, or not? If they do not, I can understand it. If they do, where is the objection to the necessary means to give effect to their desire?

Mr. BURTON: The answer to that is, I believe, the great bulk of the people do desire it, but while they desire it, they are not prepared, legislatively, to compel others to do the same.

Mr. HUGHES: Looking at it entirely from the commercial point of view, what do they lose?

Mr. BURTON: If you can show them they will lose nothing, they will do it.

Mr. MASSEY: I think Mr. Burton has given the matter, as it concerns South Africa, very candidly. I do not see in that an objection to the Resolution.

Mr. BURTON: I have no objection to the motion.

Mr. MASSEY: That is what is before the Conference.

Mr. HUGHES: I shall not press my suggestion at all if it will embarrass Mr. Burton or the representative of any other Dominion. I put it forward because I conceived it to be, on the whole, fairly expressive of our ideas; but if it does not do that, I will withdraw it.

CHAIRMAN: Thank you. Then, may I put the Resolution in its original form? that this original Resolution be adopted by the Conference.

[Agreed.]

Imperial Meat Supplies.

CHAIRMAN: Now we resume the discussion on meat, which was commenced at the last meeting by the address delivered by Sir Albert Stanley, in support of the next Resolution, which is: "The Conference welcomes co-operation among the Governments of the Empire on the general lines recommended by the Committee on Imperial Meat Resources to ensure that the Empire shall become, as far as possible, self-sufficing in the matter of meat supplies, and recommends the detailed examination by the Governments concerned of the legislative and administrative measures required for this purpose." Does any member of the Conference desire to address us on the Resolution and the arguments advanced by the President of the Board of Trade.

Mr. MASSEY: I suppose that, following the usual custom, Canada and Australia come first. I think it is for Canada and Australia to give a lead.

Mr. HUGHES: I have very little to say on the matter, because in its present form it has not been reduced to a practical proposition. We have not had the benefit of the advice of those whose interests are really intimately, if not primarily, concerned. It is suggested, of course, that there should be Government interference; but I should like to know, from the lips of those who are concerned in the trade, what they think, as practical business men, with regard to the suggestions put forward. In its present state the trade is in great danger from many directions, from many sources. No doubt American penetration, as it is termed here, has gone a good way. In Australia I suppose you know what they have done. The American meat companies are ousting the local meat companies; they have control now over many stations—"ranches" you call them in Canada,—and control over many meat works. They have considerable influence in our commercial life, also over those who control the refrigerated tonnage. In fact, it is difficult to say where their influence ends. I feel perfectly sure that if they go on for another ten years, then for all intents and purposes the stock-raising industry, at all events the beef-growing industry, will be manipulated, controlled, and directed for the benefit of Armour, Swift, and Morris. As matters stand at present, I think the thing is compassable. I do not think the Meat Trust in Australia will ever get the hold it got in America, for the simple reason that political conditions are such as to preclude it. But it will be absolutely disastrous to the Empire if it permits that control—now more or less embryonic but still formidable—to develop. And you can deal with that only as a practical business proposition, by putting yourself, or an agency of the British Government—that is to say, some of those persons who handle, who really retail or wholesale meat to the trading public—into direct relation with the meat producer of Australia. Let there be no middle-man. Let us know exactly who you are, how much you want, the price you propose to give for it; let that be determined by the cost of production and the higgling of the market. Let us have means to develop our meat industry, and the market will do that at an assured price. Let us have additional cold-storage plants in Australia, meat works, and above all, ample refrigerated tonnage at our disposal. And lastly, but not least, control of the meat at this end. Now, Mr. Massey, the circumstances of New Zealand with regard to meat may be said to be identical with those of Australia, at least for this particular purpose. And we have control—I do not speak of Governments, but the people have control—apart from the American penetration, over the meat at that end. I do not say that control is systematised or organised. We have control, or can get it. But here, in your midst, the American is active; he has control of the meat, wholesale and retail. It amounts to this: that you may do practically what you like; you may develop flocks and herds on the other side and keep them out of the control of those companies; you may have your refrigerator tonnage and bring the meat overseas, but if you have Armour and Company operating over here, you are no better off. They determine the price of meat here; you cannot give for the meat more than they get for it. And if they can "bear" the market here, or "bull" it, as they choose, then all your efforts are in vain there. You have got to get both ends of this problem in your hands. And I think the best way to do it is to let us hear what those whose bona fides is beyond doubt—and I speak of bona fides in reference to people whose interests are those of the Empire and not of any country outside the Empire—let us hear what these business meat men think ought to be done to secure complete control of the British market. Let us hear from the meat producer what he thinks, what he is prepared to do. What needs doing to help him is pretty well known. You have got to say "Well, we will take your meat." There is an ample market for it, it is not as if you were embarrassing yourself or taking a surplus which cannot be helped. There is the market, and you have to make up your mind—you cannot have both things—you have to make up your mind whether you want Australian meat, or New Zealand meat, or Argentine meat. You must make up your mind whether you want to encourage Imperial trade more than trade with the Argentine. When you have done that, then the thing is compassable. And I submit that the meat trade, although it is of tremendous importance, is one which can be dealt with in a business-like way, provided the Government are prepared to vest in the hands of somebody sufficient authority to deal with it in a business-like way.

Then the sixth Recommendation under the same heading, "Oversea Transport" deals especially with the conditions existing in South Africa. I do not pretend to understand the conditions there, but I have no doubt this subject will be referred to by the representatives of South Africa who are present.

Then we come again to the next heading "Supervision of Production and Distribution." The first Recommendation here is with regard to "the licensing of freezing works and cold stores, subject to the reservation where required, of part of their space for custom trade; to the approval by the Government concerned of the rates for killing, freezing, and storing; to the prohibition of special rebates; and to the furnishing of statistical returns." Well, we in New Zealand are doing all this at present, but in one respect I think we shall have to go a little farther with regard to licensing and consequent control of freezing works and cold storage. Most of our works in New Zealand are co-operative works; that is to say, they belong mostly, if not altogether, to the producers; and we provide, by legislation, that before those works can be used for the purpose for which they are intended—freezing, slaughtering, and so on—licences must be obtained from the Agricultural Department, which has supervision of this kind of thing. But I think, on account of the menace which was referred to by Mr. Hughes and of what has taken place in Australia and the Argentine, the fact that some of these works in Australia have passed under the control and ownership of the Meat Trust, and that in Argentina nearly the whole of these works belong to American companies, I think it will be necessary, in view of that, for New Zealand to go farther. And before coming to England I left instructions for a Bill to be drafted which will give further power to supervise these works. The Bill had not taken permanent form before we left New Zealand, but I have no doubt it will be prepared in time for next session, and we propose to ask Parliament to give us still further control, with the object of preventing the Meat Trust from obtaining a footing in New Zealand, such as they have undoubtedly obtained in Australia, and have undoubtedly secured in the Argentine.

Then Recommendation 2 under the same heading refers to the licensing of meat exporting companies or firms. I think that is necessary, especially necessary on this side of the world, in Britain. It may be necessary for us to do something of the sort in New Zealand, but it is not so necessary as is the licensing of freezing works and stores. But it is necessary to know who are the people who handle our meat on both sides of the world. I do not know the object of the third Recommendation under this heading, that a Dominion or State Government should acquire or control "one or more meat works should occasion render that course desirable." I think on the lines we are following in New Zealand it will not be necessary to do this, but if it becomes necessary, I for one would have no hesitation in accepting that Recommendation of the Committee.

Then the fourth Recommendation under this heading refers to "the continuation, during the period of reconstruction, of the system of State purchase of the exportable surplus of meat which has been in existence in Australia and New Zealand, and its possible extension to other Dominions producing meat." This I think is necessary if there is going to be a system of State control, and if the British Government is going to purchase meat from Australia and New Zealand. Then I think it will be necessary also to purchase meat in the British market from other Dominions producing it, or else we shall have this state of things arising in the British market—our meat arriving from New Zealand and Australia being under control at a price fixed by the State, and meat from other parts being sold in the open market, possibly—I do not say probably, but possibly—securing a larger price, and thus causing serious dissatisfaction to the people we represent. I think anything of that sort should be avoided. We should all be placed in the same position. And there is another difficulty here. I have not noticed any recommendation with regard to the meat supplied from the Argentine during the transition period. Now this is what occurs to me, and I do not doubt it has occurred to the Committee. I may have overlooked their recommendation with regard to it, but this is what occurs to me. During the transition period it is intended to keep control of the meat from the Oversea Dominions. Now what is intended with regard to the meat from the Argentine? Is it intended to allow that to go upon the open market and to allow people to get the highest price possible for it, while at the same time we are only allowed to get the controlled price? I hope that is not intended, because, if so, it would cause very serious friction among the whole of the people of New Zealand, and I know the conditions in Australia are very much the same as the conditions which exist in our own country. I hope this will be avoided. I hope that the Argentine meat, if control is going to continue to be exercised, will be placed upon exactly the same basis as meat from our countries.

Then, reference is made under the heading "Government Control in the United Kingdom" to the licensing of importers of meat. This is within the United Kingdom, and, perhaps I have no right to interfere with that, except just to express the opinion that I believe it to be even more necessary here than on the other side.

Then I come to the second Recommendation under this heading, "During the reconstruction period the control by the Imperial Government of the distribution of the meat purchased from the Dominions. The meat should be distributed through the ordinary channels of trade, the 'importing houses,' and wholesale houses working subject to conditions laid down by the Government, and at fixed rates of remuneration. Wholesale prices should bear a proper relation to the prices of Plate meat" (that is meat from the Argentine), "and any resulting profit should be divided between the Imperial Government and the sellers of meat in the Dominions." Well, I think this proposal wants to be considered very carefully. It really has a bearing on the point I raised just now—that is, the question of placing meat from the Argentine in the same position as meat from the Dominions of the Empire. "Supplies of meat may be refused to traders who exploit the consumer." Well, I do not think the trader should have the opportunity of exploiting the consumer.

Then comes another heading, "Control of South American Meat Supplies." The Committee recommend "The guarantee to purely British meat companies operating in the Plate of a fair return on their capital, the surplus above that rate and below a fixed maximum being shared equally between the companies and the Government. In return, the companies would be required to terminate their engagements with the other meat companies and place themselves under the control of the Imperial Government, producing meat in quantities specified from time to time, and placing it on the market under specified conditions."

That, I think, for my purpose may be taken with the next heading, i.e., "British Development of New Countries," as to which the Committee recommend "The encouragement and assistance of British companies to build meat-works in Brazil or other good cattle countries, subject to the conditions of control specified in the preceding paragraph." Well, I am not quite sure about that, especially the latter part of it. I do not think that is following the theory of preference. I am not going to raise that point just now, but the point I want to raise is this. The representatives of all the Dominions will agree with me, I am sure. I am sorry the representative of Australia is not in his place for the moment. I am quite sure the Dominions of the Empire, if given sufficient opportunity and encouragement—and they would not require very much encouragement—can produce all the meat required within the Empire. I can speak for my own country, which is the smallest of the Dominions, and I have no hesitation in saying that within a very few years, with a little encouragement—I am not speaking of Customs, taxation, or anything of that sort—but by making it evident to the producers and producing public, which includes all the farmers, that a good market exists for their meat, we can within a very few years easily double our output. And I am quite sure that Australia could do the same, perhaps even more easily than we can. There is always the difficulty in Australia about droughts coming along and interfering with production, but apart from that difficulty, I believe Australia can multiply its production many times. And so can South Africa. I have noticed what South Africa is doing. South Africa is going to increase her production very greatly during the next few years. It may be a selfish point of view—I do not think it is—but I do not think it is necessary for the British Government to go outside of its own Dominions, to go away from its own citizens, and encourage the production of meat in countries which are not in the British Empire, or under the British Flag, and never will be.

Then with regard to the heading "Supply of Meat to parts of the Empire other than the United Kingdom," where the Committee say "The supply of meat from the Dominions to parts of the Empire other than the United Kingdom should be settled by negotiation between the Governments concerned." Of course, I realise that the first object of the Government of the United Kingdom is to supply their own people with the meat they require, and it is also certain that there will be a market in Continental countries when the war comes to an end for a proportion of our meat. I do not think there is any doubt about that. The Committee deal with it under the heading "Trade between the Empire and Foreign Countries." Even before the war France had made arrangements for importing meat from meat-producing countries, and they were importing a comparatively small quantity from the Argentine; but during the war a very large section of the population have had experience of meat from the Dominions, or from oversea countries let me say, and I do not think they will be satisfied to go without. I know it becomes a question of capacity to purchase, but there is no doubt in my mind but that there will be a market in France and some of the other Continental countries for part of the meat produced on the other side of the world, and if after we have supplied our own requirements there is sufficient to meet the demand on the continent of Europe, then I do say an effort should be made in that direction.

Under the heading "Subsidiary Questions," reference is made by the Committee to "the establishment of a satisfactory system of grading of meat in each of the exporting Dominions." I may just say, so far as New Zealand is concerned, we have such a system in existence there, and I think it is as near perfection as it is possible to get. Every animal is inspected before it is allowed to be slaughtered, and inspected by competent men, and in almost every case we have proper veterinary surgeons for the purpose. After the animal is slaughtered, the carcass is hung up in the usual way in the store, and before being frozen it is again inspected by thoroughly qualified men, who have had to pass an examination for the purpose, to ascertain whether it is thoroughly sound; and where the carcass is not found to be sound, it is at once condemned and sent to the boiling-down works. So with any animals found diseased before being slaughtered; they are condemned, they are slaughtered; the hides, and so forth, are used for the ordinary purposes, and the carcasses are sent to the boiling-down works. So that all possible care is taken to prevent anything which is diseased in the slightest degree from being used for the purposes of human consumption.

I do not think there is anything else to which it is necessary for me to refer. I am afraid I have taken up more time than I should have done; but my reason for doing so is simply this—that this is a most important matter for the whole of the Dominion which Sir Joseph Ward and I represent. The production of meat is our most important industry. That is indicated by the fact that we have now, I think, 48 freezing works in different parts of the Dominion, and anything we can do to encourage it, and at the same time to make things more satisfactory at this end among the consumers, I think should be done; and I hope the Board of Trade will take some little notice—as I have no doubt they will—of the suggestions I have been able to put forward.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Long, my remarks will be very brief. The subject has two phases or, at all events, the discussion has. The protection of our various countries from exploitation by the American Beef Trust is, one would think, the one in which we are naturally most concerned, because we are just adjacent to that republic. This Trust has not attained the stranglehold that was feared at one time, and while much can be done, particularly in the United Kingdom, in the way of controlling the market, we will have to deal with the problem in the light of local conditions, and we feel capable of dealing with it efficiently.

As to the Resolution before the Conference I am not very enthusiastic about it. I do not see very much in it for the Dominion of Canada. It has nothing in its main contents that one could take exception to—nothing specific. We have had to fight our battles single-handed up to now in the matter of our cattle and meat export trade, and I do not see very much to look forward to, except to go on fighting in the same way, so far as the Report of the Committee is concerned. The Report and the efforts of the Committee have been directed, as was proper, towards the securing of an adequate meat supply properly controlled—the ensuring of it to the British Empire, or rather to the United Kingdom. That is really the purpose that has animated the Committee, and it is towards that that the recommendations in the Report are directed. The living up to the recommendations here will not go far, in my judgment, towards making the Empire itself self-supporting in meat supplies. We compete principally with the Argentine in beef shipments—with the Argentine and South American countries—and we are going to have to compete just the same. This Committee looks to enhancing the importations to the British Islands of Argentine meat and of beef from other competing countries which have climatic advantages over ours. I might quote a few words from the Report in this regard. Turning to paragraph 8, the Report refers, as far as Canada is concerned, merely to the matter of store cattle. I do not wish to bring that subject up because an understanding has been arrived at regarding it. We have, however, especially during the war, done a great deal to supply the British Isles with meat. No reference is made to that.

In paragraph 9 the following sentence appears:—"In so far, however, as development of the meat industry depends on the supply of railway and other material and plant from the United Kingdom, we recommend that, after the war, priority should be given to the needs of the various parts of the Commonwealth" (of Australia) "and of the Dominion" (that is New Zealand) "over demands coming from other sources." That is rather narrowly worded, I think. I do not know whether it was intended that priority is to be given to those countries over the other Dominions.

But coming to paragraph 17, these words appear: "So far as the United Kingdom is concerned the problem is not alone one of increasing the aggregate output of the Argentine Republic and Uruguay, but of securing control of a larger share of the trade, and that problem will be considered later." Then in the next paragraph (18) the following sentence appears: "In view, however, of the rapidity with which Brazil is being opened up, the problem of promptly securing for British companies an adequate share in that development must be considered with the similar problem in other parts of South America." Proceeding to paragraph 33 of the Report, there is a reference there, but before I refer to that perhaps I should go on to paragraph 51: "The encouragement of the opening up of new sources of supply by British capital should also engage the attention of the Imperial Government, especially in the case of Brazil." And at the end of the paragraph: "We strongly urge that the Imperial Government should encourage and, in case of need, assist British companies to build meat works in Brazil or other good cattle countries, subject to the same conditions of control of production and distribution as those suggested for the support of British companies in the Argentine." Paragraph 48 previously says: "The great bulk of imported mutton and lamb will be obtained from Imperial sources, but, as has already been pointed out, the United Kingdom is and must continue for some time to be dependent on foreign countries, principally the Argentine and Uruguay, for the great bulk of its imported beef supply. The main problem is how to act so as to strengthen British companies against undue foreign competition and to protect British markets at home from foreign control." As I said at the first, this is a problem which confronts the British Isles, and we can take no exception to the British Government seeking to solve it, and to ensure as the primary consideration that there is a supply. But it is difficult for me to see how much such efforts can sail under the flag of ensuring the self-sufficing power of the British Empire with regard to meat. I may say, that just in proportion as the efforts in the sentences I have quoted succeed, to the same extent the sources of supply in the British Dominions diminish, particularly in Canada, which competes with South America. To the same extent the process that very greatly discouraged the shipment of beef and of cattle during recent years will again succeed, and the Empire, instead of becoming self-sufficing, will become dependent upon this extraneous source of supply. In paragraph 33 there are these words, though, on the other side of the picture: "That all insulated steamers at present under construction or on order should be completed as speedily as possible, and that during the first five years after the war priority should be given for the construction of insulated steamers for British owners sufficient to convey exports of meat from the producing countries up to the amount needed to meet the needs of the Empire and the Allies." Of course, we in our country have sufficient for our use. That is no encouragement for us. It refers just as much to the Argentine as to ourselves. In paragraph 33 (d), though, the Report says, "That so far as insulated steamers are suitable for service on the respective routes, they should be so used as to give a priority to meat produced within the Empire, subject always to the need for bringing to the United Kingdom a full supply of beef." Now let me emphasise that with us it is a question of transportation, and the control of transportation. The character of the transportation is sufficient, provided you have the control, and we look forward to co-operating not only with the United Kingdom, but—as appears to us necessary by reason of the fact that our winter shipments are made to a large extent through American ports—with the United States as well, to secure that control. But this paragraph, while it reads very well, is so worded, that it seems to me that in the years that are to come it will be very difficult to get a conviction for violation of it: "That so far as insulated steamers are suitable for service on the respective routes, they should be so used as to give a priority to meat produced within the Empire, subject always to the need for bringing to the United Kingdom a full supply of beef." As I say, a violation of that would be very hard to establish, and I do not see much to look forward to in the way of assistance in that paragraph.

However, the Resolution that is before us has as its main purpose and character co-operation to make the Empire self-supporting. In that we are as enthusiastic as you. Where my enthusiasm fails is the reference in the Resolution to do so along the lines recommended by the Committee on Imperial Meat Resources. I despair of making the Empire self-sufficing along those lines. That is all I have to say.

CHAIRMAN: Does any other member of the Conference wish to speak on this matter?

Mr. BURTON: Mr. Long, I do not know whether the Board of Trade or yourself really expected that we would have a detailed discussion of this whole matter on this Report, because that, of course, opens up a very large field, and it might keep us here for weeks if we go into these detailed matters now. As far as I am concerned, I am not prepared to do that. But what I have to say is that on the terms of the draft Resolution proposed here, which I take it is before the Conference now, this draft Resolution is one which I am quite prepared to accept. It recommends "the detailed examination by the Governments concerned of the legislative and administrative measures required for this purpose." I only want to add further that it seems to me that, as far as South Africa is concerned, the examination by this Committee on Imperial Meat Resources and their ideas generally as far as South Africa is concerned, ought to be helpful in the development of what I believe is going to be really an expanding and a large supply of meat from that country. Our problem there is not, as it has been in other countries, to prevent the diversion of our products to other markets, but rather to prevent other producers from absorbing or controlling the Empire markets; and I would like to say, as far as we are concerned, the all-important question is the speedy supply of insulated ships for taking supplies from our country. That is the most important question of all, and I hope that that particular aspect of the transport question will be a matter that will receive the closest and most urgent attention both of the British Government and of our own Government.

I suppose paragraph 9 of the Report was not intended to mean what Mr. Meighen pointed out—though it certainly reads like it—as to the preference to be given to Australia and New Zealand. But I notice that paragraph 10, which deals with the Union of South Africa, says that "what has been said above as to the

"supplies of material from the United Kingdom applies here also." So that I suppose we also have a preference in that respect. I hope so, because if the industry is to be developed, as I think it can be, and as I think it will be, because there are very important ranching possibilities in South Africa for the supply of cattle, and I think the supply will increase very much within the next few years, then the matter of ships and the matter of material for developing our arrangements in the Union for dealing with meat must be attended to, otherwise the whole thing will break down.

I rather agree with Mr. Meighen in that I am not altogether happy about the wording of the recommendation of the Committee in regard to insulated steamers. We cannot have our cake and eat it, and we must either decide whether we are going to attend to this matter of the development of the self-sufficing character of the British Empire and lay ourselves out for that, or take the other line. If you take the other line, the line, namely, of looking to the needs of the United Kingdom, and the need for building up British enterprise in countries like Brazil and the Argentine and Uruguay, and so on; well, then, I am pretty sure you cannot carry out the scheme which lies at the root of these proposals; namely, the idea of having your Empire as a whole self-sufficing in the matter of its meat. The two elements, of course, are somewhat in conflict with each other; there can be no doubt whatever as to that. I should think the Board of Trade will agree with me in that respect. You are bound to say you will pay more attention to the problem of making the Empire self-sufficing rather than to the other one. Apparently this Report wants to make them go together, but I agree that as it is worded here, a country like, say, South Africa, cannot extract from that Report the comfort that it would like to get; namely, that there will be a sufficiently speedy supply of insulated ships, and therefore as speedy a supply of the machinery required, as it would like to have.

Well now, I do not want to go into all the details, because, as I say, that opens up a very large field indeed, and I did not gather from Sir Albert Stanley that it was his idea that we should do that now. We know what is suggested here, and, therefore, without saying that I agree with every recommendation which is made, or that we take in South Africa the same view on every detail, I think the Report contains sufficient material for us to adopt it on the lines suggested by the resolution.

Mr. LLOYD: I have very few observations to make, inasmuch as Newfoundland is not largely a meat producing country, and we do not export meat. We are only interested from the standpoint of consumers. But it gives me an opportunity of looking at this whole matter from a disinterested standpoint, and it seems to me rather a curious matter to ask representatives of the Empire, who are met here apparently for the benefit of the Empire generally, to assent wholly to the lines of the Report on Imperial Meat Resources. Now, of course, so far as that relates to the United Kingdom, we can take no exception to such recommendations, but in so far as they relate to Brazil and the Argentine, it is hardly the thing to ask us to assent to it. And I would suggest—I do not want a vote taken now—that there should be a limitation of this recommendation, and that the Resolution should be somewhat altered. I am not asking for a vote now, because I know there are others absent. I simply put the question forward for consideration before a vote is taken.

CHAIRMAN: Are you making a suggestion now for amending the Resolution?

Mr. LLOYD: Yes, that it should read as follows: "The Conference welcomes co-operation among the Governments of the Empire on the general lines recommended by the Committee on Imperial Meat Resources so far as they relate to the Empire," and then it can go on as it is. I think we can all give our cordial support to that.

Mr. MASSEY: That simply means that we have nothing to do with what the United Kingdom may wish to do as regards South America.

Mr. LLOYD: Yes. I do not wish to make any reflection, but we can give our cordial support to the extent I have indicated.

Now there is another point. Although Newfoundland is not a meat exporting country, we are a fish exporting country, and we are rather interested in the exportation of fish by cold storage methods to the United Kingdom. And that brings me to a point which I wish to develop for a moment. The problem as referred to here in the recommendations of the Committee is regarded as one mainly of insulated steamers. Now I have found on investigating the matter so far as Newfoundland is concerned, that that is not solely the case—that a scheme has been practically held up, up to the present time, not so much on account of lack of insulated steamers as on account of lack of sufficient cold storage accommodation in the United Kingdom, and therefore it would appear to me that these recommendations hardly go far enough. While it is essential, and certainly desirable, to have the recommendations for insulated steamers, there seems to be also need of a recommendation of some further facilities for the extension of cold storage accommodation in the United Kingdom. As a matter of fact, we were told that they could take none of our fish until October, because there was not sufficient cold storage accommodation here—but that the cold storage accommodation was being extended. And it occurred to me that this state of affairs threw some light on the problem before us. That is all I have to say.

Sir S. P. SINHA: I have nothing to add.

CHAIRMAN: Does any other member of the Conference wish to speak on this?

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Mr. Long, this is a very important matter and one that has got to be looked at carefully in the different parts of the Empire. I shall not be able to finish what I have to say by one o'clock.

CHAIRMAN: Do you wish us to adjourn? Would the Conference like to adjourn now?

Mr. LLOYD: The two representatives of Australia are away, and one of them expressed the desire to me that no vote should be taken.

CHAIRMAN: We could not take a vote to-day. There must be a reply to the questions asked by the Prime Minister of New Zealand. I am not quite sure whether he desired a reply on the shipping question—I rather gathered not. He has already discussed that with the Minister of Shipping, and probably will do so again himself. There is no member of the Ministry of Shipping here to-day, but before we meet again the Prime Minister's remarks will be communicated to the Ministry of Shipping, and if they wish to say anything in reply they can. Another point raised by New Zealand is the difference between the price paid in New Zealand and the price paid here. That is a matter for the Food Department and not for the Board of Trade. Unfortunately Lord Rhondda is ill and not able to be here himself, but a representative of that department will no doubt be prepared to meet that point. Then there are the criticisms delivered by Mr. Meighen and Mr. Burton, which I think must be considered by the Board of Trade before we finally pass the resolution. And Sir Joseph Ward has his remarks to make. So that it would probably meet the convenience of the Conference to adjourn.

Mr. MASSEY: I think that would be wise.

CHAIRMAN: It would not be fair to ask Sir Joseph to begin now and then to interrupt him for the adjournment.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I presume the discussion will be finished before these other gentlemen make their remarks?

CHAIRMAN: Oh, yes. If we adjourn now, we adjourn with you in possession of the house.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I do not suppose I shall be very long, but I cannot limit myself.

Order of Business.

CHAIRMAN: Then I take it, it is the wish of the Conference that we adjourn now. Then the next Resolution is one which deals with wool. Does the Conference desire to discuss that? It will ultimately have to go to the Committee on Raw Materials, but do they wish to discuss it in general before it goes to the Committee? If so, we will keep it on the agenda until the next meeting.

CHAIRMAN—cont.

Mr. LLOYD: I would suggest that we discuss matters in general before any specific matters are referred to the Committee. Take our experience to-day. We have spent three-quarters of an hour in re-discussing matters which have previously been discussed at length by the Committee.

CHAIRMAN: I think that three-quarters of an hour would have been three hours if it had not been for the work of the Committee.

Mr. LLOYD: Possibly, but some of us do not feel that way. We feel that we are spending time on sub-committees and coming here to discuss them further. It may be unavoidable, but that is how we feel.

CHAIRMAN: I think the time spent here would be much longer, but for that. The Committee does clear away a great deal of difficulty.

Mr. BURTON: The Resolution we passed this morning on raw materials surely now covers this wool business. We cannot go into this particular wool report² now, because we are going to ascertain methods of obtaining command of these supplies, and then we are going to refer these methods to the various Governments. And that seems to me to meet the wool matter splendidly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Committee referred to in that second paragraph of the Resolution passed to-day is the Raw Materials Committee?

CHAIRMAN: Yes, the view I was myself inclined to take—I have no right to offer it to the Conference dogmatically—was that the Resolution already passed in regard to raw materials by the Conference covers everything under that head, and provides machinery and procedure which would seem to obviate the necessity of discussing the raw materials resolutions seriatim.

Then we adjourn now until Monday, July 8th. The Committee meets on Friday July 5th—to-day week.

Imperial Meat Supplies.

SIR JOSEPH WARD: Mr. Long, this matter of Imperial meat resources is a very important, as well as a most difficult, one, and I should not like the opportunity to pass without at least putting on record my view on some points connected with it, some of which, I think, will hereafter cause a very great deal of trouble if parts of the proposals which we have here are put into operation. I want to make it clear that, during a time of war, it is a comparatively easy matter for the Government at the heart of the Empire, through the Governments in the outlying portions of the Empire, to make arrangements for the purchase of meat for war purposes, to help on towards victory in a great war, much easier than it is to have arrangements of that kind continued in a time of peace. And I am rather apprehensive of what is suggested in some of these proposals. Our sheep-growers have shown a magnanimity in connection with this business that redounds very highly to their credit. They came into line without any difficulty whatever, very largely out of feelings of loyalty to the Empire, with the object of assisting the Empire, and contracted for the sale of their products at a price recognised by everybody to have been anything but a high one. There may have been different reasons actuating the great body of these men in that respect, such as the difficulty over the control of shipping. But the fact remains that in a war period they not only did not stand out for high prices, but they came in in a way—so far as New Zealand is concerned, and I have very little doubt it applies to the other countries too—that was most creditable to them. And many of the sheep-growers showed a spirit, in the respect to which I am referring, that I think ought never to be forgotten in connection with the affairs of this Empire during the time of war. I repeat that it is a very easy matter during war time, when the spirit of the whole Empire is one, to have arrangements made for the purpose of meeting abnormal conditions, that in times of peace would prove most unsatisfactory to many of those sheep-growers who have come into line in the way I have just indicated. I want to try and make that point as clear as I can.

Just before this war started, for the first time in the history of New Zealand, the sheep-growers discovered that there was a better market than England—and not a Continental market—for their sheep. And but for the war having begun and

I want to call attention very briefly to what is proposed in this Report. There is the resolution which is quoted in paragraph 1 of this Report which reads: "This Committee was appointed as the result of a Conference convened by the President of the Board of Trade to consider the best means of giving effect to the following resolution passed by the Imperial War Conference of 1917: 'In view of the extent to which the United Kingdom and certain other parts of the Empire are dependent on over-sea supplies for meat, and of the desirability of freeing British markets from excessive dependence on foreign organisations which control important sources of supply, this Conference is of opinion that there should be co-operation between the Governments of the Empire to ensure that the Empire should become as far as possible self-sufficing in the matter of meat supplies, and that the Governments concerned should prepare detailed plans with this object.'"

Mr. COOK: That was penned before the entry of the United States into the war.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: No, I think it was after the United States came in. I want to call the attention of the Conference to paragraph 42 of this Report as bearing on my remarks and the Resolution. Paragraph 42 says, "In these circumstances we suggest that it might be advisable that, during the period of reconstruction, the system of State purchase of the exportable surplus of meat, which has been in existence for the last three years in Australia and New Zealand, should be continued and extended to the other Dominions producing meat. This would require the consent and co-operation of the Imperial and Oversea Governments, and involves the question of the distribution of the meat in the United Kingdom or other importing portions of the Empire, and also the allocation of part of the supplies to other countries." Now, just let me call attention to the fact that that Resolution quoted in paragraph 1 makes a special point of the desirability of freeing British markets from excessive dependence on foreign organisations which control important sources of supply. At the same time, another portion of this Report states rather further on—paragraph 50 of this Report says, "In our opinion the most effective methods of securing an adequate share of the South American meat supplies for the United Kingdom are either the establishment of meat works owned by the Imperial Government, or the strengthening of British companies at present operating there. Proceeding on the accepted method of utilising existing institutions, we propose that the Imperial Government should guarantee to all purely British companies (including Vestey Brothers, Limited, if they made such

"arrangements as would ensure that their works were fully under British and not under foreign control) a fair return on their capital. In return, these companies would be required to terminate all their engagements with the other meat companies, and to place themselves fully under the control of the Imperial Government. They would be bound to produce meat in the quantities specified, and to place it on the market under specified conditions." I want to call the attention of the Conference to the position after the war that we are going to get into. This Resolution of last year's Conference proposes that the British market is to be freed from foreign control in connection with meat. There is not a proposal in this Report, from the beginning to the end of it, excepting the suggestion that there should be investment in Argentine works, there is not a proposal to control, directly or indirectly, the importation of beef into this country from great American meat factories. There is not a proposal of any sort or kind that is going to enable any of the men who are selling their sheep to the British Government to get portions of the American beef at a controlled price, except such portions as may be got by the assistance given to an Argentine company. What position are we going to get into? I may be wrong in my assumption, but I do not think I am wrong; we are going to get into this position. That the men in Britain who may control some, or all, of the meat supplies that they are importing now, outside the great American beef exporters from America and importers here, those men are going to be put under the control and at the mercy of the great American meat exporters. You are going to say to the British people that the British merchant is not to have supplies of any kind from the overseas countries or from the American beef exporters, if you give effect to what is proposed under paragraph 50 of this Report. The Report suggests that the British Government, or the British Board of Trade, will have the right of control of sale to any other country—to France, to Italy, or to any other place, and you are going to leave the great American beef exporters free to compete on any terms they like, and those other countries which you profess you will control this meat for you are going to tie the British merchant, whoever he may be, right down, so that he cannot expand his trade, either directly or indirectly, because you prevent him from getting supplies. There is no man can build up a trade unless you give him the opportunity of having supplies ahead on which he may risk his money by his judgment, for the purpose of working a trade in these countries. In one breath you say, "We are going to control the whole of the meat supplies in these countries," and "we are not going to control the American beef exporters, because it is impossible to control them." You will leave them free to do whatever they like. You will tie overseas meatgrowers, farmers, and tie down the British merchant who wants to obtain meat from those countries, you make it impossible for him to obtain it unless he gets it through the Government under these proposals, and you are going to keep the New Zealand farmer, the Australian farmer, out of France and Italy, and give the great American exporters an opportunity of controlling the beef market all over the world, here and in France and Italy. And that is proposed—I admit it is with a good intention—with the object of putting this meat market upon a basis that is going to free the British markets from foreigners; that is, according to the resolution quoted in paragraph 1. But instead of freeing them from foreigners, you will throw them into the hands of men who are not foreigners but belong to a country, the United States of America, one firm of which—I need not name it, but probably it is known to everybody here—in one month last year handled more meat than the whole of the exports from New Zealand in a year. You will leave that firm—among other firms in the United States—free not only with their beef, but to go into the markets of England where people can get things for export, and they can get mutton and lamb supplies if they want to build up stocks for entering into competition in France or other countries. You will have them gripped by the throat by the American meat factors; there is no relief from them. I want to say, in the presence of the President of the Board of Trade that there is no refuting the statement I am making. It is absolute truth, and when you are faced with that fact—a fact which is not contradicted as far as the position is concerned—then is it not necessary to go very much farther than is proposed in this Report with a view to try and effect a solution of this tremendous difficulty that has been put? I want to say right here that

I am one of those who is most anxious to build up trade within the Empire, with one important reservation—I have made this statement publicly before the war and since the war, and I reaffirm it here—that it is idle, in my opinion—I may be singular in that opinion, I may be alone in it, but I hold it, and it would take a great deal to change me upon it, speaking as an individual, and expressing my opinion for what it is worth—I hold that in all these arrangements that you are making now you are going to bring trouble upon the British Empire unless you realise that you have got to enter into co-operation with the United States of America in any trade arrangements you make in the British Empire in the future. I do not say you can enter into preferential treaties with the United States of America, but I say it is impossible for the British Empire, in my judgment, to have inter-trade relations within the British Empire if they are going to ignore the conditions of the United States of America. If you are going to shut your eyes to the power of the United States, you are going to act, in my opinion, with a fatuous stupidity that would be absolutely injurious to the whole lot of us. To suppose that we are able to deal with some of these great things that we are discussing, and that you will get the assent of the United States of America to any attempt to exclude them, is to attempt to build upon a wrong foundation, and if you attempt to exclude them there will be trouble with the United States of America right off the reel. As sensible people we have to recognise that America is a great, powerful country—not an ally in connection with this war, but a co-operator in connection with this war, in the interests of freedom and in the interests of civilisation. We are now, at this Conference, proposing to lay down a system for carrying on our meat trade within the British Empire after the war is over, and you are perforce compelled—you cannot avoid it—to take into consideration the great Meat Trusts of the United States of America, which are the most powerful concerns of their kind in the world at the present moment. One company there, I repeat, has handled more meat in one month than the whole export of New Zealand for a year.

Mr. MASSEY: That cannot be. We are second in the world in the export of meat.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: It is so. What I am saying is a fact, that that one company handles more meat in a month than we export in a year.

Mr. COOK: But that is not to say it is all exported from the United States.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I did not say exported from the United States. I say that there is one company there that handles more meat in a month than we export from the whole of New Zealand in a year. I agree with Mr. Massey that as an exporter of meat our country, for its size and population, by comparison with other meat-exporting countries, has a wonderful record, of which we are all rightly proud.

Mr. MASSEY: It is second in the world.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: That was not the point I was making. I am talking about the strength of these powerful American meat organisations, all of which are to be left free to do as they like while we are all to be tied down, and I was instancing the size of the transactions of one particular company as compared even with the total meat export of a great meat-exporting country like New Zealand. I was not depreciating New Zealand; I never have done so, and I am not likely ever to do so.

Mr. COOK: I do not think either of you will ever depreciate New Zealand.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Well, it is not likely, in any case. I want to know how it is proposed to meet a position of this kind. There is no proposal here to meet it. There is no question about this—that the whole intentions of this Report are all right, but there is nothing in this world two years after the war is over, in my opinion, that would justify any of us, or any of the Governments, if I may put it in that way, in entering into an arrangement, with the best of intentions, that is going to leave our sheep growers in the position of losing a market in the United States which is going to give them, perhaps, 2d. per lb. more than they can get here. In war time that is not only justifiable but supportable, and I support it. In peace time it is not justifiable, and I do not support it. I say there is nothing in the world that would justify us in attempting to establish a new basis, under new conditions, beyond the period of the war or for a short time after the war. Then I think this problem will require to be approached, if not de novo, upon a new or fresh basis that can be considered by each part of the British Empire from its own point of view. And in this Report, as far as I can see, there is nothing at the present moment to show how that can be done.

Now I want to call attention to this point, and perhaps the President of the Board of Trade will be able to tell me later whether I am right or wrong. While the resolution quoted in paragraph 1 of the Report says: "In view of the extent to which the United Kingdom and certain other parts of the Empire are dependent on oversea supplies for meat, and of the desirability of freeing British markets from excessive dependence on foreign organisations," in paragraph 47 it says: "The meat would thus be delivered to the retailer at a price compounded of the landed cost of the meat, the expense of internal distribution, and administrative charges. Further, the wholesale prices of the meat should bear a proper relation, quality for quality, to Plate meat, and should this involve a profit, that profit should be divided in proportions to be agreed upon between the Imperial Government and the sellers of the meat in the Dominions." If Plate meat rules 1*d.* less than the price ruling in the United States of America, the growers of our country are going to have a basis fixed upon the value of Plate meat which comes from a country not forming a portion of the British Empire. Now, that is not giving effect to the aspiration contained in the resolution quoted in the first paragraph—that it is intended to make the British markets free of foreign supplies. The Argentine is a country that is supplying a large amount of beef, and for the purpose of expediency there is a proposal here that we are to have our prices based upon the value of the Plate meat. Well, that is not giving effect to the resolution of last year.

Mr. COOK: But you have just been arguing that we must base it ultimately upon the world's standards.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: That is quite right, Mr. Cook, but the Argentine is not the world. Now just read that resolution—

Mr. BURTON: What becomes of your control of imports and exports?

Sir JOSEPH WARD: What does it say? The resolution says: "In view of the extent to which the United Kingdom and certain other parts of the Empire are dependent on overseas supplies for meat . . . this Conference is of opinion that there should be co-operation between the Governments of the Empire to ensure that the Empire should become, as far as possible, self-sufficing." Very well. Then paragraph 47 of the Report says that instead of that being the case, you are going to have prices based upon River Plate prices. I call attention to it for the purpose of showing the incongruity of the two things.

Just let me say here what I am afraid of in connection with these proposals, and what I want to suggest. It is entirely in the hands of this Conference to come to a decision otherwise—I am fully aware of that—but what I want to suggest to this Conference is: Let us carry on the whole of the proposals until three or six months after the war, but do not let us take what I call a step in the wrong direction at this juncture.

Mr. MASSEY: It is an essential step as far as we are concerned. The meat trusts will if we do not.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: As far as I am concerned, anything that will control the meat trusts I am prepared to do, but the control of the meat trusts has nothing whatever to do with what I am referring to at present, namely, the putting of our sheep growers in the position of having to take a less price, in all probability, from this country than they could get after the war from another country.

Mr. MASSEY: All the trade is controlled by the trusts which we are speaking of, and one of which, you have told us, turns over more meat in a month than we export in a year.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: At any rate, Mr. Massey, I am putting my views, which I am entitled to do, and you are entitled to put yours in your own way.

Mr. MASSEY: I feel very strongly about this.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: So do I. I want to protect the meat growers from the disadvantage which will arise unless effective steps are taken to ensure that they are protected.

Mr. MASSEY: And I want to protect them from the trusts.

Mr. COOK: The trusts pay good prices, do they not?

Mr. MASSEY: Not in the Argentine, where they control the whole market. Look at the prices they pay there.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Well, Mr. Long, in my opinion, instead of committing ourselves to a price which looks to me as if it would be lower, after the war, than our people ought to get, we ought to be careful not to carry this on after the war, or at latest after six months after the war, and we ought then to deal with the greater, more difficult, and more complicated issues on which there will no doubt be differences of opinion as to the best course to take. I am strongly in favour of any proposals for controlling the meat trusts, but in the meantime these proposals allow them to remain completely uncontrolled while our sheep-growers are to be completely tied up, and we ought not to get into a position which looks to me as if it might be injurious to our meat-growers in New Zealand. It is for that reason that I make these remarks.

Now there is the fact—and I want to reaffirm this—that in my opinion, under these proposals the foreigner—and by that I mean the huge American Meat Trusts—can develop the markets freely, while all the other people are tied down and cannot develop at all. That cannot be overlooked. That is helping those great factors which are the disturbing element in connection with the meat trade of the world. And another thing is, the moment you let that class of people know the cost of the supplies available, they can play with the market against the people here who are buying the meat from our country, New Zealand. That is certain. The moment you get a large operator who knows the quantity available and the price that has been given, that man immediately has an enormous advantage over anybody else. That is what is proposed, and I think those gentlemen who have helped to prepare this Report, if they examine into this aspect of it, will find that that is so. I am satisfied that the British distributor, being under control, would find it impossible to develop outside markets, because he would fear a failure in his individual supplies.

Now I want to say here that I personally—I may be quite wrong in my view, but I hold a very strong opinion—think that there is only one way to tackle this question and tackle it successfully. To a very large extent we are circumscribed at present by what the policy of the British Government is going to be after the war is over. My belief is that the only way in which you can bring about a successful operation to enable the people in each of the oversea Dominions to get the highest price possible without tying them down and preventing them getting it elsewhere, is to establish a basis of inter-Imperial preferences. I believe that absolutely, and I think it should be a pro-British policy—but not anti-American. Some of the suggestions I have seen for commandeering all dumped supplies would not work out well. Now I believe in connection with this matter that the powerful British Government of the day, whoever they may be composed of, in conjunction with the oversea Dominions, when they are laying down a basis for inter-Imperial preference and a pro-British policy, cannot ignore the United States of America; and that is the time when every effort should be made to have a reciprocal basis upon which the disastrous effect of the operations of the large meat trusts there could be controlled. I do not think you are going to control them by force, as far as the United States of America is concerned. My opinion is that you can only control them by co-operation. And I do not think any ordinary individuals in any of the countries concerned can do that by themselves. I do not believe that it is possible to be accomplished excepting by the powerful co-operation of the British Government—and, of course, of the oversea Governments—with the Government of the United States. They could do it if they mutually agreed upon a course to be pursued. I think the whole of the freezing works in all the countries should be controlled. In New Zealand we have taken the necessary steps to do this to some extent, as Mr. Massey stated to this Conference at a previous sitting; and probably we shall have to go further in the direction of controlling the freezing works. If we had inter-Imperial preference and a pro-British policy, together with an understanding on a reciprocal basis with the United States of America, and controlled the freezing works in our own countries, adding one all-important condition, namely, a shipping priority for British trade, then I venture to express the opinion that you would commence to control the American Beef Trust, and that would be the controlling factor not only in England but in all the oversea countries. I have been talking to three or four retail butchers in the suburbs of London since I have been here, and they all say, "We must get our mutton where we get our beef." Unless they get a supply of beef they cannot carry on their general trade, and in my opinion you have to go farther than is suggested in this Report to enable this to be done. I am at one in expressing the opinion—whether it is in the Report or not I am not certain—that to enable us to get the best out of this meat trade, and to assist, at the same time, the British Government, to help the consumer in its own way, in this part of the world, it should pass through a British depôt, with British firms operating it and paying taxes on the incomes they derive from it. I think that would be a corollary to whatever arrangements were made.

And then, Mr. Long, I think we ought not to allow this subject to pass away from this Conference—at all events, I may express my own opinion—without an effort being made to compel lower steamer freights after the war. At present the Shipping Ministry, who are controlling the ships and the trading with all countries, have had, as a matter of necessity, I think, from the point of view of the high prices that are ruling for all kinds of things—coal, wages, cost of material, and everything else—to raise the freights (though they are paying the freights themselves) to a very high point indeed. Now, in normal times that means that the grower in our country has to take a much less net price for his meat if he has to pay anything approaching these high freights, and I am of opinion that within a few months after the war is over there ought to be a diversion of frozen meat steamers, insulated steamers, to the oversea countries which require to send their meat away; otherwise you will be keeping up the freights for a very long time, a considerably longer time than is necessary. And, in fact, I go very much further, and say that if it is possible, having regard to the necessity of supplying steamers for war purposes, to build frozen meat steamers now, so as to have a sufficiency for the various parts of the Empire requiring them, it would be one of the first factors in helping to bring about a better condition of things after the war is over, which, after all, is what everybody is trying to do.

I do not want to take up the time of the Conference farther. I have only briefly referred to these points, which are important, of course, and the subject is so complex and difficult that there is plenty of room for difference of opinion. But I take it we are trying, at all events, to help to develop the trade of the Empire, but to ignore the condition of the United States of America would be a very foolish thing to do, because it is a great commercial country, and no one can ignore it. I do not know whether anyone has referred to it or not, but in our country there has been from time to time not only a great deal of uneasiness but a great deal of criticism about the difference between the price our people are selling at and that which is being paid here by the consumers of the excess over and above the war requirements.

Mr. MASSEY: I have already called attention to that.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I did not hear that. It may have been when I was absent owing to influenza. At any rate, I want to reaffirm what Mr. Massey has called attention to. There has been, and is, a great feeling about it, and the matter has been taken up both in the House of Representatives and in the Press. Numbers of our people do not understand why, when their meat is sold at a particular price free on board or at the freezing works to the British Government, and when that meat is brought home in steamers which are commandeered by them, and they fix their own freights—they do not understand why the meat over and above what is required for feeding our troops (I am not reflecting upon this, because I do not know the cause) should be resold to the consumer here at such an enormously higher price as compared with that at which the meat is sold to the British Government. I think it would not only be reassuring, but that it is absolutely necessary, that there should be a clear statement as to the nature of the case, and as to the cause of this difference. There is no doubt that there is a great deal of feeling about it, and I think there should be an authoritative statement made upon this subject, for the information of those who are concerned.

There are a number of other points which I had intended to discuss, but I do not want to take up further time. In my opinion, some of these after-war problems we have got to consider and to discuss in our own countries, and to take part in trying to settle here as well as there. Some of them are mighty difficult of satisfactory solution. There is the difference of distance and environment, there is the difference of climate, there is the difference of qualities, there is the difference of trade competitions, there is the difference of conditions existing in this Old Country in many ways that many of us are not familiar with. All these varying conditions come up in connection with these problems, and I come back to what I have said before: I believe there is only one way out of it, and that is that some practical scheme of inter-Imperial preference and pro-British policy must be established, and that there should be a recognition by the whole lot of us of these very important conditions in some other countries—not enemy countries; I would be as drastic against them as it is possible to be. It seems to me that you cannot deal with this thing piecemeal. You cannot piecemeal a great and comprehensive policy. You may grip one part by the throat and put it down, but you have not settled upon the policy that is going to be valuable to the whole Empire. I, for my part, am one of those who never want to see again reverted to the trade conditions which existed prior to the war. I want to see our Empire helped, and helped by a well-thought-out policy in such a way that you can absolutely build up a great trade upon it. That is not going to be done easily—it is going to be a very difficult problem. I have made these remarks because I want to state my views, and also to elucidate information upon some of the points to which I have referred.

Mr. COOK: Mr. Long, it appears to me we are not getting very much "forrarder" in the solution of this very troublesome question of keeping trade within the Empire as far as possible. At the present time the Empire cannot supply all the meat which it wants, and it seems to me that that fact has largely coloured this Report, which I admit is a very able one—and really it is from that point of view that one should set out to study this question. There is no possibility that at any time in the immediate future the Empire can be self-supporting as to its meat supplies, and necessarily a large portion of the Report is taken up with possibilities in other directions.

Mr. MASSEY: There is really no motion before the Conference.

Mr. COOK: I desire to put one.

CHAIRMAN: Oh, yes, there is a resolution before us.

Mr. COOK: I have been trying my hand at one, Mr. Long. The position is this. So far as the Dominions are concerned—speaking for Australia, and I think I may speak for New Zealand in this respect—all the surplus meat we have we can dispose of to you very readily. I do not know whether very much New Zealand meat is going to other countries. I do not think very much of ours is. A little, I think, goes to Canada in the shape of mutton and lamb, but on the whole the bulk of the meat that we send out find its way to places within the Empire, so that in that respect there is not very much trouble so far as we are concerned. The great point is that we want to develop the resources of the Empire in many directions, so as to make the Empire as far as possible independent of these outside sources. The moment the Empire is independent of these outside sources, the various constituents of the Empire can quite readily, it seems to me, protect themselves from the depredations of these sinister Trusts. But this Report deals principally with the point of view of supplies of meat from countries other than those within the Empire. I have not yet heard any suggestions that we have made for the development of the resources of the Empire. I have no doubt in my mind that we could duplicate and triplicate the meat supplies of the Empire. We have the virgin country and the grazing resources, and they could be developed in many ways. This Report does not help us very much in that matter. All its very able outlook is directed to other countries than our own, and with all respect, I do not know that it is our prime function here to develop the meat resources of other countries outside the Empire. Our prime consideration should be to turn our attention to our own Empire and its resources, and see how they can be more fully exploited with the view of meeting the demands of the Empire from time to time. When we have done our best we can only supply from Australia and New Zealand 26 per cent. of the beef requirements of Great Britain at present, and 75 per cent. of the mutton and lamb. Five per cent. of the beef comes from Canada. Now, to supply even that we have been, in Australia, overrunning our present capabilities in many ways lately; we have been killing off our breeding stock and exporting them, and it has been a very serious problem for the Government.

Mr. MASSEY: That has not been our experience.

Mr. COOK: It is a question how far that is to be allowed to continue. The present world's demand has stimulated export and prices until we have actually decreased our stocks in Australia in recent years.

Mr. MASSEY: Cattle or sheep?

Mr. COOK: I am not sure I would not be correct in saying both. As to sheep, it is correct that we have exported more than we have bred.

Mr. MASSEY: You have had very serious droughts during the war?

Mr. COOK: Drought comes in, of course, but I do not know that that is altogether relevant to the point I am making. The point is that even in an ordinary normal year there is a tendency to export more than we have produced within that year, and our prices have gone up locally until to-day they are very high. Just now there is a great deal of complaint locally concerning the high prices of meat, as I have no doubt there is in New Zealand and elsewhere, so that what we have to do is to confine our attention to stimulating the resources of the Empire to grow two head of cattle where one grows now, and two sheep where one is now produced. This Report does not help us very much in that direction beyond saying that we are to get priority for the supply of railway and other material and plant from the United Kingdom, and suggesting veterinary examination of cattle, and the acceptance of veterinary examination of cattle from Canada at the port of shipment. That is practically all it says, and the rest is taken up with the development of the British requirements from other countries outside the Empire. It seems to me, therefore, that this Report from that point of view is a very able one, and while it does suggest problems with which we are not intimately concerned, at the same time it suggests where the real difficulty is after all. We have not enough meat within the Empire to supply the requirements of the Empire. That is the thing to keep in mind in considering what we are going to do. Now this Report makes some proposals that we may very well agree with—some very valuable suggestions—and it makes others of doubtful value. For instance, it is suggested that we can go into business ourselves, and that we should have butchers' shops of our own, and kill and freeze and store our own meat (paragraph 40) "as a means of checking costs and prices, " and also, on occasion, of countering monopolistic manoeuvres." Well, it has always seemed to me that we can control anything if we control the point of export, and we can do that in our own Dominions. I admit the menace of those Trusts: they need watching. We have had several Commissions already in Australia, and they have all reported so far that they do not find these Trusts to be predatory in any way. I suppose in Australia, as in the case of other countries, they are treating us very well just now; what they will do hereafter remains to be seen. But I do not see, with our present form of Government and our direct control of export in Australia, that the Trusts can attain the same sinister dimensions as they have done in some other countries in the world. However that may be, I think we should take this Report for what it is worth, Mr. Long, and look at its suggestions from our own point of view, as you will look at them from the point of view of the Imperial Government. We are sellers of meat, you are buyers of meat, and your point of view in that respect is different from ours. But we may agree, I think, unanimously that, in so far as we can develop the latent meat-producing resources of the Empire,

we should do so, even if it costs the Empire something to do it. That should be our aim and our object.

Something has been said about Imperial preferences. That, again, is a desirable object, but Imperial preferences become more difficult as our Allies in this very tragic war multiply. And the position differs very materially now that America is in the war as our Ally, instead of standing out as she did two years ago. She is in a different relation. That is why I made that suggestion to Sir Joseph Ward. The Resolution of last year was framed, I think, at the time when America was not our Ally. If it had been framed now, it might have been couched in different terms. If we evolve a scheme, we shall find it a matter of infinite difficulty and complexity, and I think all the Conference can do is to lay down a general principle that it is desirable to develop the resources of the Empire as far as possible, and take that as a guiding principle, and read the Report to find how far it is possible to proceed along those lines, consistent with the immediate and present requirements of the Empire as a whole. And I would suggest some such resolution as this—it seems to me we could all agree so far as this, and that there is nothing inconsistent between the Report and this: "That the Conference welcomes"—I am following some of the verbiage of the motion which you have submitted, sir—"co-operation among " the Governments of the Empire to ensure that the Empire shall become as far as " possible self-sufficing in the matter of meat supplies, and recommends the " examination by the Governments concerned of the Report of the Committee upon " Imperial Meat Resources, and the adoption of such legislative and administrative " measures as are required to secure the object in view." There we keep the ideal in view, and we say that so far as we can we will do so. More than that I do not think this Conference can commit itself to at present.

CHAIRMAN: We had better have that resolution copied.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: That resolution to which you refer, Mr. Cook, was carried after America came in.

Mr. COOK: Yes, you are right—just afterwards.

Mr. MASSEY: Nothing in the resolution of last year is at all antagonistic to the United States as a nation—not at all. What was done was with the object of protecting us from the meat trusts of the United States, and the Government of the United States have had to take certain steps to protect their own country from their operations.

Mr. COOK: I have no doubt we shall have to protect ourselves from meat trusts and other trusts too.

Mr. BURTON: May I look at the suggested resolution?

CHAIRMAN: I have had it sent out to be copied.

Mr. BURTON: What strikes me about the discussion of the whole of this matter is that if we are going into the details of a Report like this, and are going to discuss its various aspects, then in the first place I am afraid we shall never finish our business. This, like some of the other matters that have come before us, can only be dealt with by this Conference in a businesslike way if we take the principles which are contained in these documents and deal with them. Now I made a few remarks the other day when we discussed this before, in which I said that I found in the recommendations of the Committee several things that were undoubtedly very good from South Africa's point of view in connection with the meat export trade, and that I was quite prepared, without committing myself to all the recommendations, to say that the report was of such a nature that one could adopt the proposed resolution of the President of the Board of Trade. But if we are going to discuss all the details of these reports, then I, and probably Mr. Meighen, and some of the rest of us, would like to go into these details too.

On behalf of South Africa there are certain things which, in consonance with the line I have taken on other matters, I would have to go into on this as well. I am sure the President of the Board of Trade and members of the Conference know what I am referring to. There are things there with regard to regulation by legislation, and that sort of thing, which would be subject to exactly the same criticism as has been directed against the imports and exports proposals generally. And there are other things which are also open, I think, to very considerable objection. But my willingness to accept the draft resolution was on the basis that we were going to discuss this thing merely as a whole, not committing ourselves to any details upon it, but merely taking the idea of the whole thing and saying "We will look into this and do what we can," and unless we act on that, I am perfectly certain we shall never finish this subject, and shall not finish some of the others. This Report is full of detailed matters of the greatest possible importance and of very considerable complication, so that I think we should be doing well if we were to say now that we are prepared to go into these recommendations and see what can be done in the direction which we all think a right one to aim at, namely, this proposal to make the Empire self-sufficing in the matter of meat supplies as far as possible. I am inclined to think now that Mr. Cook's amendment is better than the original resolution.

CHAIRMAN: We shall have to withdraw the other resolution and substitute this one, I think.

Mr. BURTON: I am inclined to think that, perhaps, on the whole the wording of Mr. Cook's amendment is better, because he takes out what might be misunderstood if we were to agree to it, namely, the words "on the lines recommended by the Committee." He takes that out. I am afraid I rather committed myself the other day in saying I was prepared to agree on the general lines, but I meant that in the most general sense. Perhaps it would be better to say, as Mr. Cook does, "That the Conference welcomes co-operation among the Governments of the Empire to ensure that the Empire shall become, as far as possible, self-sufficing in the matter of meat supplies, and recommends the examination by the Governments concerned of the Report of the Committee upon Imperial Meat Resources, and the adoption of such legislative and administrative measures as are required to secure the object in view."

CHAIRMAN: Perhaps I had better put it to the Conference before we discuss it further. The original resolution was "That the Conference welcomes co-operation among the Governments of the Empire on the general lines recommended by the Committee on Imperial Meat Resources, to ensure that the Empire shall become, as far as possible, self-sufficing in the matter of meat supplies, and recommends the detailed examination by the Governments concerned of the legislative and administrative measures required for this purpose." Then the Prime Minister of Newfoundland proposed to amend that by the omission of certain words and the insertion of others. Mr. Cook now proposes to substitute a different resolution. The most convenient course for the Conference to adopt, if it so pleases, would, it seems to me, be to withdraw the original resolution and substitute the one now before them. I think that would be better than going through a process of amendment. It will take a great deal of amending to bring the original resolution into line with this new one.

Mr. LLOYD: The last phrase in Mr. Cook's resolution says "and recommends the examination by the Governments concerned of the Report of the Committee upon Imperial Meat Resources and the adoption of such legislative and administrative measures as are required to secure the object in view." What object?

Mr. COOK: The object of making the Empire, as far as possible, self-sufficing in the matter of meat supplies.

Mr. LLOYD: That ought to be clear.

Mr. COOK: It is clear.

Mr. LLOYD: Oh, no. There is a recommendation of the Committee not only to make the Empire self-sufficing, but to seek elsewhere other supplies. There are two distinct points.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The last words have no reference at all to the recommendations of the Committee; they only have reference to the object of the recommendations.

Mr. LLOYD: Yes, but that is the point; there are two questions in the recommendation; first, the supply from the Empire, and secondly, the supply outside the Empire.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The object is the one set out in the introduction of the recommendations.

Mr. MASSEY: I do not think there is any doubt, but if it requires to be made clear, do it by all means.

CHAIRMAN: I should have thought it was governed by the previous words.

Mr. LLOYD: It refers to supplies from the Argentine.

Mr. MASSEY: It only recommends an examination of the recommendations. I do not see any objection.

CHAIRMAN: If there is a doubt about it, we can put words in, but I should have thought it was quite clear. The object in view is surely that the Empire shall become as far as possible self-supporting in this matter, and in order to do that it is recommended that certain things shall be done—amongst others, that the Governments shall examine the report and recommendations of the Committee, and then, finally, shall adopt such steps as are necessary to secure the object, namely, the supply of meat.

Mr. MASSEY: If there is any doubt about it, we might strike out the words "and recommends the examination," and so on.

CHAIRMAN: Say "secure that object"; would that make it clear? But I think it is all right as it stands.

Mr. LLOYD: Personally, I prefer the original resolution with the other words struck out. Take the original resolution: "That the Conference welcomes co-operation among the Governments of the Empire to ensure that the Empire shall become as far as possible self-sufficing in the matter of meat supplies, and recommends the detailed examination by the Governments concerned of the legislative and administrative measures required for this purpose." That meets the whole case to my mind.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But that does not go one inch further than the resolution of last year.

Mr. BURTON: Not a bit.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This one of Mr. Cook's does, to this extent—not a very extensive extent, but at all events to this extent—that it recommends to the consideration of the Governments certain definite specific lines which are laid down in the Report.

Mr. COOK: That is so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If this is not to be adopted, you might as well rest on last year's resolution.

Mr. MASSEY: I should be glad to hear whether the President of the Board of Trade has any further remarks to make. I am personally not satisfied with anything that has been proposed. I do not think anything that has been proposed is going to meet the difficulties we are up against. That is my trouble.

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: Mr. Long, I think the object the members of the Meat Conference had in mind in submitting this Report to the Imperial War Conference has been secured. It was not the intention of that Conference that they would prepare a report which would contain definite recommendations after a most exhaustive inquiry—recommendations which this Conference could accept in their entirety. Far from it. We all realised the enormous difficulties involved in the problem, and what we hoped for was that we should be able through this Report to place before this Conference a sufficient amount of information on this matter to form the basis of a discussion, and to secure the keenest possible criticism from every member of the Conference. And I think we had in mind that ultimately the Meat Conference would be asked to meet again, when we should have the benefit of all the criticisms which had been made upon our Report, and, acting upon an instruction from this Conference, take further steps of a more concrete nature from time to time as might be agreed by the respective Governments concerned. I have been hopeful very free criticism, and that we should have the benefit of the criticisms made from myself—because we found it necessary to be very indefinite in what we had to recommend, because it is a very difficult problem—that the Report would secure a

this Conference when we met together again, as I have said, acting upon an instruction from this Conference.

Mr. MASSEY: Before this present Conference adjourns?

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: To take the matter in hand again and to deal with the various aspects of the problem as they arise, with, of course, the consent of the Governments concerned. Take, for instance, the question of control after the War. Obviously that control causes very many difficult questions indeed, and it is very difficult—I think almost impossible—just at this moment, to forecast accurately what the position at the close of the war will be.

There is another point—that owing to the fact that we were not in a position to make definite recommendations, and because the matter is more or less secret, we did not consult with the representatives of the trades and industries affected by the Report. We felt that we had sufficient information available at the time upon which to base certain conclusions; but we did feel that before any definite steps were taken, we should consult with the representatives of the trades affected and hear their views upon the matter. So that, as I have said before, all we hoped to secure by this Report was a very free discussion, realising that it did not contain final recommendations, and that the Conference would agree that it should be referred back again to the Meat Conference for them to go into the matter in more detail—that we should have the benefit of all that has been said during this Conference, and that the Meat Conference should come, in consultation with the respective Governments, to some more definite decision upon the various aspects of the problem. I sincerely hope that in a matter of this kind, which is of such great importance, and where the interests obviously are sometimes in conflict, the matter will not be allowed to remain where it is. I am fully convinced—and I think I speak here with the authority of the Ministry of Food as well—that if the matter is referred back again to the Meat Conference, we shall be able to submit propositions which will, I think, be beneficial to the Empire as a whole. Of course, we felt it desirable that we should place before the Conference all the different aspects of the problem—certainly that part which deals with South America. We realised that for a time at least the Empire could not be self-supporting, and that we must continue for some time—that is, that the United Kingdom must continue for some time—to draw meat from South America, and that for us to fail to take steps to protect British interests in South America, and to leave that vast field to be exploited by the American Beef Trusts, would be a mistake—a mistake not only in the interests of the United Kingdom, but a mistake in the interests of the Empire as a whole, consumer as well as producer. But if we can protect our interests there and indicate to the American interests that the British Government is backing those enterprises and is not willing that they should be frozen out, we are hopeful that we shall be able to come to some arrangements which will be generally beneficial. I think it would be, from all points of view, a great advantage if the Meat Conference could be continued, so that all the Governments of the Empire would have a complete knowledge of all that is going on from time to time, and that we should come to a common understanding on any question of policy which may be raised for discussion. I feel that the machinery of the Meat Conference will be a better way of dealing with it.

There are some points which have been raised during the discussion, some of which are questions of considerable importance, but still, perhaps, more of detail than of general principle; and those perhaps could be answered better by the representatives of the Ministry of Food, and by Sir Thomas Robinson, than by myself.

Mr. MASSEY: With regard to the difference between the price at which meat is landed and the price at which it is sold here?

CHAIRMAN: Mr. Clynes will deal with that.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Might I ask, Sir Albert Stanley, in regard to this reference that is to be made, which seems to be a good idea, would it be possible for the Meat Conference, when it comes back, to show us how you are going to control the American Meat Trusts? When the sale and control of the oversea meat is taken out of the hands of the growers, and the American Meat Trusts are let loose to do what they like, does not that give them stronger powers against our interests than they have at present?

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: Well, I should be very hopeful, Sir Joseph, that that was one of the very first points the Meat Conference would take up, and that they would, having a knowledge of the views of the members of this Conference, be able to come to some definite conclusions.

Mr. MASSEY: I think every member of the Conference who has spoken has pointed out the weakness of that proposal—that it would never do to allow the American Meat Trusts a free hand in British markets while meat from the Oversea Dominions is controlled.

CHAIRMAN: Mr. Clynes will answer the specific questions.

Mr. CLYNES: I think there is only one point, Mr. Long, upon which I can give any information, and before giving it, I will ask members of the Conference to agree with me that a system of individual rationing of meat presupposes that the individual consumers cannot get exactly the article which they would like to have for the money which they pay. It is a pooling of interests and of chances, and what we do, having to pay different prices for meat in different parts of the world, is to try to sell collectively the meat we obtain at the one price to a very varied mass of consumers. The Australasian meat handed over to the Ministry of Food is paid for to the Board of Trade at the uniform price of 10d. a lb. for mutton and lamb.

Mr. MASSEY: By whom?

Mr. CLYNES: By the Ministry of Food. Mutton and lamb are sold by the Ministry of Food at a uniform price of 1s. 1d. per lb., leaving, therefore, a margin of gross profit of 3d.

Mr. MASSEY: An enormous profit.

Mr. CLYNES: It is an enormous profit, but from this profit are deducted such storage and other charges as are incurred, and which would have to be borne in any case even if the trade were done on ordinary private account.

Mr. COOK: Do you make money out of it?

Mr. CLYNES: In one sense we make money. That 3d. a lb. is used by us to equalise the price which we have to pay for more expensive meats obtained from the United States.

Mr. MASSEY: From the trusts?

Mr. CLYNES: It may be from the trusts. If we could get it from quarters apart from the trusts, we should get it there. But they are the source of supply available to us. The consumers demand the meat, and we must get it from wherever we can. With all the shipping and geographical disadvantages with which we are faced we overcome the difficulties as far as we are able to. It is no part of the policy of the Ministry of Food to make profits, so if we do gain upon one section of the trade, which we are compelled to do, it is only because in a sense we are obliged to lose to another section.

Mr. COOK: Do I understand that you pay 10d. to the Board of Trade?

Mr. CLYNES: Yes, and sell to the retailer at 1s. 1d.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Mr. Clynes is, I think, speaking of mutton and lamb only.

Mr. COOK: Is mutton dearer than beef?

Sir JOSEPH WARD: In New Zealand it is 6d. a pound.

Mr. COOK: I was wondering where all this money is going to.

Mr. CLYNES: You are aware of the enormous increase in the price of everything—in storing, in labour, and in transport charges.

Mr. MASSEY: You are in this position—that there will be trouble about it as soon as the producers get to know about this. Speaking of Australia and New Zealand, we are being compelled to take a lower price in order that the people who sell meat to you from America may obtain a very high price. There it is, and I am putting it as mildly as it is possible to do it. Later on, other people will be putting it in very much stronger terms.

Mr. CLYNES: If there is any compulsion operating in that way, I hope I may not be held responsible.

Mr. MASSEY: I do not say that for a moment.

IMPERIAL MEAT SUPPLIES.

[8 July 1918.]

Mr. COOK: The point is this. Our people have been fixing as low a rate as possible so as to give your people meat at a reasonable price, and if they are now to be told that the money which you obtain for this meat—which after all is not sold so cheaply to the people—is used for fattening the Beef Trusts of America, it will be a shock to them.

Mr. CLYNES: On this section of the question I think Sir Albert Stanley can give you more information than I can.

Mr. MASSEY: Just one word from the producer's point of view. We have discussed this repeatedly in New Zealand, and never could see how it was possible to sell the meat at 1s. 1d. or anything like it unless somebody had an enormous profit. It is cleared up to some extent, but the producer in New Zealand has always been under the impression that he sold his meat at a low price so that the consumer in Great Britain might also get it at a low price. Now he will see that he is selling his meat at a low price—very much lower than the ordinary world's price—in order to make up the profits of Trusts. It is a most difficult position for us to be placed in.

Mr. COOK: And moreover there is the profiteer over there.

Mr. MASSEY: His profits are mild compared with these.

Mr. BURTON: You cannot get this meat for less than you pay?

Mr. CLYNES: Certainly not.

Mr. BURTON: Then the only alternative is to pay these gentlemen in New Zealand the same price as the American people. What is the other alternative? If you could get all your mutton and lamb from them at 10d., you would take it, I suppose.

Mr. CLYNES: Yes.

Mr. BURTON: But you cannot; and as they cannot supply you with all you require, you have to get the rest from America.

CHAIRMAN: They have enough meat, but it is a question of tonnage, I understand.

Mr. CLYNES: Largely.

Mr. BURTON: If you had tonnage, New Zealand could supply you with all your mutton and lamb. Then the problem remains the same—that Mr. Clynes must go to America or somewhere else for the balance, and he must pay them the prices they ask. So that to satisfy the conditions of New Zealand, you must pay them the same price as you pay to America.

Mr. MASSEY: I do not think it is fair to pay them less.

Mr. BURTON: What other alternative is there? You must pay them the same price as you pay the American people.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then the American people would make just as much money as before.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Might I ask Mr. Clynes if the policy of the Food Department here is that the average cost of meat from all over the world is pooled?

Mr. CLYNES: Yes.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: And if you are paying a higher price to a country which is not within the British Dominions, then you use the difference between that and the lower price paid to the Dominions to prevent the British Government making a loss upon the higher price?

Mr. CLYNES: Yes.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Well, I only want to say that I am afraid, speaking emphatically, that this information, when it reaches our country, will give rise to what is called a very bad taste in the mouths of our people.

Mr. MASSEY: And in Australia, too, I am afraid.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Because it means that we are selling mutton and lamb at 3d. a lb. less to enable the British Government to pay the American big meat man 3d. a pound more.

8 July 1918.]

IMPERIAL MEAT SUPPLIES.

[7th Day.]

CHAIRMAN: That is how it works out, but is it not also fair to say that by this arrangement the New Zealand and Australian meat producer is enabling the meat consumer in England to get meat at a much less price than otherwise would be possible? Supposing Mr. Burton's alternative were adopted, and the Food Controller paid the same price to New Zealand and Australia as he is paying to the United States of America; then the price to the consumer here would obviously be higher than it is now. I understand your grievance—and it is a very just and proper grievance—is that you have consented to a very much lower price than you could otherwise have obtained, in order that that low price should be the governing factor; whereas the governing factor is not that, but an equalisation of prices in order to avoid loss over the American purchases, and also in order to avoid the consumer here paying upon the higher level of the American prices instead of at a mean arrived at by a process of pooling. You do get part of your object, but not all.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: The position is as you say, with one material alteration, and that is that upon the New Zealand mutton and lamb the price is raised by the Food Department to the extent of 3d. upon the consumer here, and that 3d. is used for the purpose of paying a higher price for American beef—not mutton and lamb.

Mr. CLYNES: There is no objection to that on the part of the consumer, for the reason that the consumer has no choice; he cannot select his particular class of meat, but must take what he can get. Similarly, we have no choice, we are driven to the markets to which we are compelled to go according to shipping opportunities and available meat supplies. Rationing compels us, in short, to do business upon lines totally different from pre-war conditions.

Mr. MASSEY: There is a point which I want cleared up, and which I hope you are going to clear up, if not now, later. You import from America two classes of meat—first, meat which is raised in the Argentine, and within the last twelve months or thereabouts, a large quantity of meat from the United States themselves. So far as the Argentine meat is concerned—and I am clear about this—the meat purchased from the people who control the Argentine market costs as much as the meat from New Zealand and Australia; in some cases we were getting a little more. And the other point is this; I have been told that the meat which came from the United States was very inferior in quality. I want to know whether Mr. Clynes can tell me—I do not expect an answer now, because I know he is new to his present office and I do not want to be unjust—whether any change has taken place in the Argentine meat since the contract with Australia and New Zealand was made, whether they have had their price put up, or whether the increased price is being paid only for the meat from the United States, and that it is there we are called upon to make up the deficiency.

Mr. COOK: This Report says that the export of beef from the United States stopped in 1912.

Mr. CLYNES: I have not at the moment the information myself to enable me to reply to that question. I do not know whether Sir Albert Stanley has.

Mr. MASSEY: Sir Thomas Robinson will remember this—that when the arrangement with New Zealand was being made, especially the second arrangement—the first arrangement was made in 1915, and the second arrangement late in 1916, or early in 1917—we were informed then that the Argentine meat was costing less to the authorities in England than the meat from New Zealand and Australia, especially New Zealand, and that does not square with the statement that has been made to-day. What I wanted to have cleared up is whether the excess price is being paid for the meat which comes from the United States, and whether it is in connection with the deficiency on that meat that the New Zealand and Australian meat is being sold at a higher price in the English market than it otherwise would be. Have I made my meaning clear?

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: Perfectly clear.

Sir THOMAS ROBINSON: The position was that up to the time Mr. Massey speaks of, the civilian meat which was coming into this country from the River Plate was approximately round about the same figure, but when the ships from Australia and New Zealand were withdrawn from that trade and sent to the United States for the conveyance of troops, a certain number of the River Plate steamers were also taken for the same reason; consequently the imports from Australia and New Zealand, and from the River Plate, fell off very considerably. The only means by which that deficiency could be made up was by imports of meat—beef, as a matter of fact—from the United States.

Mr. MASSEY: That was the point I was coming to.

Sir THOMAS ROBINSON: The effect of that additional demand on the price of meat in the United States has been to put it up from about 6d. a pound in November last to about, I think, 1s. 1d. to-day. But while those steamers which were previously engaged in carrying meat from the River Plate and from Australia and New Zealand are engaged in the service of transporting troops across the Atlantic that is the only source from which the Ministry of Food can get their meat.

Mr. MASSEY: I quite follow your answer.

Sir THOMAS ROBINSON: And whenever that position is past, then one would hope there would be something more like equality in price established again.

Mr. COOK: There is a difference as between 6d. and 1s. 1d.

* Sir THOMAS ROBINSON: That is the extent to which the price of beef has risen in the United States between November and June.

Mr. MASSEY: I want to follow that up with another simple question, and it is this. If it was possible to do without this meat from the United States—I am not speaking now of Plate meat—then would it be possible for you to reduce the price to the consumer in Britain?

Sir THOMAS ROBINSON: Well, you see, Mr. Massey, the difficulty is this. We could reduce the price if we did as the Government were doing prior to that arrangement which I am now describing—we could sell the New Zealand and Australian, and part of the Patagonian, meat at a lower price as far as the wholesaler is concerned; but when it gets into the retail shop the public are unable to identify the meat coming from a particular source, and the unscrupulous butcher will sell the whole of the meat at prices equivalent to the higher costs.

Mr. COOK: What is the reason of this increase, Sir Thomas—this huge jump in American meat?

Sir THOMAS ROBINSON: That I am not able to say, I am afraid.

Mr. CALDER: The supplies are not in the United States.

Mr. MASSEY: And they are able to sell the supplies they have at a very high price.

Mr. CALDER: Really that is because there has been a certain amount of economy at home. They have been conserving their food supplies during the last few months, and as a result of that they have certain surplus meat supplies which they are able to send here.

Mr. COOK: At 1s. 1d. It suggests itself to my mind that there is an easy way out of this. Why not get Mr. Hoover to buy the meat over there for you—commandeer it?

Mr. WINTOUR: All the prices are fixed by Mr. Hoover.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I want to put a question to one of the responsible Ministers, Sir Albert Stanley or Mr. Clynes, because I think it ought to go on record for the purpose of enabling us to understand clearly and explain what is a new phase of this very important and difficult question. It is this. Is the increased price which you are using—3d.—made mainly on New Zealand mutton and lamb due to the fact that the necessities of obtaining men from America have required the transfer of refrigerated ships from New Zealand and Australia in order to carry increased numbers of men?

8 July 1918.]

IMPERIAL MEAT SUPPLIES.

[7th Day.]

Mr. CLYNES: As to the shipping aspect precisely, I could not say yes or no. Perhaps Sir Albert Stanley could.

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: I could not, either.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is this for us? Is it not rather for the Board of Trade and the Government than for us?

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I am putting that question because it is only fair to the Dominions concerned that we should know what is the alleged cause, so that we are in possession of all the facts.

CHAIRMAN: I would suggest that that kind of information would be better got if you left it with the President of the Board of Trade. He will have inquiries made and get it for you. He cannot give it you off-hand.

Mr. COOK: I am not sure that it bears directly on this proposal.

Mr. CLYNES: With regard to the point put by Mr. Cook, I think I may say that my information shows that we are buying at the same price in America as the Americans themselves pay for the meat supplied to their own Navy. It is done through our buyers there.

Mr. MASSEY: The remedy is to do without those supplies as quickly as possible, and while I cannot speak from knowledge of the facts, but only from information derived from the newspapers and from statements made to me, my information is that there is more meat in the United Kingdom to-day than there has been at any time since the war commenced. And there is no question that in some of the oversea countries there is more meat—I am speaking more particularly of New Zealand—than at any time since we made the arrangement of 1915. I think the remedy is to do without this high-priced meat if you can.

Mr. CLYNES: I do not quarrel with your remedy, but in the meantime, while we are driven to these extremes, I submit it is not unfair for us to charge our consumers a higher price for one kind of meat in order that there shall be a general average price applying to the whole of the meat, which under a rationing system you must have.

Mr. MASSEY: Yes, but you are making the producer in New Zealand and Australia pay for it.

Mr. CLYNES: No, the consumer here.

Mr. COOK: You can hardly say the producers are made to pay.

Mr. BURTON: I think there is a misconception.

Mr. MASSEY: I think, on the understanding that this matter is to come up again, we might agree to the resolution.

CHAIRMAN: Will you have the resolution as drafted originally, or do you wish that withdrawn and substituted by the one which Mr. Cook has handed in?

Mr. LLOYD: I suggest that we take Mr. Cook's resolution in place of mine, with the words "the object in view" struck out and these words substituted, "to secure such development within the Empire as will secure this object."

CHAIRMAN: Do you object to that, Mr. Cook?

Mr. COOK: No, certainly not.

CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the Conference that the original resolution be withdrawn?

[Agreed.]

CHAIRMAN: Then the resolution now before the Conference is the one moved by Mr. Cook, with this amendment at the end, moved by the Prime Minister of Newfoundland, that the words "the object in view" be struck out, and the words "to secure such development within the Empire as will secure this object" substituted. Is it your pleasure that the resolution, as amended, be adopted?

The resolution was then agreed to in the following terms:—

"The Conference welcomes co-operation among the Governments of the Empire to ensure that the Empire shall become as far as possible self-sufficing in the matter of meat supplies, and recommends the examination by the Governments concerned of the recommendations of the Committee upon Imperial Meat Resources, and the adoption of such legislative and administrative measures as are required for such development within the Empire as will secure this object."

Enemy Debts.

CHAIRMAN: The next item on the agenda is Wool Supplies, which will go to the Sub-Committee on Raw Materials. Then, the next subject is Enemy Debts, and then we have two smaller questions—Imperial Statistical Bureau and Imperial Bureau of Mycology. Shall we go on to deal with Enemy Debts?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Are we ready for the discussion of that?

CHAIRMAN: As far as I know. A memorandum has been circulated for some time.*

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have read the Memorandum, Mr. Long, and I hasten to say that my impressions of it are of a much more favourable character than those I formed of the last one. I think it is an excellently worked-out plan. I think it is fair to each country concerned. It was not quite clear to me at first that each Dominion would have a Clearing House of its own, and be responsible for its own obligations. That matter, however, having been made clear, I think the whole scheme is good, and I have no hesitation in supporting it.

CHAIRMAN: Mr. Meighen has supported the resolution, and has asked no questions. Does any member of the Conference wish to ask questions; if so, Mr. Baldwin is here to answer them?

Mr. STANLEY BALDWIN: I should like to apologise for the absence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had to stay in the House of Commons. And Sir Donald Maclean, the Chairman of the Enemy Debts Committee, waited here for some little time, and had to go back to act as Deputy Chairman this afternoon.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have only this suggestion to make, which is of a very minor character. In the body of the Memorandum it appears that the period of the war is to be taken as excepted in the calculations of the Statute of Limitations. It appears to me that not only the period of the war should be excepted, but also the period subsequent to the war and pending settlement of the claim—that is to say, the whole period from the commencement of hostilities.

Mr. STANLEY BALDWIN: We shall be glad to consider that. What we are most anxious to get to-day is a general approval of the principle, because until we get this settled we cannot mention it to the Allies so as to get them to act together with us. There are many points of detail which have to be worked out and on which you might desire to consult your own Governments.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The principle appears to be sound.

Mr. STANLEY BALDWIN: It has been very carefully considered, and I think it is a good scheme. It makes for expedition, and I think it will ensure debtors getting better results than if they were left to negotiate by themselves.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is very carefully developed, and is an excellent Memorandum.

Sir S. P. SINHA: Speaking for India, I think the scheme will suit us very well. Without it, I am sure we could not recover all the property that we have in enemy territory.

Mr. BURTON: Mr. Baldwin, would you mind telling us how the plan would work out in the detailed execution of it? What about the executive power necessary to get these things paid? What courts will deal with it—any courts?

Mr. STANLEY BALDWIN: It will be a Commission.

Mr. BURTON: I wanted to get at that. You are going to have a Commission. And what about appeal—to whom are you going to appeal? I agree with Mr. Meighen about the scheme generally, but the thing that troubles me is about the final tribunal.

* See page 291.

8 July 1918.]

ENEMY DEBTS.

[7th Day.]

Sir MALCOLM RAMSAY: The proposal is that a special appeal tribunal should be set up by agreement between the belligerents, to which disputed cases would be referred in cases where neither the enemy Clearing Office nor the British Clearing Office were able to come to an agreement. That is developed in paragraphs 30 and following of the Report of the Committee.

Mr. MASSEY: Could you give an illustration of the point?

CHAIRMAN: What the Treasury hope is that the Conference will be good enough to express general approval of their recommendations, including those questions, under head (b) at the end, which may require legislation.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I agree with the principle, and I assume that the reason for the principle which is underlying these proposals is due to the fact that after peace has been proclaimed, and an adjustment requires to take place in connection with the peace terms with the people affected within the different portions of the British Empire, those settlements could not be carried out by the several Governments, but would require to be settled by the British Government on behalf of the whole.

Sir MALCOLM RAMSAY: Yes, that is the proposal.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Well, I take it that with a view to your communicating with the Allies, in order to have an understanding of the basis you are to work upon, that you want approval of this?

Sir MALCOLM RAMSAY: Quite so.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I have read this Memorandum, and it seems to me that the principle is a good one, and so are the proposals to meet the conditions that have arisen.

Mr. BURTON: What I want you to clear up for me is this. Take a disputed claim—I want to understand the procedure. Supposing the recommendation of the Committee is accepted, I want to see how it is going to work. Will the British Government sue its national for a disputed debt alleged to be due to a German subject, and will the German Government sue its national for a disputed debt alleged to be due to a British subject?

Sir MALCOLM RAMSAY: The question whether there is a debt or not will first of all be settled by the Clearing Offices; each party will be heard, and it will be the duty of the Clearing Offices to decide whether there is a debt or not. The German Clearing Office will communicate with the German debtor, hear his case, and decide whether a debt is admitted from the German subject to the British, and vice versa. In cases where the Clearing Offices cannot agree, it is proposed to set up a special tribunal which will adjudicate whether the alleged debt is a good one or not. When that is once settled, either by agreement or by the appeal tribunal, then it will rest with the Clearing Office to take whatever steps may be appropriate in its own country to recover the debt which has been determined to be due.

Mr. BURTON: Then it comes to this—that there is to be this final tribunal, which will deal with cases of that sort. You are going to set up that tribunal.

Sir MALCOLM RAMSAY: That must be so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should like to add this to what I have said. The principle is sound, and I think it has been very well worked out. As to Mr. Burton's point, I think it is right that upon the establishment of a claim the Government should be responsible for collecting the debt. But in Canada civil rights are subject to the jurisdiction of the Provinces, and that affects the whole question of the collection of those debts. I think the recommendation is sound, but our approval of it must be taken in the light of that fact. In so far as the Dominion Government can assist in the working of it out, I do not doubt myself they would be well advised to follow out those lines.

Mr. COOK: Have not you powers in your Constitution which enable you to deal with all matters arising out of the war?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No; that is only under our War Measures Act, which cannot trespass constitutional limitations.

7th Day.]

ENEMY DEBTS.

[8 July 1918.]

Mr. BURTON: We have another little difficulty, which perhaps you will clear up for me.

CHAIRMAN: Sir Donald Maclean is here.

Mr. BURTON: We have an Enemy Trading Act in South Africa, as you have here. We are not quite sure that the provisions of our Act go far enough to prohibit a debtor in the Union from paying his debts in the Union, once peace is an accomplished fact.

Sir DONALD MACLEAN: We should want legislation also.

Mr. BURTON: I suppose you will legislate in such a way in the British Parliament as to make your legislation applicable to all the Dominions as soon as they pass the necessary legislation there. That is how it will work, I take it?

Sir DONALD MACLEAN: That is the idea, yes.

Mr. BURTON: The point I was putting a moment ago was this: I was rather concerned about the British subject who claims to be paid in Germany getting justice from a German court or tribunal of any sort as to this debt of his.

Sir DONALD MACLEAN: Quite so.

Mr. BURTON: But this final appeal court will settle all that?

Sir DONALD MACLEAN: Yes. If the debtor wished to use the courts he could, but he has the option of using the appeal tribunal if there is any difficulty. We had it very present to our minds, of course, what might happen in the German courts.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Is there any power proposed to be taken by which you could pool the amount of indebtedness of German creditors, and hold on to it until they did justice to ours?

Sir DONALD MACLEAN: Yes; that is the principle on which the scheme is founded.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: In the case which Mr. Burton referred to, if the German debtor were to avail himself of unfair decisions in the law courts, is there power to say, "Very well, that is, according to our lights, an unjust decision," and we will hold what is due to German creditors until that has been fairly and "properly treated"?

Sir DONALD MACLEAN: In that case it would come before the appeal tribunal, and the whole matter would be held up until that tribunal—which is assumed to be composed of impartial persons—came to its decision.

Mr. MASSEY: On that point, can you give us any idea of whom the tribunal would consist—because it seems to me it all depends upon that?

Sir DONALD MACLEAN: Well, we did not go very far into that. We simply indicated that this appeal tribunal would be composed of persons who would be agreed between the two Governments.

Mr. MASSEY: The present enemy Governments and the British.

Sir DONALD MACLEAN: Quite.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not suppose you are prepared to give your opinion as to where the balance of obligation lies as between the British Empire and its Dominions and the German Empire?

Sir DONALD MACLEAN: The figures show that we are on the wrong side altogether, except that I may add this—that as far as South Africa is concerned it is in a very favourable position; they hold German assets to an extent I do not know how many times more than the debts they owe to Germany.

Mr. BURTON: Yes. We know we are all right there.

Sir DONALD MACLEAN: And that applies to New Zealand also and to Australia.

Mr. MASSEY: I thought we were all right. We have some very valuable assets.

8 July 1918.]

ENEMY DEBTS.

[7th Day.]

Sir DONALD MACLEAN: The Germans owe us many, many millions more than we owe them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, that is the United Kingdom—but taking the Empire as a whole?

Sir DONALD MACLEAN: Yes, that is still the case, lumping the United Kingdom and all the Dependencies.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As between ourselves (that is, the British Empire) and the German Empire, where would the balance be? Would it be against the British Empire ultimately?

Sir DONALD MACLEAN: Against the Empire in this sense—that the Germans owe us as a whole far more than we owe Germany. In one sense the Germans will be much worse off than we are; in another way we shall be worse off, because they may not be able to pay us.

CHAIRMAN: A resolution has been circulated and is before the Conference.

Mr. MASSEY: I think, after the explanation we have heard, we can agree to it.

CHAIRMAN: Do you wish it read? It is as follows:—

"The Conference having had under consideration the Report of the Enemy Debts Committee, dated 23rd January 1918, and a secret memorandum dealing with returns made in regard to debts and property, expresses general approval of the principles recommended by the Enemy Debts Committee in their Report, dated 23rd January 1918, for the settlement of pre-war debts by Government intervention by means of a clearing scheme, and agrees that in the event of these principles being accepted by the Governments of the Allied Powers, the Governments of the Dominions should appoint delegates to confer in this country with representatives to be appointed by His Majesty's Government as to:—

"(a) Legislation necessary to give effect to the recommendations of the Committee in the event of the same being adopted in whole or in part by arrangements with the enemy Governments made in the Treaty of Peace.

"(b) Questions on which recommendations have been made by the Enemy Debts Committee which will require legislative action in any event."

[The Resolution was then put to the Conference, and carried unanimously.]

Order of Business.

CHAIRMAN: Then about demobilisation. Is not that too big a subject to take now? The other two are minor questions, which we might dispose of.

Mr. MASSEY: With regard to demobilisation, I should like to have a day's notice of its coming on, because I want to prepare something for it.

Mr. MASSEY * * * * If it had come three or four months later, or four or five months earlier, we should have been in very serious difficulties indeed, and I am not sure that we shall not be in very serious difficulties now. [Only last night I had a letter from the Food Control Department in which it was stated, referring to the output of butter and cheese from Australasia—that is, Australia and New Zealand—that the output for the current season would be 104,000 tons; that there would be about 9,000 tons of arrears from last season added to that 104,000 tons, and that the whole of the shipping available for lifting this would not amount to more than 3,000 tons per month. Well, you can see the difficulty we are going to be in—36,000 tons to be lifted out of 113,000 tons. What is going to happen to the balance? That is what we have to face, and I am afraid the people of our country do not understand it yet. But that is the position we are in. Mind you, I am optimistic enough to think that the estimate is a low one, and I hope we shall be able to do as well as we did last season. I am not blaming the Board of Trade, but I am simply stating the fact. If the estimate of the Food Controller's Department is correct, what is going to happen to the two-thirds of the output of our dairy farmers that we shall not be able to ship? I cannot solve the question, or even make a suggestion. And that refers only to the present position.] With regard to the future, when the war comes to an end, &c., &c.

The part in [] was omitted from p. 110 of [Cd. 9177].)

Sir JOSEPH MACLAY: I entirely approve of one Board. I think it would be a mistake to have two. I think there would be no difficulty in dealing with it. [Perhaps I may say that the shipping position a few months ago was serious in the extreme. In order to bring troops from the United States it became necessary to use shipping usually engaged in distant trades in order to carry those men. That policy has been successful, and this month I think, between American tonnage and our own tonnage, something like 300,000 men will be brought over.

CHAIRMAN: That is only from the United States of America; that is in addition to the men from other parts?

Sir JOSEPH MACLAY: Yes; I am speaking of the United States of America, and not including Colonies. In July, as I have said, we expect to bring 300,000 men from the United States. Tonnage has been provided for that. It was felt by the War Cabinet that was the one important thing—to bring men over as speedily as possible. I think it may be said that the shipping position is improving somewhat, and we are not unhopeful that before the year goes out we may be able to divert a few of the ships which usually run in the New Zealand trade back to their own proper work.

Mr. MASSEY: I hope they will not be a few?

Sir JOSEPH MACLAY: You may be sure the best will be done, as far as the Shipping Ministry is concerned. The question is constantly in front of us, and we are entirely sympathetic with what has been said here.

Mr. BURTON: I hope that applies also to South Africa.

Sir JOSEPH MACLAY: It applies all round.

9th Day.]

SHIPPING.

[11 July 1918.]

Mr. BURTON: You mentioned only two places.

Sir JOSEPH MACLAY: I do not want to put it too high, because we do not know what may happen, but there is reason to anticipate better things, and by next year, if the shipping improves, then 1919 should be better than 1918.

CHAIRMAN: I can answer for it of my own knowledge that Sir Joseph Maclay has underrated the continuous efforts of the Ministry of Shipping to meet these difficulties, and really it has been the case that one overwhelming demand has followed another. First of all, it was the absolute necessities of life, and then came this pressing necessity, which everybody round the table knows and understands without my enlarging upon it, of bringing over American troops with as little delay as possible. And I may venture to remind the Conference that Sir Joseph Maclay comes from a country which is distinguished for its caution, and therefore we may fully hope that we shall realise all that he has indicated to us.

Mr. HUGHES: I had forgotten that. I was going to say it was one of the most depressing statements I have ever heard in my life, but I begin to see daylight.

Sir JOSEPH MACLAY: Of course, it must be realised that we have not only to keep our own country supplied, but also France, Italy and Russia. The pressure has been, beyond words, tremendous, and if you gentlemen take time to read the document which we submitted to the Imperial War Cabinet, I think you will find there exceedingly interesting data as to what the difficulties with regard to the shipping have been. You can easily judge from that document what has been the state of matters.

Mr. MASSEY: We understand the difficulties thoroughly, and I may tell you I quite appreciate all the work which has been done by the Ministry of Shipping.

Mr. HUGHES: Are you referring to the new construction, or to ships already afloat?

Sir JOSEPH MACLAY: Both.

Mr. HUGHES: May I put this to you? When I was in America some little time ago there was a good deal of optimism with regard to the number of ships they could build there. I do not know whether you have any information about that, but it would never do for us to tell the people of Australia merely what you have said without some qualification or addition, because we have there a position which has to be met. I admit that it may be met not necessarily by shipping; it may be a question of finance; but somehow it has to be met.

Mr. MASSEY: The difficulty both with you and me is this. We are up against the new season and our stores are full, and while it is a very good thing to hear of these ships which are being built—because, though they are not New Zealand ships, they may be able to release New Zealand ships which are being used for another purpose—still, it is the coming season that is the trouble. I have mentioned butter and cheese. We have to-day in the stores of New Zealand 5,000,000 carcasses of meat. The stores are filled to the doors, and we are commencing the new season in six weeks. That is the trouble.

Mr. HUGHES: It would be an interesting thing to know where all the refrigerating tonnage at the disposal of Britain is, and what it is doing. We have been told something about fetching troops from America. I do not think that will dispose of the whole matter.

Sir JOSEPH MACLAY: You have to keep in mind that we are bringing enormous quantities of meat from the River Plate. We can bring in two cargoes easily as compared with one from New Zealand and Australia, and it has been an absolute necessity to bring the imports required from the nearest point. I hope before you go, Mr. Hughes, you will favour us with a visit, and we will show you the figures.

Mr. HUGHES: Yes, I will. I will not go until you do.

Sir JOSEPH MACLAY: The Americans tell us that as far as they are concerned they will have no tonnage to spare this year, and we do not think they will. That is their position. I thought I was giving rather a hopeful than a pessimistic impression altogether. The impression I wanted to convey is that on the whole the position is not so bad, and we hope we shall soon be able to give the relief in the direction of which Mr. Massey speaks.

11 July 1918.]

SHIPPING.

[9th Day.]

Mr. HUGHES: How many ships of ours have the French got?

Sir JOSEPH MACLAY: They have nearly 100 large steamers running in general trades. Those are under their special cognisance, but we are carrying enormous quantities outside those. They have in addition a large fleet of small ships. We are dealing more and more at the present day with supplies rather than with ships: we undertake to convey certain quantities to France, trying to keep the control of the shipping in our own hands. In the early days of the war, the French got a certain tonnage allocated to them, which was a mistake, but it had to be done. We are gradually getting them back.

CHAIRMAN: Would it not be better to put all this more fully before Mr. Hughes when he visits the Shipping Ministry?

Mr. HUGHES: Yes. This is a matter which Mr. Massey and I are extremely anxious about, because if we do not find a remedy we shall be in a bad way. We are committed in Australia, so far as butter is concerned, to an advance of 6,000,000% to 9,000,000%; we have advanced that for the butter there, and it will not probably be merely one-tenth or one-sixth, but putting it moderately, three-fourths of that will not get away. That is what it looks like if what Mr. Massey says is correct.

Mr. MASSEY: These are official figures which have been supplied to me.]

Mr. BURTON: Is your Resolution intended to deal with the existing state of affairs?

CHAIRMAN: That concludes the business for to-day. About Monday there is some little difficulty. We cannot take then the question of Naval Defence. The Minister of the Naval Service in Canada and the Minister of Militia are both going to France, and will not be back until the end of next week, and the Naval question we cannot take. Demobilisation also we cannot take until they are back.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We can dispose of all other subjects.

CHAIRMAN: We have gone more rapidly than it looked as if we would be going at one time. We have dealt with meat supplies, wool supplies, and enemy debts. Demobilisation we cannot take. Dyes we have dealt with. Settlement of ex-Service men we can take very well.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, we can take that.

CHAIRMAN: We will take that on Monday.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What about to-morrow?

CHAIRMAN: To-morrow is the Cabinet.

Mr. LLOYD: It is all very well for these gentlemen to be pressing on like this, but we are not all in the same position. They have three or four members present and can split up the work, but in the case of Newfoundland one person has to attend all the meetings, and with such dispatch it is impossible.

CHAIRMAN: What does this imply?

Mr. LLOYD: Rushing the work. It is not possible for one man to attend to it. It is all right for Canada.

CHAIRMAN: There is no question of rushing.

Mr. LLOYD: It is rushing.

CHAIRMAN: To-day is Thursday, and that leaves us till next Monday.

Mr. LLOYD: The point is with regard to to-morrow.

CHAIRMAN: Oh, no.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I referred to to-morrow.

CHAIRMAN: That is a mistake. There is no question of rushing. Ex-Service men we will take on Monday. The alien shipping question goes to the same Committee.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not settled. It is raised by the Government of India.

Sir S. P. SINHA: It was for a different Committee.

CHAIRMAN: If it is not to be considered by the Committee which is appointed we will take it on Monday.

Sir S. P. SINHA: That depends on what you will refer to the Committee appointed to-day.

CHAIRMAN: It is an Indian question, and it is for you to say. We do not know about the motion.

Sir S. P. SINHA: I am afraid I am not prepared to put it forward on Monday.

CHAIRMAN: Cable facilities we can take for Monday.

Mr. BURTON: How much have we left, Mr. Long?

CHAIRMAN: We have not a great deal now, you know.

Mr. BURTON: I am very glad to hear it.

CHAIRMAN: We have two big questions, the Admiralty Memorandum and the Pacific question. We cannot take them on Monday. Then there is demobilisation. Medals we can take, I should think, on Monday. Then there are two questions which come from Australia—the Constitution of the Privy Council and Channels of Communication. But we have no Resolutions about them. Notice is given by the Prime Minister.

Mr. COOK: I will see about them.

CHAIRMAN: Do you think we could put them down for Monday? We have probably got enough.

Mr. BURTON: If I may suggest, I think you had better not put that down for Monday.

CHAIRMAN: On Wednesday we could take these other questions, and then there is reciprocity between India and the Dominions. That is an Indian question.

Sir S. P. SINHA: That is, I understood, fixed for Friday next—to-morrow week.

CHAIRMAN: Yes, to-morrow week. Then, unless we have some fresh Resolutions handed in, we ought to be able to get through, not next week, but certainly the week after. We cannot do so until the week after, because we have these naval questions which must await the return of the Ministers.

TENTH DAY.

Monday, 15th July 1918.

THE IMPERIAL WAR CONFERENCE MET AT THE COLONIAL OFFICE AT 11.45 A.M.

Central Emigration Authority.

(See pp. 123–125 of [Cd. 9177].)

Order of Business.

CHAIRMAN: The next question is with you, Mr. Meighen—cable facilities.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We suggest that that stand for the present, for the reason that it may be possible to get along without the Conference taking it up at all, unless the representatives of other Dominions wish to do so. It might be dealt with merely by conference with the British Government. So far as we are concerned, Mr. Rowell has that chiefly in hand, and he will be at the Conference on Wednesday, or this afternoon.

CHAIRMAN: You will not be here?

Mr. BURTON: We may not require to be here this afternoon.

Mr. COOK: We are cleaning the slate.

CHAIRMAN: You are a little sanguine, Mr. Burton, I am afraid.

Mr. BURTON: We might make an effort, anyhow.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I hope the matter will come before the Conference, in any case. I have a notice of motion which I brought up for this Conference, and I intend to give notice of motion in regard to it. And in dealing with this matter I want to have considered the motion of which I gave notice last year.

CHAIRMAN: We will take it first at the afternoon sitting.

Mr. COOK: Is there any proposal about this cable matter?

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I give notice of the same motion as last time.

Mr. COOK: What is it?

Sir JOSEPH WARD: It is on the records: "That it is in the highest interests of the Empire that the rates for telegraphic communications between the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, South Africa and India should be further materially reduced. That there is real necessity for improvement in the news service of the Empire and that it is essential that Imperial news should reach the various countries of the Empire through British rather than foreign channels. That in order to ensure generally the cheapest and most secure telegraphic communication between the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, and New Zealand, it is necessary they should co-operate in the provision of a State-owned cable across the Atlantic and a connecting land line from Nova Scotia to Montreal, which should communicate with the line across Canada now leased by the Pacific Cable Board. That it is of vital importance that the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Newfoundland and India should co-operate in the maintenance and further development of a chain of British State-owned high-power wireless stations within the Empire."

Mr. COOK: I have a lurking recollection that I tabled some resolutions on that subject in our own Parliament many years ago.

10th Day.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

[15 July 1918.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: We will take it up this afternoon.

CHAIRMAN: Yes, we will take the cable facilities at this afternoon's meeting. The only other subject on the paper for to-day is medals, which is raised by New Zealand.

Here is a collection of papers which has just been sent to me by the Air Board. Reports of the Civil Aerial Transport Committee, with a print of a summary of these reports. The Air Ministry expresses the hope that it may be possible for the Imperial War Conference to consider them. They are very bulky. I believe—I am taking my information entirely on trust—they involve a great many difficult problems. I rather doubt whether the Conference will care to embark upon all this at so late a stage. It would mean circulating all this material, which would take a long time to read. But if the Conference wishes, I will have it circulated.

Mr. BURTON: That looks a very difficult thing to undertake, in addition to everything else we have got.

Mr. COOK: Could you get a précis prepared on the subject?

CHAIRMAN: There is the material. There is nothing settled yet. I think it is all vague.

Mr. BURTON: Do they suggest we should settle it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no hesitation in committing my colleagues to any amount of work: I shall not be here myself.

[After an Adjournment.]

Mr. ROWELL: Mr. Chairman, you will remember the Resolution passed at the Conference last year in reference to the health of the Dominion troops.* At the opening session of the Conference you reported on the steps which had been taken by your Government to give effect to that Resolution. We would like the matter put on the agenda for consideration of the steps which have been taken to carry out the Resolution.

Mr. HUGHES: What is that?

Mr. ROWELL: The question of the health of the troops—venereal disease. We would like the question put down again, to consider the steps taken by the Imperial Government, pursuant to the Resolution of the last Conference. If there is nothing of more urgent importance, it might go on for Wednesday or Friday.

CHAIRMAN: It can go on, certainly. On Wednesday we have got two Australian Resolutions of yours, Mr. Hughes.

Mr. HUGHES: Yes. I am unable to say whether we can finish them or not, but I am prepared to go on. There are three Resolutions: one dealing with the Pacific, one dealing with Channels of Communication, and one dealing with a Court of Appeal, and I am prepared to take them in any order you like.

CHAIRMAN: Will you take them on Wednesday?

Mr. HUGHES: Yes; subject, of course, to whether there are any extraordinary Imperial War Cabinet meetings.

CHAIRMAN: Yes; subject to that. Then I think we were going on to deal with the Admiralty question as to Naval Defence. Channels of Communication and the Court of Appeal—they would take all day, would they not?

Mr. HUGHES: I should say so; they raise some rather large issues, of course. And they deal with matters of general interest, as well as those matters that are covered by their titles.

* See page xvi. of Dominions No. 62.

15 July 1918.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

[10th Day.]

CHAIRMAN: We could take the health of the troops on Friday, Mr. Rowell.

Mr. ROWELL: That would be quite satisfactory.

CHAIRMAN: Venereal diseases will be put down first for Friday. We can get the War Office people over. Sir Joseph Ward has got the next Resolution: it is one he gave notice of last year, but he is not yet here.

Mr. HUGHES: I think if we were to refer it to a Committee we should arrive at one stroke at what we should come to after half an hour's discussion.

Medals.

CHAIRMAN: We can take medals, if you like, and postpone the other matter.

Mr. ROWELL: We will take that, Mr. Long—medals.

Mr. MONTAGU: Is this medal question raised by New Zealand?

CHAIRMAN: They are very much interested in it.

Mr. COOK: Is there anything fresh about these medals?

CHAIRMAN: The War Office have got some fresh proposals to make. This topic was fixed for a quarter to four. The whole question is as to whether there is to be a medal for the Gallipoli campaign, or whether there should be a general medal, with a clasp for Gallipoli. That is really the whole thing, and there has been some difference of opinion.

Mr. HUGHES: Of course, we are very much concerned with that. I do not know what their idea is. Shortly, my idea is, that the Gallipoli campaign falls, as far as Australia is concerned, into the same order as the campaign carried out by the British Expeditionary Force, but is sufficiently distinct from it to have some claims to separate treatment. As to whether those claims are strong enough to warrant a separate medal, is another thing. It is clear and distinct for us.

Mr. ROWELL: It is undoubtedly a distinct campaign, but I understood the view of the Conference last year was that one common medal for those who had served in any theatre of war would be better than separate medals for the various theatres.

CHAIRMAN: With bars for the different great battles.

Mr. COOK: Did you do that with regard to the first Expeditionary Force?

CHAIRMAN: Are you speaking of the 1914 star?

Mr. COOK: Yes.

CHAIRMAN: That stands by itself. Those who were serving then have a special star, not a medal. That is for everybody who took part in the 1914 campaign.

Mr. COOK: Anywhere?

CHAIRMAN: Anywhere. But this is the old question, I understand, of whether you are to grant a medal or a clasp for a campaign which does not succeed. That has been, apparently, contrary to the rule of the War Office always. And last year the discussion turned upon whether there was to be a medal, as Mr. Rowell has said, for the whole campaign, with clasps for the different battles.

Mr. HUGHES: Of course the War Office must have some regard for circumstances. There is no hard-and-fast rule to lay down: they themselves, if there is, have broken it. But in this Gallipoli campaign the Anzacs first made their appearance as such, and we attach tremendous importance to it. It was really an epoch-making event in our history. And, without wishing to draw distinctions between that campaign and others, and admitting that the scope of the operations and the number of men employed are not to be compared for one moment with the operations in France, yet, on the other hand, Agincourt and Crecy are small things on that ground: the whole question is what they stand for. This decoration symbolises a certain definite expression of national action and thought.

10th Day.]

MEDALS.

[15 July 1918.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: If you adopt the medal and bar, and distinguish the Gallipoli campaign in that way, you do not intend to have any bars in respect to the other special campaigns, do you?

CHAIRMAN: I understand they will have bars for special campaigns, like the campaign of the Somme—certain things which stood out. But I do not think they have decided yet whether they will have one for each big offensive. For instance, there is the one started this morning.

Mr. HUGHES: I think there is no doubt whatever that if bars are to be granted at all, under any circumstances a bar will be given for Gallipoli—for the Dardanelles. There is no question about that. The question is whether there should be a bar or a separate distinction.

CHAIRMAN: Yes, that is right.

Mr. HUGHES: I am for a separate distinction in this case, for the reasons I have shortly set out. But, of course, the War Office has to be considered. On the other hand, the feelings of the people of Australia and New Zealand have to be considered.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But the Conference last year discussed and passed a Resolution upon it, and would we not have to reverse our decision?

Mr. HUGHES: Australia was not present.

CHAIRMAN: There was no Resolution last year, was there?

Mr. ROWELL: Our position was stated very clearly by Sir Robert Borden last year on page 233 of the Confidential Report of the Conference.* This is the way Sir Robert put our position: "I would like to say that the forces of every Oversea Dominion will feel it very keenly if a clasp is given for one particular theatre, or a series of engagements in a particular theatre, and no similar recognition is given to them for their services in other theatres. I would strongly deprecate any such course as that." In other words, all the overseas troops have, in their respective theatres of war, contributed to the success of the Allied cause, and there should be equal recognition of all overseas troops, whatever form it takes.

Mr. LLOYD: How is that to be done? Take the case of Australia, New Zealand and Newfoundland. Their particular theatre was in Gallipoli, and they want a separate distinction for that.

Mr. ROWELL: Their proposal was for a separate medal.

Mr. LLOYD: Is not that discriminating against those who did not happen to be in the particular theatre?

Mr. ROWELL: They say no.

Mr. HUGHES: What was the proposal?

Mr. ROWELL: Their proposal was for a separate medal, and Sir Robert Borden's view was that to give a medal for a particular theatre of war, without a similar recognition to other Dominion troops who had taken part in another theatre of war, would be likely to provoke dissatisfaction, and that the only basis on which we could proceed would be to recognise all the Dominion troops on the same basis—whatever principle was applied to one should also be applied to the other. That was the point.

Mr. HUGHES: But before you can apply a general principle like that, there must be an analogy in the circumstances. Take the Canadian troops, and compare them with those of Australia. What are the circumstances of the Canadian troops? That they have fought on the mainland of France and Flanders. The Australian troops have fought in France and Flanders, but they have fought in Gallipoli. And I think if you were to say the troops engaged in East and West Africa are not to have a medal for that particular campaign, there would be dissatisfaction. I cannot see how there would be any dissatisfaction caused in Canada by granting a special medal for East and West Africa to a man who also took part subsequently in battles in France and Flanders. The circumstances are quite distinct.

* Dominions No. 52.

MEDALS.

[10th Day.]

246

Mr. MEIGHEN: He could have two bars to the medal, of course. Are you going to have a separate medal for each theatre of war?

Mr. HUGHES: I say you must have regard to the circumstances, and you must have regard to our feelings in the matter of Gallipoli.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of course we should.

Mr. HUGHES: Frankly, I do not recognise the right of the War Office, or of any other Dominions, to say whether we shall grant a medal or not. I do not mind discussing it with you, but we shall grant a medal, or not, as we think fit. Now I come down to the merits. You have to consider the circumstances under which the Gallipoli campaign took place, and, as I tried to point out before, it really marked the birth of a nation, and this Anzac spirit has been responsible for the continuous flow of troops from the two Dominions. Had it not been for the Gallipoli campaign, I think that our operations would have been merged in so many others that probably we should not have been able to appeal to the national sentiment of Australia and New Zealand so strongly as we did when we were conducting a campaign of, relatively, minor character. Now, you have to consider. You give a medal not merely as a recognition of individual valour, but with regard for its effects upon the morale of a nation and the national life. And for that reason I think there should be a separate medal granted for Gallipoli.

Mr. MONTAGU: Mr. Hughes, may I ask you just one question? Supposing one of your soldiers fought in Gallipoli, was wounded severely in Gallipoli, so that he fought nowhere else, but went home, and you had a separate medal for Gallipoli, would you give him only the Gallipoli medal and no other?

CHAIRMAN: He would have the Great War medal, of course.

Mr. HUGHES: Before you came in, I had asked Mr. Long how the War Office distinguished the Expeditionary Force, and he said it was distinguished with a star. Very well, there you have destroyed your whole rule. You are going to give a medal for the Great War, and you give a medal for Mons—or any other campaign, but Mons will serve for an illustration. Why should not you do it for us?

Mr. COOK: I understood you to say, Mr. Long, that that applied to all the troops.

Sir FREDERICK PONSONBY: Yes, to all the men who were in France before a certain date.

Mr. COOK: Ours as well?

Sir FREDERICK PONSONBY: Yes; but there were no troops there from the Dominions before November 23rd, I think.

Mr. HUGHES: That is a medal issued to the regular soldiers—members of the British Army.

Mr. COOK: That is an invidious distinction to make.

Mr. HUGHES: It is no use saying to Australia, "You were not there till 1915." Of course they were not. The Australian soldier got there as soon as he could. We say, Here is a distinct campaign, sufficiently distinct for the purpose. Australia says, "This is distinctly Anzac, Australia and New Zealand, so distinct" as to make a passionate appeal to our national sentiment. Recognise it." That is all. We shall not quarrel with you if you distinguish in the same way other campaigns, such as those in East and West Africa, in which other Dominions have taken part. Certainly East and West Africa, I think, is such a case. A man may have fought in East and West Africa, and afterwards been transferred to France. Why should he not have a star for the Colonial campaign?

Sir FREDERICK PONSONBY: We went into the point about having a separate medal or star for each campaign, but it so happens that a man might go round and fight in Africa and Palestine, in Mesopotamia, in Gallipoli and France, and he would get those five medals, whereas the man who had been fighting all the time in France, and perhaps harder, would only get one.

10th Day.]

MEDALS.

[15 July 1918.]

Mr. HUGHES: As a matter of fact, I do not think that any man would go round into five theatres of war.

Sir FREDERICK PONSONBY: There are a great many who have been in three, and those men were mostly—

Mr. HUGHES: I am not suggesting that you should give them three medals, or that you should give a medal for a campaign. I am only saying you should symbolise or signalise a great event in a fitting manner. I say you have not a leg to stand on now, since you have given the Mons star. Is it suggested for a moment that the valour and sacrifice of the troops who have followed the British Expeditionary Force is not worthy of similar recognition? There are plenty of men in the British Expeditionary Force who will get two medals or a medal and a star. Why should this recognition be confined to them?

Sir FREDERICK PONSONBY: From your own point of view, do you not think it is rather difficult to give a star to the men who fought in Gallipoli and ignore the men who fought in France lately? They would get only one medal, those who fought in Gallipoli would get two.

Mr. HUGHES: But, Sir, you are not giving these to people who are not quite familiar with the whole circumstances, and just as you give a boy a prize for good conduct as well as for efficiency, say, in botany, and the whole school knows what it is all about, so the whole country would know, and they would say, "Oh, this is a Gallipoli man." We want to know who fought in Gallipoli. We do not want to say their valour is greater. They are the same men in many cases. Those who were in Gallipoli are now in France, except where they have been invalided back. And there are men who have now been fighting for three years and some odd months and have never been back to Australia. Your men are not in that position at all. All such men are recognised; they all have a medal, ours have not.

Sir FREDERICK PONSONBY: You would advocate Gallipoli only being taken, and no other theatre of war?

Mr. HUGHES: I am not suggesting one for Palestine or Mesopotamia; all those are merged with others in the Great War. But this stands out, as it was the arena into which Australia first leapt, and New Zealand, of course, and from that we date our history, if you like to put it so. I think you will be making a mistake, from the standpoint of Empire, if you do not recognise it in that way; but that is a subject for yourselves to consider.

CHAIRMAN: We have present, now, Admiral Everett, representing the Admiralty, and also the Adjutant-General, who will now state what the War Office proposes. I suppose you do not make any definite proposal on behalf of the Admiralty, Admiral Everett?

Admiral EVERETT: No, Sir; we have our own definite standpoint on this.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: Mr. Colonial Secretary, the proposal put forward by Australia and New Zealand in regard to the grant of a medal to their own troops for Gallipoli was considered by the Army Council, and, of course, it is not for the Army Council to make any observations on that; the question is beyond the Army Council entirely. But it was suggested that it would make it easier—because all these medal questions are very difficult when you come really to deal with them—taking it for granted that it is decided it shall be given, it would make it easier if it was given, not for a particular campaign, but for such troops as left the Dominion between certain dates to be arranged; and beyond that the Army Council has not much to say, except that it would be against the whole policy of the Army Council for many, many years, or for the Commander-in-Chief for many years, for British officers and men to be allowed to wear the medal. That, I know, might create a little difficulty. But if it could be arranged that the medal could be given for service between dates, instead of for a particular operation, it would make it easier, because in the case of any British officers or non-commissioned officers who were in the Dominion on those dates as part of the Dominion forces, who started from the Dominions between the dates I have mentioned and who were part of the Dominion forces, any objection, so far as the Army Council was concerned, would be waived.

[10th Day.]

Mr. HUGHES: Are you not really subduing the whole thing to what you work in? Here is a great question. It does not matter what you did before this war. If you put all the wars of the world into the scale, this will outweigh it. It does not matter what you did before, it is what you will do now. You never had the same circumstances. We have an army in the field now—this one Dominion of ours—greater than you ever had in your whole history, except perhaps in South Africa, and then only after some years of war; and you have to consider that national sentiment and national feeling as against some rule or regulation of the Army Council. I submit that you are not to settle the matter in that way, Sir.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: But the Army Council, Mr. Hughes, does not feel that it is for them to say one way or the other.

Mr. HUGHES: That is quite right.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: It is a matter concerning the Australian and New Zealand troops.

Mr. LLOYD: Does the star that has already been given come within that rule, or is it for those who actually took part in the campaign in France?

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: The so-called Mons star—that is, the 1914 star—was given to certain troops between certain dates who took part in certain operations in France and Flanders between those dates.

Mr. LLOYD: Then there is a further qualification that would meet our case and your proposal does not meet it.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: I beg your pardon.

Mr. LLOYD: The second proposal—the suggestion thrown out now—is not in accordance with the principle on which the Mons star was granted.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: Between certain dates.

Mr. LLOYD: But in addition to being within certain dates they were in a particular theatre of war.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: Quite so.

Mr. LLOYD: But then you cut out the theatre of war in this proposal, and simply give the dates alone.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: Quite so; but then the Mons star was really issued in commemoration of certain successful actions by which the enemy was prevented from obtaining definite results. That is really the reason.

Mr. LLOYD: In our case we wish it to be in commemoration of the fact that we, as Newfoundlanders, first took part in the war.

Mr. HUGHES: Yes, I think that is the broad principle now. As to the Mons star, they were all British regular troops who got it.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: Oh, no.

Mr. HUGHES: Who were they?

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: There were a great many Territorials and a great many Indians.

Mr. HUGHES: Very well, I must withdraw that. I do not know who the Colonials were.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: There were Territorials and Indians. They were not all regulars.

Mr. HUGHES: They were mostly regulars.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: I could not say which way the balance went. There were a great many Territorials.

Mr. HUGHES: I think it may be said they were mostly regular soldiers, and it was given in recognition of one particular phase—a glorious phase, but one which in its sphere of operations was trifling compared to that of the Somme or Picardy. But it was the first phase of this war, and it was because it was the first phase, and public attention was directed upon it, that they got this star. That is to say, it was a recognition in England as well as throughout the Empire that the action of these regular soldiers—I emphasise that again, the Regular Army—had been such as to deserve this recognition, and it received it. Very well. Now we turn to Gallipoli. There the Anzacs first made their appearance. Whatever view you have as to their actions, we hold that they too deserve recognition. The sphere of their operations was distinctly limited, and not to be compared for one moment to those operations in which we have had the honour to play our part in common with the other Dominions. But it was distinct. In the Retreat from Mons, at Charleroi, and on the Marne there was only a handful of British troops, but it was not the number—it was the fact that this was the beginning, and that it symbolised something distinct. So it is with us. This Gallipoli campaign does symbolise something—it is the birth of our nation—the entry of Australia into the war—and of that we say there ought to be some distinct recognition. It is not the fact that they fought in the Great War—all are fighting in the Great War—but there are phases in this Great War. This Gallipoli campaign, though it may have been a small thing in comparison, was a great thing from the symbolic point of view—it was a distinctive thing, and no doubt it will be commemorated, when the time comes, by a special star, or it ought to be. If you attempt to settle the matter by saying that all those men who within certain dates were fighting shall have a distinguishing bar, or medal, or star, I think the thing will lose half its significance. Some of our men were in New Guinea at the time that the English were in Gallipoli, but they are not to get one; you say it is only those who happened to be, between certain dates, in a certain place.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: Not in a certain place; no.

Mr. HUGHES: Then why not give it to the troops who were in New Guinea? We were there long before that.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: Quite true, but your New Guinea troops in that case would get the decoration.

Mr. HUGHES: Would they get your decoration? It has nothing to do with dates, sir; the date is a mere accident—an expedient—a device to confine this within narrow limits. But what you have done is to symbolise a great event—an epoch—something that really saved Europe. And why not say so? We have given these men a separate star for it; why not say so? Why bother about whether it will annoy somebody else? It will annoy somebody else if you do not recognise valour when it displays itself.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: But I must say again that the Army Council has nothing to say against, or in criticism of, the giving of a Dominion star, or whatever you may call it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who does decide these things? I am disposed to think there is a great deal of force in Mr. Hughes's contention, that you have utterly destroyed your defence against separate recognition by the recognition of those who served in 1914. You never could follow that principle out. It would never do to follow out the principle of distinction by periods. That would mean nothing at all. It is really arbitrary to start with, and, having done so, you may find it very difficult to defend not having distinctive medals for other campaigns. Canada does not object to that; all that we ask for is that there shall be no distinction of merit.

Mr. LLOYD: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That you do not settle upon one campaign and do for that what you refuse to do for another. Distinguish if you will—distinguish Mons if you will—distinguish Gallipoli if you will; but do not distinguish them from other services, perhaps equally valuable, at all events equally meritorious. All we ask for is the same treatment everywhere.

And while I am on the subject of recognition, how is it that in the Air Service, for example, it is utterly impossible to get any publicity whatever, or any credit given to those who so distinguish themselves in that service? It is not impossible in Germany—they give it freely—but if we attempt to send to our own country the number of aeroplanes that a flight lieutenant has brought down, we are immediately stopped; we are utterly unable to get it through. And it is the same here. Wonderful distinction has been attained, but no particulars are allowed to be given. I have no reason for bringing this in now, except that it is connected with the subject of recognition.

[10th Day.]

Mr. MEIGHEN—cont.

Mr. COOK: It is the same principle.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I notice there are exceptions made here in the case of certain Flight Lieutenants and others in the British service, but the general rule is followed, as far as we are concerned, at all events—we are utterly unable to have credit given for very distinguished services rendered in the Air Service. The censor cuts the despatch up at once—cuts the name right out.

Mr. COOK: It seems to me that, having given a special star for the Mons campaign, no logical mind will deny any other great event the same distinction. And already there is a distinction made amongst our own troops with regard to Gallipoli. For instance, they wear an "A" on the arm by which they can be distinguished, and there is no sort of jealousy amongst the other troops that I know of, on account of that, although the other troops may have done equally valiantly in some other theatre of the war. As has been pointed out, this was our first entry into the war. The sacrifices have been very great, and indeed the whole losses at Gallipoli were terrible. I think it will be found that it was as heroic an adventure as we have had during the whole war. The sickness and deprivations were terrible there. Our men were in the trenches three and four months on end without coming out of them, and altogether the circumstances were in every way peculiar. And there will be very general disappointment if something distinctive does not find a permanent record in the history of this war.

CHAIRMAN: You are advocating now the granting of a medal or decoration by His Majesty's Government apart from anything which may be given by the Dominions?

Mr. COOK: Yes.

[At this point Mr. Massey took his seat at the Conference.]

CHAIRMAN: We have taken this medal question which you raised last year, Mr. Massey. The Adjutant-General has said, on behalf of the War Office, that they do not object to a Dominion medal being issued by the Dominions to their troops; but I understand it is not proposed at present to issue a particular medal for particular incidents.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: The suggestion made was that it would probably be easier from the administrative point of view if the medal, instead of being given for a particular campaign, say, for instance, Gallipoli, were given for all Dominion troops who left their Dominions between certain fixed dates. It is only a suggestion thrown out, and as a matter of fact what was in the back of our minds, I think, was that in that case the Australian troops were concerned in New Guinea, and they would come in. But I understand from Mr. Hughes that that is not the Dominion idea, but that it should be confined to Gallipoli. There is no objection to that on the part of the Army Council. It is not for us to object.

Mr. LLOYD: There is another point to clear up. I may have misunderstood it. Even assuming the Dominion did issue a medal, there is a suggestion that it would not be recognised by the Army Council. I should like that point cleared up.

Mr. COOK: Hear, hear.

Mr. LLOYD: Supposing a soldier was transferred to the Imperial Forces, and he was a Dominion man who had been transferred. Is it possible the Army Council would refuse, or is it suggested that the Army Council would refuse him the right to wear it?

CHAIRMAN: If he earns it, and it is given him, he wears it always.

Mr. COOK: What is the suggestion about these dates? Is it that the War Office issue a medal, or the Dominions?

10th Day.]

MEDALS.

[15 July 1918.]

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: I do not think that was ever up for consideration. The War Office were not in the matter. It had been decided, as I understand, by the Colonial Office, that a special decoration—

CHAIRMAN: It was approved by your Committee, I think.

Sir FREDERICK PONSONBY: No.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: What is the nature of the special decoration?

Mr. COOK: A star for Mons.

Mr. MASSEY: What about Gallipoli? It has never been cleared up, and nobody seems to know exactly what the position is.

CHAIRMAN: That refers to the claim of the Dominions to issue a medal of their own. That is a different question.

Mr. MASSEY: I understand the Dominions cannot issue a decoration of their own without the consent of His Majesty the King, and therefore it becomes official to that extent. We had considerable discussion last year with regard to the proposal that a special decoration should be given to those troops who took part in the Gallipoli campaign, and I do not know how far we have gone, and what the position is to-day. I want to know whether it is being done by the War Office, or partly by the War Office and partly by the Dominions of Australia and New Zealand.

Mr. COOK: That is what I was asking. The Adjutant-General said the War Council had no objection to a medal, or star, or whatever distinguishing mark we like to have, as between two certain dates, but that they did not want it allocated to a particular campaign between certain dates.

Mr. HUGHES: He did not limit it to that. I pressed that point, and the Army Council as such expresses no objection to an issue of a special decoration for Gallipoli. But the Adjutant-General says that it is suggested, as a means of easing the situation, that a decoration should be granted to persons who were fighting between certain dates. I pointed out that that would not be satisfactory.

Mr. MASSEY: That would not do.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: May I clear up the point? The special decoration I was speaking about is this: His Majesty the King has already approved of the issue of one decoration by the two Governments of Australia and New Zealand to those Australians and New Zealanders who left in 1914 and afterwards took part in the operations in Gallipoli. That is what I was speaking about.

Mr. MASSEY: That will not do.

Mr. HUGHES: Nobody did leave in 1914.

Mr. MASSEY: Yes.

Mr. LLOYD: Yes, but they did not get there.

Mr. MASSEY: A large proportion left in 1915, and surely it is a most improper thing for the War Office or anyone else to discriminate between those who left in 1914 and those who left afterwards.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: The War Office had nothing to do with this. It came to them from another Government Department. The Army Council decided that it was not within their province to offer any suggestions or remarks upon this specific award. We did not do it.

Mr. MASSEY: May I ask where it came from?

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: I think it was from the Colonial Office.

Mr. MASSEY: Well, I think the Colonial Office should reconsider it.

Mr. HUGHES: There is only one point—as to whether it should be extended to all Gallipoli men, or only to the 1914 Gallipoli men.

Mr. MASSEY: All Gallipoli men.

Mr. HUGHES: It must cover all Gallipoli men.

Mr. MASSEY: Not only New Zealanders and Australians, but all troops.

Mr. MONTAGU: I hope that is clear.

Mr. HUGHES: Indians too.

15 July 1918.]

MEDALS.

[10th Day.]

Mr. MONTAGU: If the decoration is given for the Gallipoli campaign, it is given to mark the fact that Australians, New Zealanders, and Indians fought side by side with British troops. And surely it would be very unfortunate if the British troops did not get the decoration too.

Mr. HUGHES: I quite agree. That is quite clear. But, Mr. Montagu, this may have a greater meaning for us than it has for the English as such, because they have a tradition going back to the beginning, whereas for us this was the beginning.

Mr. MASSEY: It was the first time that troops from the Southern Hemisphere at all events took part in a European war, and that is why it is so important to us.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Mr. Long, is there a Resolution upon this matter?

Mr. LLOYD: Are there any statements from any Government Departments that we have not yet received on this matter, or have we everything before us?

CHAIRMAN: So far as I know, you have everything before you. The matter is with the War Office. The Colonial Office has nothing to do with medals, and we have taken no part whatever in it. We could not do so. We have no authority to express opinions about decorations, and medals, and so on. We know nothing about the previous practice, and we have no authority. The only part which the Colonial Office has taken in this from the beginning is that we have transmitted telegrams on behalf of other Departments to the Governments concerned, and we have transmitted to the Governments of Australia and New Zealand a telegram, a copy of which I have in my hand, which was brought over here by General Griffiths—who was then, I think [to Mr. Hughes], your General—and was drawn up at the War Office. We had nothing to do with it. We know nothing more about medals than we do about any other military questions, and should not dream of expressing an opinion. I have my own personal opinion, but not as Secretary of State for the Colonies.

Mr. HUGHES: Is that from you to us or from us to you?

CHAIRMAN: From the Secretary of State here.

Mr. HUGHES: What does it say?

CHAIRMAN: It reads as follows:—

“Suggestion that some recognition should be given by Australia and New Zealand to Australians and New Zealanders who left in 1914, and afterwards took part in the operations in Gallipoli, has been given careful consideration. One decoration to be issued by the two Governments. Question has been discussed by Army Council, and, on condition that the decoration is only given to members of the Australian Imperial Force or New Zealand Expeditionary Force, the proposal has their full approval. It has been submitted to His Majesty, who has been graciously pleased to approve. It is the wish of His Majesty that this mark of distinction should take the form of a decoration such as is being given in the case of the British Expeditionary Force of 1914 rather than of a medal. The design and ribbon should be submitted for approval of His Majesty. It should, of course, be quite distinct from any British decoration, past or present. Telegram has been sent to [New Zealand] [Australia] in similar terms.”

This was sent to Australia and New Zealand on 22nd November 1917, and repeated the next day to Canada, South Africa, and Newfoundland, with a request for Ministers' observations.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: May I move a Resolution: “That it is desirable that a special military medal should be awarded to all soldiers who took part in the operations in the Gallipoli Peninsula during the present war, and this Conference respectfully recommends the same for the favourable consideration of His Majesty the King.” It is a recommendation which I suggest should go from the Conference to the King.

This idea of a separate medal being issued to these men does not mean more than what the conduct of the men who took part in that campaign reasonably entitled them to. The argument which has been used that because other interesting campaigns have taken place during the currency of the war, you ought not to make exceptions, is one which there is much to be said for. But there were circumstances connected with the war in Gallipoli of a nature which makes that campaign stand right out, in my opinion, by comparison with the others, and there ought to be a recognition of it, instead of having a split-up system of a star for one, a bar for another, and so forth. From the point of view of the recognition of the services of individuals, it would be infinitely more acceptable. And if all men, British troops and oversea troops, are treated alike, marking the Gallipoli campaign as a special one calling for some special recognition, I fail to see that any objection should be taken to it. And if there are difficulties in the way of providing that medal, surely they ought to be, and should be, overcome. I am sure that if we had an opportunity of conversing with the men concerned, they would infinitely prefer to have a medal coming from the British Government, on behalf of the whole of the British Empire, than having it split up; and I think we ought to stretch out a great deal to meet that feeling, which I am certain exists amongst all the men who took part in the Gallipoli campaign. I think it would be a fair thing for this Conference to recommend to His Majesty the King that he should favourably consider the issuing of a special Gallipoli medal for those who took part in the Gallipoli campaign. I do not want to take up the time of the Conference farther, but I should like very much to see that carried.

MEDALS.

Mr. BURTON: Surely the Conference cannot do anything like this? I have not a word to say in deprecation of the heroism of those who fought at Gallipoli, but heroism and valour have been displayed on every field of this war. How can we pass a Resolution such as this, singling out Gallipoli for special recognition by a medal?

Mr. COOK: They have done it for Mons.

Mr. BURTON: Yes, but Mons is the British Army. We have nothing to do with the Mons star. But we are now sitting here as an Imperial Conference, and Sir Joseph Ward suggests that we should pass a Resolution, as a Conference, that there should be a particular distinction for Gallipoli. I cannot allow that to go for South Africa. Deeds of as great bravery have been performed in South Africa as elsewhere.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Do they not get medals for those?

Mr. BURTON: Not in the way you suggest.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: They will get a British medal.

Mr. BURTON: But what kind of a medal do you want?

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I want a medal commemorating the Gallipoli campaign.

Mr. BURTON: Well, all I can say is, if you are going to distinguish between the Dominions, or between different classes of soldiers, in that way, you will do nothing but create trouble.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Had you any men from South Africa in Gallipoli?

Mr. BURTON: I do not know. I think not. I might just as well say that we must pass a Resolution for special medals for German West and German East Africa. I do not say that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I agree with everything that Mr. Burton has said, except this—that I do think the continuity of the defence is broken very much by the issue of the Mons medal. That opens the door for the provision of other medals of the same kind. But however that may be, and whatever way is found out of the difficulty, I do urge that we should draw no distinction between campaigns. If one campaign is to be distinguished, you must distinguish another; you must carry it right down the line. Otherwise, we would be compelled to go back to Canada, and say, "We supported a Resolution for a special distinction to the soldiers in Gallipoli, but we did not think it worth while to get a special distinction for the Canadians who saved the road to Calais." That would be an absurd, an impossible, and a humiliating position.

15 July 1918.]

MEDALS.

[10th Day.]

CHAIRMAN: I think it would help us if the Adjutant-General were to make a general statement to the Conference, explaining exactly what the position is as regards the whole medal question, inclusive of the proposal that the Dominions give their own. Mr. Meighen has to go now to catch his train, and I am sure you all share the regret which I feel that he has to leave us.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: Fairly early in the war the question of medals came up. It was found that some of the Allies proposed to interchange their medals—that is to say, that France would give so many hundred thousand medals to Russia, and Russia would give so many hundred thousand to France. And the idea was that by pursuing that policy, our Army—I am speaking now only of the British Army—would be plastered over with every sort of medal from every sort of Ally, and there would be a great deal of heartburning in the distribution of them. And so it was decided to get the Allies to agree to an International medal. The International medal to be common to all the Allies, and each Ally to have the right to give that medal to such of her own people as she thought fit. The rule it was proposed to draw up for our International medal was that it would be given to every officer and man, commissioned and enlisted, who landed in a theatre of war. People at home, for instance, in Great Britain, who never had been out of Great Britain, would not get it. In France they might give it to everybody if they wanted to—to their women working on the fields. We should have nothing to say to that; it would rest with them.

Then, in addition to that, it was proposed that there should be a British medal—a medal given by Great Britain for the Empire, to all the troops of the Empire, whether they served in a theatre of war, or whether they only came forward to defend their own country—to every officer commissioned and man enlisted who came forward and was regularly commissioned and enlisted and in uniform.

Therefore the result would be this. Take where we are at present, in England, for the moment. Take two men in England. One man has been over to France, to Egypt, to Italy, or to Mesopotamia. He would get the International medal, with the necessary clasps, and he would get the British medal. The man who, by reason of age, or other reason, was not able to leave this country, but who had served in this country in khaki, as an enlisted man or a commissioned officer, would get the British medal.

Then the question of clasps came up, and that is a very difficult question. It was decided to do nothing about that until after the end of the war, when there would be a committee of officers, representing every theatre of war, who would have to sit round a table and work out this question. Judging by the trouble the South African War gave us in that way, so as not to give a clasp to too small a matter, and at the same time not to overlook an important one, it is bound to be a very, very tricky question, and the idea was to have that done by officers who cannot be got together to do it to-day, because they are all out in the different theatres of war. After the war these would get together, they would have their maps before them on the table, and they would draw up their proposals as to the clasps.

Then the proposal was made for the 1914 star, and, whether rightly or wrongly, that was given to every officer and man on the strength of the Expeditionary Force who landed in France between midnight on the 4th August 1914 and midnight on the 22nd-23rd November 1914.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Who made the proposal?

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: I could not tell you. I would not like to say it was not the Press. Personally I have always been against it, but that is another matter. Anyhow, it was done, and roughly about 400,000 people altogether got that Mons star, of which not quite half were Regulars, I might say.

Now that is the medal position to-day. So that if any more medals or decorations are given—take Gallipoli, for example, leaving out the rights and wrongs of the Mons decoration—the result would be this, that a man who was in Gallipoli for two or three months would get his third decoration, while a man who landed in Flanders or France on the 24th November 1914, and had been there ever since, at the end of the war would not get more than two—the International and the British medals. That is the position as far as we have gone at present.

Mr. MASSEY: As I understand it, Mr. Long, the position is this. We have got, I am afraid, somewhat mixed up in connection with it. The Imperial Government practically declined to have anything to do with a special clasp or recognition.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: No, not a clasp. I think last year, if I remember rightly, I said myself, or some other War Office representative said, the question of the clasp would most certainly be considered. We cannot say to-day that a clasp will be given for any particular thing, because it will be left to the committee I have referred to; but I think it is a hundred to one in favour.

Mr. MASSEY: That does not affect my point at all. There was a very long discussion, initiated by myself, I may say, last year, and we understood—we who were interesting ourselves in providing a special decoration for those who fought in Gallipoli—that the Imperial Government, or the War Office—it comes to the same thing in this connection—declined to do anything. I raised the question whether there would be any objection to allowing the Governments of Australia and New Zealand to do it themselves if they could get the consent of the King. Now I am not directly connected with the Defence Department of New Zealand, but I know that some arrangement has been arrived at between the New Zealand Government and the Government of Australia—the two Defence Departments—and they have actually agreed upon the colours to be used in the recognition, because it was submitted to me by the Defence Minister only a few days before I left New Zealand. That is the position to-day, I understand, and I think we ought to get to know exactly what has happened. There is only one man in London who can tell me, and that is General Richardson, who said that he would inquire into the whole thing and let me know exactly what had been done and what was intended to be done; but I do not know now, and I think before going any further we ought to know.

Mr. HUGHES: The point raised by Mr. Meighen before he went, and the attitude of Mr. Burton, shows that this body is hardly the competent authority to deal with this matter.

Mr. BURTON: Quite right.

Mr. HUGHES: Take the position of the delegates from South Africa. With all due deference to the merits of the case, they must also have regard to the position in which they find themselves. They have their own soldiers, who are fighting very gallantly, and they have to consider the effects of singling out one particular contingent from all the others. So that, while I think it is most unfortunate that we cannot agree, I can see the reason why Canada and South Africa take up the attitude they do.

The position with regard to New Zealand and Australia may be very shortly stated, and it is practically this—that there is no difference of opinion at all, excepting as to whether we are standing out for every person of our forces, from the landing to the evacuation, getting a star. It has to be a star, which is so distinguished, that it cannot be mistaken for any British decoration. That will be approved, presumably.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: It is quite approved.

Mr. HUGHES: Yes. I am only stating it. That is one of the conditions of the decoration. The only point is, to whom it should be given, and that is a point upon which negotiations can take place between the various authorities.

Mr. ROWELL: It is a domestic matter between your Government and the Imperial Government as to what decoration you may choose to grant, and I think New Zealand ought to settle it in the same way.

Mr. HUGHES: We cannot settle it in any other way.

Mr. LLOYD: I am rather in favour of that—letting each Dominion take up the matter separately with the Imperial Government.

15 July 1918.]

MEDALS.

[10th Day.]

CHAIRMAN: That means issuing a decoration by the Dominion Governments?

Mr. LLOYD: What it really comes to is this: it is a commemoration of the time when Newfoundland first took part in the Great War—provided it is recognised by the King.

Mr. MASSEY: Will Newfoundland take it up?

Mr. LLOYD: Certainly we will take it up. It is between one Government and the other Government.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Do you mean that in taking it up you will try to get a British medal issued to Newfoundland?

Mr. LLOYD: No; that a special decoration will be given to Newfoundland soldiers which will be recognised by the King.

CHAIRMAN: Approved by the King?

Mr. LLOYD: Approved by the King.

Mr. ROWELL: As I understood the telegram which was read out, such action has already been taken by the Governments of Australia and New Zealand with reference to the Gallipoli campaign, and a decoration has already been approved by the King to be issued by the Governments of Australia and New Zealand to certain members of their Forces?

CHAIRMAN: Certainly.

Mr. ROWELL: That is a matter on which we have nothing to say, and which may be arranged between the Governments of Australia and New Zealand and the Imperial Government.

CHAIRMAN: They have settled that. That has been done—including the form of the decoration, the colour of the riband, and so on.

Mr. ROWELL: I think Mr. Hughes has now taken the correct position—that the matter should rest there, and be dealt with by the Dominion Governments and the Imperial Government if they wish a special decoration for any campaign in which their own Dominion troops have taken part.

Mr. MASSEY: I would like it to be made clear that the decoration would apply to all the troops in Gallipoli.

CHAIRMAN: That is so—the words are: “took part in the operations in Gallipoli.”

Sir FREDERICK PONSONBY: Only officers and men of the Australian and New Zealand Forces.

Mr. LLOYD: We will take it up separately. We simply follow that precedent.

CHAIRMAN: Each Dominion will issue to its own troops.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: It shuts out the British Forces, does it not, Mr. Long?

CHAIRMAN: That does not. There may be something else which I have not heard of, but there is nothing there to shut them out.

Mr. MASSEY: May I ask the Adjutant-General whether it is intended by the British War Office to issue a special decoration for each theatre of war?

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: A special decoration?

Mr. MASSEY: Yes. I am not well up in these things.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: We have not gone so far as to consider that.

CHAIRMAN: Do you not think there is a little misunderstanding? A “decoration” is technically supposed to mean a medal, or a star. But what we are all thinking about really is a bar to the medal. That is to say, what Mr. Massey wants to know is whether there will be some distinguishing mark which a soldier can wear, which will indicate that he took part, for instance, in the Gallipoli campaign.

Mr. MASSEY: The Adjutant-General himself is wearing a decoration at the present moment. I take it that is a particularly good one.

10th Day.]

MEDALS.

[15 July 1918.]

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: That is the Mons star.

Mr. MASSEY: Is that the Mons? Well, it is the first I have seen.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: We have not considered the question of giving a decoration, as such, to each theatre of war, but there certainly will be a good many clasps for the different theatres of war. For instance, the Egyptian theatre may have half a dozen clasps for different engagements. Mesopotamia will also have a certain number, and Gallipoli, and Salonica. There will be clasps for engagements in all these different theatres of war, on the International medal.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Africa will have that right as well?

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: Oh, certainly. That is the reason for delaying this question, until we can get together representatives who have been in the various theatres of war, so that the clasps may really be given for important actions or series of actions, with the right names, and everything else. It is a very big business, this question of clasps.

Mr. HUGHES: I was rather unnecessarily severe on what had been done in the past. What was the practice in the Napoleonic wars?

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: No medals. The Waterloo medals, I believe, were issued in 1848, or something like that. You were talking about time. Now this particular decoration I have here was the South African King's Medal. That was a time medal. It was given for eighteen months' service in South Africa during the war, either continuous or made up of shorter periods, making eighteen months in all. And if a man was out there eighteen months less one day, he did not get it. That was really a time medal, and it has clasps on it for particular years.

Mr. MASSEY: That brings me to another point, General. In New Zealand we are particularly interested in what has been called the Samoa campaign. We are rather proud of it, because we claim that New Zealand was the first of the Dominions or Dependencies of the Empire to get its troops away, and its troops were the first to occupy enemy territory. There was no bloodshed, but there was tremendous risk, because at the time we sent the troops to Samoa, there were a number of enemy cruisers in the Pacific, and it is very doubtful indeed whether our troops would have reached Samoa had it not been for the protection afforded by the battleship "Australia." I have said it before, and I should like to say it here again, that I should like to see it possible for the men who took part in the Samoan campaign to get some special recognition.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: Under the present system they will get their two medals, the International and the British, and on the International—I am talking a long way ahead now, but at that Clasps Conference there will be representatives of your Governments, and I am pretty certain one of the clasps will be for Samoa.

Mr. COOK: You were first at Samoa because you were nearer to Samoa than we were to New Guinea, and we were told to send our ships away and look after you.

Mr. MASSEY: I recognise and appreciate what has been done, but so far as risk is concerned, I would sooner have six months on the Western Front than that fortnight in ships carrying troops from New Zealand to Samoa.

Mr. ROWELL: It depends on where you are located.

CHAIRMAN: Do you want, in the face of what has passed, to press your Resolution, Sir Joseph?

Sir JOSEPH WARD: It looks as if the Conference is against me, though I think personally it is the proper thing to do. I cannot help feeling that Gallipoli does occupy an extraordinary position, and one which has not been equalled since the beginning of the war, for the reason that these men were asked to do what was impossible, and they tried to do it.

Mr. COOK: It was slow torture for three or four months.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: It was a terrible trial, and from the point of view of warfare probably unexampled. I cannot help feeling that the generosity of the men in all other theatres or sectors where warfare has taken place would admit that the conditions in Gallipoli were quite exceptional. But I recognise, of course, that my motion is not accepted. Might I suggest that under the circumstances this motion be held over until Mr. Massey and I have found out what the position is from our own General?

CABLE COMMUNICATIONS.

[10th Day.]

Sir JOSEPH WARD—cont.

CHAIRMAN: Certainly.

Mr. MASSEY: I have sent for General Richardson, but they do not seem able to find him.

CHAIRMAN: Then the position is that Sir Joseph Ward's motion will be held over until certain definite information has been obtained, and that meantime the issue of a medal by the Dominions is approved by His Majesty the King to their own troops—that this may be extended to other Dominions if they think fit, and that the general question, as stated by the Adjutant-General, is to be further considered when it is raised again.

Cable Communications.

(See pp. 125–132 of [Cd. 9177].)

The part in [] was omitted from p. 128 of [Cd. 9177].

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Yes. I gave notice of this motion at the previous Conference.

[Mr. ROWELL: Then, in reference to the third paragraph, Sir Joseph may not be aware—I do not know how far this could be put upon the record—of the fact that there is now in use an Imperial cable between Great Britain and Canada.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Yes, I know, but everything connected with it is secret.

Sir WILLIAM MERCER: Not in use, I am afraid. It was broken down last December.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: May I interrupt by saying that I was aware of that; I know we have got it, but meantime it does not affect the present state of things.

Mr. ROWELL: There is the possibility of a new State-owned cable being provided by means of the line which has been taken over. I judge that is a possibility, although the use of it is now interrupted, and that, pending some final decision with reference to that line, it would not be expedient for us to embark upon a proposal for the construction of an additional line across the Atlantic, unless there are some further considerations of which I have no knowledge at present: and in connection with the use of that cable a telegraph line has been leased to Montreal connecting with the Pacific cable, so that despatches are sent direct over that from Nova Scotia to Montreal and over the Pacific cable to Australia and New Zealand.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Except that that land line is not State-owned.

Mr. ROWELL: I think there is only a lease of the line from Montreal to the Pacific Coast in Canada.

Sir WILLIAM MERCER: Perhaps I may add that the lease of a line between Montreal and Halifax is practically concluded.

Mr. ROWELL: So that what Sir Joseph Ward desired to secure by the third clause of his Resolution may in effect be secured by the action already taken, or which may be hereafter taken, in connection with the German cable lines.

Then, as I understand, Sir Joseph does not now press the fourth clause of the Resolution. Under those circumstances I would suggest that the only clause of the Resolution which is not covered by action already taken or contemplated—to the principle of which I see no objection—is the first. The other three paragraphs are all dealt with in the way I have suggested.]

Mr. COOK: I think, in the circumstances, &c., &c.

The parts in [] were omitted from p. 129 of [Cd. 9177].

Mr. PIKE PEASE: * * * * The present position is that there are 14 cables to Newfoundland and Canada; 13 are controlled by United States Companies, eight by the Western Union Telegraph Company, and five by the Commercial Cable Company. [There is the converted cable which was mentioned just now. (Mr. Pike Pease here made a statement which was ordered not to be reported).] With regard to the rates which, &c., &c.

Mr. PIKE PEASE: * * * * As far as the British Post Office is concerned, naturally I am not in a position to say whether it would be possible to obtain facilities for taking over these various cables which have been suggested this afternoon, but I would point out that in view of the fact that 13 are controlled by the United States, the amount of capital required to take over so many of the lines would be very great. [But as far as the converted cable is concerned, speaking without any authority at all, I should say that there might be some means by which what is desired could be carried out.]

Mr. COOK: I remember when that cable was first projected, &c., &c., &c.

The parts in [] were omitted from p. 130 of [Cd. 9177].

Sir JOSEPH WARD: * * * * I am of opinion, as I have said, that we have not yet gone far enough, so that I think with a view to moving further in the same direction, it would be at least a mistake not to reaffirm the necessity and desirability of having cheaper rates.

[Now may I say one word about this Atlantic cable? I am quite aware of the position with regard to it, and I cannot speak more openly about it, but I am quite clear in my mind that if this Conference does not confirm the ownership of the Atlantic cable, circumstances might arise in the discussion of peace terms which might cause that cable to fall into other hands, and the impression that is formed at the moment, because of the position, that though unused, that takes the place of the Atlantic cable, is one which I dissent from, because in the meantime it does not. But supposing it is going to remain under the control of the British Government, then the oversea Governments ought to come in in association with the ownership of that cable, and I maintain that somebody has got to be paid for it, the Lord knows who, but surely as a sort of intermediary State, and it is recognised by Mr. Rowell that the Canadian line links up with the Atlantic cable and we have to pay for it; surely it is a good thing to recognise the desirability of having a State-owned cable across the Atlantic, and if we get it, we do not suggest putting down another cable. Meantime what is the objection to our affirming the desirability of owning the cable?]

I want to say a word more, and I have finished. I hope that the representatives of Canada and also of Newfoundland will pardon me for saying—I do not know whether Mr. Lloyd referred to it or not by the way—that the leased land lines, [the present one that is leased from Montreal to the Pacific, and the other one that is leased,] do not, in my opinion, carry out the necessary functions of a State-owned cable, &c., &c., &c.

The part in [] was omitted from p. 132 of [Cd. 9177].

Mr. ROWELL: Then I see no objection to paragraph 3 as modified by Sir Joseph. I suggest instead of the word "necessary" the word "desirable"; [in view of the fact that the British Government does control the line,] it is desirable that the Dominions should share in it, &c., &c., &c.

Medals.

Mr. MASSEY: In the last half-minute I have had the opportunity of seeing General Richardson, the New Zealand general, and he informs me that the Defence Department of New Zealand and Australia are agreed on a form of decoration, which was submitted to the King, who suggested a slight alteration. And General Richardson thinks the proper thing to do now is for Mr. Hughes and myself, and Mr. Cook and Sir Joseph Ward, to come together, and we can then settle the whole thing in a few minutes.

CHAIRMAN: That is very satisfactory.

ELEVENTH DAY.

Wednesday, 17th July, 1918.

THE IMPERIAL WAR CONFERENCE MET AT THE COLONIAL OFFICE AT 11 A.M.

The names of those present are printed on p. 133 of [Cd. 9177].

Order of Business.

CHAIRMAN: There is a question in reference to the Indian Resolution on Emigration, which is on the paper for Friday. I understand that the Indian representatives have some doubt whether that could be taken on Friday, and what they would like would be to have a Sub-Committee of the Conference to thresh it out first of all. If that was approved by the Conference, then we could appoint the Committee now to get to work, and probably we should be ready to take the resolution next week. That would mean that we would have to substitute some other business for Friday. At present, on the paper for Friday, we have the question of Venereal Disease, and if the Indian question goes off there would be nothing else.

Mr. MASSEY: There are several Resolutions which have not been dealt with. I have two myself.

CHAIRMAN: As I say, there is nothing down for Friday. There is a Resolution about Government Contracts which you have got, and there is the question of Petroleum, which has been remitted to us by Lord Harcourt, Chairman of the Committee which is inquiring into this; and there are, of course, other Resolutions which are on the paper. But if the Conference would decide first of all to have a Committee to thresh out the Indian Emigration question, then we could settle what we would take on Friday.

Mr. HUGHES: Are you referring now particularly to venereal disease?

CHAIRMAN: No; the Indian Emigration question.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Is there something else which we could take on Friday?

CHAIRMAN: Yes; we could take Petroleum. There is the Mineral Resources Bureau Finance question, which will not take long, and there is Lord Harcourt's question about Petroleum and Mr. Massey's question about Government Contracts.

Mr. MASSEY: I do not remember about Government Contracts.

CHAIRMAN: About priority being given in all Government Contracts to materials in the Empire.

Mr. HUGHES: Is not the question of Petroleum in the same class as all those other things which we have been discussing, non-ferrous metals and so on?

CHAIRMAN: It is rather different. Lord Harcourt is very anxious to attend the Conference and to make a short statement as to what is his view of the situation from the result of his inquiries.

Mr. HUGHES: I should like to hear that, but I could not be here on Friday.

CHAIRMAN: Then we will not take Petroleum. We could take Government Contracts, and the Mineral Resources Bureau. And perhaps, whilst we are sitting to-day, members of the Conference will look through the different resolutions and see whether they would like to name something else before we rise.

Mr. MASSEY: Is any date fixed approximately for the end of the Conference?

11th Day.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

[17 July 1918.]

CHAIRMAN: It looks now as if we were going to work another ten days.

Mr. HUGHES: There are a number of things which we have referred to Committees and we have not got reports from them. Then I think we ought to settle the general question of raw materials; we ought to lay down some principle to which we could commit ourselves and which we could recommend strongly to the Governments. We have not done that yet.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think whatever else we do, we should get through next week.

CHAIRMAN: Could we sit in the afternoon as well as the morning? I should be quite ready. Well, may we appoint a Committee to go into the question of Indian emigration? You will take charge of it, Mr. Montagu?

Mr. MONTAGU: It is a matter of the greatest possible importance to each Dominion. I do not deny that it is a very difficult and complicated question, but it is a subject in which we, of course, are vitally interested, and we should be glad if each Dominion could appoint a representative to the Committee with a view to saving the time of the Conference.

Mr. MASSEY: Is that emigration from India?

Mr. MONTAGU: Yes; it arises out of last year's Resolution.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Has a Resolution been drafted, Mr. Montagu?

Mr. MONTAGU: I suggest that we should draft a Resolution at the Committee.

Sir S. P. SINHA: It is very much the same as was arranged last year, Sir Robert, at your instance—very much the same kind of informal Conference first.

CHAIRMAN: Would not the best plan be to appoint a Committee and ask each Government to nominate a representative? Is that your pleasure?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, I should be willing.

Mr. BURTON: Oh, yes.

Imperial Court of Appeal.

(See pp. 134-153 of [Cd. 9177].)

Order of Business.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Could we not pass this other Resolution on Channels of Communication and take it up in the Cabinet?

Mr. HUGHES: I think it would hardly be fair.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I thought Mr. Massey said he would agree.

Mr. MASSEY: Oh, no; I expressed general approval, but I do not know about agreeing without further consideration.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I spoke under the impression that we were all agreed. I think we are all agreed except Mr. Massey.

Mr. MONTAGU: I never saw the Resolution until this morning.

CHAIRMAN: Could we take it this afternoon at 5.30?

Mr. HUGHES: For how long should we have to meet?

CHAIRMAN: I do not think it would take more than half-an-hour. Could you come, Mr. Massey?

Mr. MASSEY: It would be very inconvenient for me. I might stretch a point to come if it were absolutely necessary, but I would rather not.

Mr. BURTON: I have no objection to a meeting taking place this afternoon, but I cannot attend it. But I entirely agree with the suggestion Sir Robert Borden has made.

17 July 1918.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

[11th Day.]

254

Mr. HUGHES: I think a short statement should be made about this and it should be referred to the Cabinet.

Mr. BURTON: Yes, that is the idea.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think the principal discussion would have to take place in the Cabinet.

CHAIRMAN: Do you assent, Mr. Massey, to its being at 5.30?

Mr. MASSEY: I cannot come, I have too much to do.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Could you take it any earlier, Mr. Massey?

Mr. MASSEY: No; I am going away now and I do not expect to be back soon enough.

CHAIRMAN: I have ascertained that the party which is going down with the Air Board will be back at 5 o'clock.

Mr. MASSEY: As a matter of fact, I am having far too much to do. I do not complain, but there it is. If the matter is urgent, I will endeavour to be present at half-past 5, if you like to leave it at that.*

* The proposed meeting was subsequently postponed.

TWELFTH DAY.

Thursday, 18th July 1918.

THE IMPERIAL WAR CONFERENCE MET AT THE COLONIAL OFFICE AT 11 A.M.

The names of those present are printed on pp. 154-155 of [Cd. 9177].

Imperial Meat Supplies.

Mr. MASSEY: Before we go on with to-day's business, Mr. Long, I want to say that last time we discussed the meat question it was said that another opportunity would be given. I do not know in what form it will come up, but there is some information I would like to obtain and, if it is in order, I will hand a memorandum to you. What is wanted is the quantity, the net price, and the landed cost in England of meat imported into the United Kingdom from the United States since the commencement of the present year.

CHAIRMAN: That information we will get from the Food Controller.

Mr. MASSEY: I have got to explain the position to my own country, and I should like to know as quickly as possible.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Will it be possible to get a balance sheet of Swift's for last year?

CHAIRMAN: I have not the least idea.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: It would be a very useful thing to have.

Mr. COOK: Including the honourable understandings.

CHAIRMAN: The Conference could not ask for a thing of that sort.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I thought the Board of Trade would perhaps have it.

CHAIRMAN: I do not know: I will ask.

Royal Arms.

Mr. MASSEY: I want to give notice of a motion I have been asked to lay before the Conference by people who are interesting themselves in the proposal: "This Conference supports the proposal that the Royal Arms should be altered so as to include some appropriate representation of Oversea Dominions and Dependencies and India thereon." There is a petition being circulated.

Channels of Communication.

(See pp. 155-165 of [Cd. 9177].)

The part in [] was omitted from p. 163 of [Cd. 9177].

Mr. MASSEY: Perhaps not then.

[Sir JOSEPH WARD: Progress is a very necessary thing. Now, I will give a typical case of what is in my mind. At the Conference last year I proposed a Resolution asking that we should have the advice of the Lords of the Admiralty as to what they believed to be the best system for a Navy for the British Empire.

Mr. COOK: It is settled long ago.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: It is not settled for the whole Empire, pardon me. You may imagine—Australia, I mean—that it is settled from your point of view; but we are in this position, and I want to call attention to it. This Conference passed a Resolution to get a report for the guidance of the oversea countries, and for the guidance of the people there. And what has happened? There is a report marked "Secret," which has not come to this Conference for consideration and discussion at all; it has gone to the War Cabinet, and we are in the position, as public men, on a matter of great consequence to those whom we represent, of keeping our mouths shut.

18 July 1918.]

CHANNELS OF COMMUNICATION.

[12th Day.

CHAIRMAN: What report is that? I think that report^a to which you refer has been circulated to the Conference. I am not aware of any report which has not been circulated.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I have not seen it.

CHAIRMAN: It has been circulated. In the mass of papers you may have overlooked it.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I may be in the position of having overlooked it. I know it has gone to the War Cabinet, because I have seen it there. It certainly has not come up for discussion here. However, I am calling attention to this as one aspect of the development of the Empire as a whole. There is a matter of the greatest importance and consequence to the Empire as a whole, and it is marked "Secret," and no one can make any use of it.

Mr. MASSEY: We cannot discuss that in war time.

Mr. HUGHES: What has this to do with this Resolution?

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Pardon me, Mr. Hughes. I will discuss it from the standpoint from which I regard it.

Mr. HUGHES: I have opinions upon this particular thing.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: You have your views and I have mine. I am discussing a particular phase of the matter; I have opinions upon it, and I am entitled to express them. I am entitled to put them in my own way.

Mr. HUGHES: I do not know what particular document you are alluding to.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I am alluding to the Report of the First Sea Lord.

Mr. COOK: Which was circulated to the War Cabinet.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: It is a report on a matter of very great importance to the whole British Empire. That is a document which, in my opinion, should go among the records of the Imperial Conference, and as soon as we are in a position to consider it and when the war is over the word "Secret" is removed from it, in the interests of the public in all parts of the British Empire, it and the discussion should be available for the information of the public.

Mr. COOK: I understand we are to discuss that on Monday or Tuesday, and we are bound to get it.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Yes, Mr. Cook, but pardon me: I think you will find, and I think it is right—I agree with Mr. Massey there—that in war time you cannot publicly discuss any matters that might be of use to the enemy, and I do not suggest that we should do that. But when this war is over, and we are considering the basis of how to make the Empire stronger, and possibly decide to alter the machinery so as to give it more effective representation, surely it is desirable that in any matter which affects the whole Empire we should not be barred by "Secret" remaining upon a paper after the Conference is over and after the war has ceased? That is the point I make. I say it should be discussed, and both the Admiralty report and the report of the discussion, while they should remain "Secret" until the war is over, that the secrecy should be removed and the public throughout the Empire should know the nature of both.]

I do not propose to take up the time of the Conference further, &c., &c., &c.

* * * * *

THIRTEENTH DAY.

Friday, 19th July 1918.

THE IMPERIAL WAR CONFERENCE MET AT THE COLONIAL OFFICE AT 11 A.M.

The names of those present are printed on pp. 166 and 167 of [Cd. 9177].

Order of Business.

CHAIRMAN: The first item on the agenda paper to-day is Imperial Mineral Resources Bureau (Finance), which is a very small point; but I propose to take the second item, with the consent of the Conference, first, because the Home Secretary, who has been good enough to come, is obliged to be in the House of Commons at 12 o'clock, so that it would be to the advantage of the Conference if we asked the Home Secretary to make a general statement, upon which points could be raised, and if he is unable to stay for the whole of the debate he will leave Sir Edward Troup to represent him. And we have also the Under-Secretary of the War Office, who is the Vice-President of the Army Council, who has been good enough to come also.

Temptations of Oversea Troops.

Sir GEORGE CAVE: I am much obliged to the Conference for taking the question of the Temptations of Oversea Troops first, because I have to be at the House of Commons at 12 o'clock to take charge of a Bill. But Sir Edward Troup and Sir Edward Henry will remain, and will be able to clear up any questions which may still have to be dealt with when I leave. May I say that I have read with very great interest and attention the proceedings of the Imperial War Conference last year, including the statements made by Mr. Massey and by others, and I think we are all at one with them that there is a great evil to be met in the dangers to which the Dominion troops, and those of our Allies who come here, are exposed in the London streets. A great deal has been done in this country with a view to meeting these evils.

May I mention first the regulation which is known here as Regulation 40 D, under which any woman who solicits a member of His Majesty's Forces, including, of course, the Dominion Forces, is exposed to a prosecution and to a penalty. That regulation has only been in force for a limited time, but already there have been a great number of prosecutions under it, and a good many convictions, and I myself hold the view that it will do good. There is, as everybody knows, a difficulty in getting the soldiers to state the facts, but most of them now take the view that for the protection of their comrades, it is their duty to state the facts in a thing like that. Then it is complained in this country that it is a one-sided regulation because it only applies as against women, and not against men, and that it only applies for the protection of soldiers, and not of civilians. Those two statements are true, but to begin with, they do not concern the Dominion troops; and, secondly, we are endeavouring to meet them by passing a Bill through Parliament which will have the same effect for the protection of all classes. That is the first new step which we have taken.

Then very strong measures have been taken by the Local Government Board with a view to the prevention and treatment of venereal disease. It is probably too soon to make a general statement as to the effect of those measures, but my colleague, the President of the Board, thinks well of them, and thinks they are already having their effect. Then suggestions were made, I think, that some plan should be adopted under which women, and especially young women, who solicit in the streets would be liable to be taken and put under arrest, and, if need be, to be confined in some place for treatment, or some home, until they are cured of their disease. The Government did introduce last year a measure which would have had that effect; but there are people in this country who are exceedingly reluctant to pass measures of that kind, and after a great deal of discussion in the House of Commons, the time gave out and it was impossible to proceed with that measure. It contained also provisions under which bigger penalties could have been imposed for solicitation in the streets. Of course, those provisions were dropped with the Bill.

TEMPTATIONS OF OVERSEA TROOPS.

[13th Day.

My position to-day is this: that I am very strongly in sympathy with the opinions of members of the Conference, that every possible step should be taken to meet the evil, to which they very rightly attach grave importance, and if suggestions are made to-day, or at any future time, for a further remedy for these evils, I shall be only too glad to take those suggestions into consideration, and do what I possibly can to carry them into effect. We have powers under the Defence of the Realm Act, but, of course, they are limited powers. If we can use them we will, and if we cannot meet the evil in that way, we must again consider the necessity of proposing legislation. That is all, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say in introducing the matter.

Mr. ROWELL: May I ask one or two questions, Mr. Chairman, of the Home Secretary, to see if I understand the present position? Was Regulation 40 D considered as a substitute for the Bill which you were not able to get through last Session?

Sir GEORGE CAVE: So far as that Bill will operate for the benefit of soldiers, it has the same effect.

Mr. ROWELL: And you have a Bill before the House in the present Session. Is there not a Bill?

Sir GEORGE CAVE: Yes. The same Bill has been introduced into the House of Lords, and is just about to be referred to a Committee of both Houses for consideration. It contains the same provisions.

Mr. ROWELL: What is the prospect of that Bill becoming law this Session, might I ask?

Sir GEORGE CAVE: I should not like to prophesy. It certainly cannot become law before the autumn—probably the late autumn.

Mr. ROWELL: I understood from a perusal of the reports of the last Conference, and also, I think, from a Memorandum which was sent out to all the Dominion Governments, that considerable hostility developed in the House of Commons to some of the provisions of that Bill, and the Government was fearful as to its ability to get through a number of the provisions which were considered important when the Bill was introduced. Does that condition continue to prevail, or are the prospects for getting a satisfactory Bill better now? I wonder if there is any information as to that. I realise the difficulty of forecasting, of course.

Sir GEORGE CAVE: I have no indication that members who were hostile to the Bill have modified their hostility. On the other hand, I do know from deputations which have come to me that there is a very strong feeling in this country, especially among those who take an active part in social work, in favour of the Bill.

Mr. MACPHERSON: You referred to a Conference. Is that the Conference I presided over at the War Office?

Mr. ROWELL: No; I was referring to the last meeting of the Imperial War Conference.

Mr. MACPHERSON: Oh, I see.

CHAIRMAN: Does any member of the Conference wish to make any comments or ask any questions of the Home Secretary?

Mr. ROWELL: From our standpoint, we do not think the measures taken are adequate. We do think that 40 D. will be of some real benefit. I have discussed the matter with different officers in command of our training divisions, and they say they have already received some real benefit from the operation of that regulation, and in two or three at least of our training areas there have been several convictions, which they say has produced a real benefit although it has not wholly met the situation. Of course, from our standpoint what we would like to see is an end made of soliciting upon the streets and around the camps. That is our greatest grievance. We appreciate that you have difficulties in dealing with the problem. We, of course, in our more limited sphere do not permit it at all. I understand the Americans in their training camps in the United States have endeavoured to put an end to it. They have met the situation, I am told, in most cases.

Sir GEORGE CAVE: People are warned off the camps, but our great trouble is outside the camps, in the streets. You cannot put all London out of bounds. And in the country it is equally troublesome. It is not in the camps that the trouble occurs; it is outside.

Mr. ROWELL: One may as well speak perfectly frankly. Sir Robert Borden stated the situation, at the last Conference, and I think stated it very strongly, but I am not sure that he stated it more strongly than the Canadian people feel on it. As certain members were not here when it was discussed before, I might just read one or two sentences of what Sir Robert said, because we have the feeling that, over here, you do not realise the depth of feeling which exists, certainly in our Dominion, on this matter. This was Sir Robert Borden's statement in April, 1917*:—"I do not think Canada will ever again send men overseas to any war unless we are assured that such conditions as have met our soldiers here will not meet them again. I say unhesitatingly that if I should be Prime Minister of Canada on the outbreak of another war, I would not send one man overseas if the conditions were such as have prevailed during the progress of this war. I think it is a horrible outrage that they should be exposed, as they have been, and no one sitting round this table can tell me what will be the effect of it upon the life of Canada in the next 25 or 50 years. I have heard from authoritative sources intimations of what its effect is likely to be in our country which are enough to make one shudder. I am absolutely astonished that no steps of any reasonable or adequate character have been taken here to prevent these women swarming round our camps all over this Kingdom—diseased women—for if the men go outside the camp they are immediately pounced upon, and, apparently, there is no law or regulation in this country to prevent such conditions. I have had to consider lately the regulations in this country with regard to the prevention of pleuro-pneumonia in British cattle, and I say that if a hundredth part of the care that has been exercised to prevent pleuro-pneumonia getting into British cattle had been taken to prevent our men becoming infected with these awful diseases, the conditions would be very much better than they are. I think it is high time that the authorities in this country should wake up to the feeling of the people in the Oversea Dominions upon this subject. If effective steps are not taken very soon, I shall speak about it publicly in a way that will not be forgotten."

As you know, Sir Robert Borden is a calm and dispassionate man, and that was his statement as to his feeling and the feeling in Canada with reference to this matter. The Resolution which was passed at the last Conference will be found on page 238 of the Conference proceedings† and is as follows: "That the attention of the authorities concerned be called to the temptations to which our soldiers when on leave are subjected, and that such authorities be empowered by legislation or otherwise (1) to protect our men by having the streets in the neighbourhood of camps, and other places of public resort, kept clear so far as practicable of women of the prostitute class, and (2) to take any other steps that may be necessary to remedy the serious remedy that exists." That is a misprint. It should be "serious evil," not "serious remedy." That Resolution was moved by Mr. Massey, and Sir Robert spoke in favour of it. He said‡: "I am prepared to support this Resolution. If I had been drafting it, I should probably have made it somewhat stronger."

Now we have been unable to see that any very adequate steps have been taken to carry out this Resolution—that is, to protect our men by having the streets in the neighbourhood of camps and other places kept clear, as far as practicable, of women of the prostitute class. We do not see any adequate reason why known prostitutes should not be interned and put out of the way until war is over, whether diseased or not diseased. We do not see that they should be permitted to infest the streets and public places of this country, lying in wait for clean young men who come to give their lives for their country, and whom we are now compelling to leave their homes to come over here. We have received letters from mothers saying that they do not object to conscription; they are willing for their sons to go and die for their country, but they do object to their being subjected to the conditions of life such as they are compelled to face here in London and other districts.

* See p. 190 of Dominions No. 62.

Now we realise what a tremendous problem it is, and how exceedingly difficult it is to deal with, and if it were not that we feel it so important to our soldiers and to the welfare of the country, to the strength and virility of the race, we would not press the matter so strongly. But I repeat that what Sir Robert Borden said last year is the attitude of our Government in this matter, and we would urge with all the power we have that some further steps should be taken. We realise that you have difficulties, of public opinion and so on; we realise the difficulties of interfering with what may be considered your domestic problems. But it is a little more than a domestic problem. Our soldiers are compelled to come over here, and they have to face these temptations. We are anxious to do all we can to help in this matter. It is in no critical spirit as regards the past, but in order to try and do all we can to help for the future, that we bring this question up.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Does Canada support the introduction of a C.D. Act?

Mr. ROWELL: No. That question has not been considered.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Because I think, if I may be allowed to say so, that if the C.D. Act should be brought into operation here, our own people would be dead against the introduction of that Act.

Mr. ROWELL: I interpret the Resolution as applying to all the prostitute class, diseased or not diseased.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I was not quite sure when you suggested that these women should be put away and examined until cured, I did not know whether it implied the introduction of the C.D. Act in New Zealand.

Mr. ROWELL: I did not say that they should be kept under examination and wait until they are cured.

CHAIRMAN: I understood you to say it should be internment of known prostitutes, whether diseased or not, and the difficulty with regard to that is this. We had a Royal Commission on the subject, and their Report and the evidence they received was of enormous interest; and the difficulty there was shown clearly—the difficulty of establishing what is a prostitute. Since the war I have been the recipient of a great many complaints similar to those which Mr. Rowell has expressed to-day, and we have been told that the real difficulty is that, if you shut up every known prostitute, you would not materially deal with this difficulty, because a great deal of the infection, I understand, comes from people who are not prostitutes at all, and whose character is not discovered until they are found to be diseased.

Mr. MACPHERSON: 70 per cent.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: The trouble is to distinguish between known and unknown prostitutes. It is comparatively easy to deal with or to get rid of the known ones.

Mr. MACPHERSON: We made investigation, and we found conclusively that it was not really from the known prostitute, who looked after herself, that the danger arose, but from the amateur—the servant girl and munition worker, and so on.

Mr. BURTON: Is there a good deal of it amongst them?

Mr. MACPHERSON: I am afraid there is.

Mr. MASSEY: I am sorry to learn, Mr. Long, that more has not been done. I moved the Resolution last year, and I was one of those who spoke somewhat strongly. And we spoke strongly because we felt strongly. The state of things that existed last year, and I am afraid exists now, is not a credit to any civilised country. I do not go about a great deal in the evenings, and lately I have not had the opportunity of seeing, but last year it is no exaggeration to say that there were shoals of prostitutes in the Strand. I do not know what other streets may be like, but I am speaking only of the Strand. And there is undoubtedly in New Zealand a very uneasy feeling about the temptations to which our soldiers are subject. There is no question about that. I have had deputations of women speaking in the plainest possible terms about this evil, and I do think, if it is possible to do any more, then more should be done. I am not speaking from the point of view of being strait-laced, or anything of that sort, but I do say that the temptations which have been placed before our soldiers have been such as should not be placed before any set of men, young or old, if it is possible to avoid it, and I think it is possible to avoid it to a very great extent.

There is another matter which has been attracting attention in New Zealand, and that is the use of prophylactics. We have been told out there—I have seen it in print—I have seen it in one or two public prints of the country—that the use of prophylactics is encouraged by the authorities—that they are almost insisted upon. Well, I hope that is not the case. If that sort of thing is to be encouraged, we are soon going to get into the position that other people have got into in days gone by, prior to the downfall of the country to which they belonged. Wherever an Empire has fallen, the downfall has always been preceded by an orgy of immorality, and I am afraid, judging by what we hear now and again, we are getting perilously near that state of things in the larger centres of Great Britain. I sincerely hope it is not the case, but it would be a great relief to parents overseas if they were informed that the British Government, and the British authorities generally, were doing their duty in this respect. While we do not expect our young fellows to be plaster saints, or anything of that sort, we do expect that reasonable care should be taken of them while they are here. Like Mr. Rowell, we have all got to think of the future. We have got to think of the effect during the next 20 years of what is going on to-day; and I trust that the methods which are being adopted here will not be brought into operation in oversea countries when the war comes to an end. I can only support Mr. Rowell in what he has said, and I want to emphasise that if it is possible to do more—I can only speak, of course, from an outsider's point of view—with regard to this evil, then more should be done.

Mr. ROWELL: Have you a law at present prohibiting solicitation? It is only solicitation to the annoyance of the person solicited, is it not?

Sir GEORGE CAVE: Yes, that is so.

Mr. ROWELL: That makes it pretty difficult to get convictions, does it not?

Sir GEORGE CAVE: It makes a difficulty, of course; especially as you cannot get the person solicited to complain. That is often the trouble. I expect a Canadian or New Zealand soldier would be very angry if he were interfered with unduly.

Mr. ROWELL: Quite so; but if you are to deal with soliciting at all, should not that qualification be removed? Why should not solicitation itself on the public streets be an offence against the law in this country?

CHAIRMAN: There have been some extraordinarily hard cases in this country. There was a case occurred the other day of a charge against a young fellow whom I know very well indeed, and there was no foundation for it, but he had to stand his trial. It was a case in which he was supposed to have solicited a woman. Have you any comments to make, Mr. Burton?

Mr. BURTON: No.

Sir GEORGE CAVE: You could not make soliciting an offence unless you make prostitution an offence. It is really only a part of the machinery of prostitution, and in this country—I do not know what would happen in Canada, but in this country to pass a law to make prostitution an offence would be very difficult indeed.

Mr. ROWELL: But we suppress houses of prostitution—keeping disorderly houses—and we would suppress it on the street. Conditions such as you have in London could not under any conditions prevail in Toronto or other cities in Canada. I appreciate that in a great metropolitan centre such as London there are difficulties which none of our cities present; but at the same time it seems to me that this is not anything like so difficult as other problems which you have been tackling in connection with this war.

Mr. ROWELL—cont.

Sir GEORGE CAVE: Perhaps before I leave I ought to mention two regulations which have been passed, partly, I think, because of the resolution of the Conference last year, besides 40 D. One is 13 A, under which the prostitutes can be controlled and removed, and the other is 35 C, under which orders can be made restraining a particular person from coming within particular towns from a camp. Both those regulations have been used a good deal, I think, by the military authorities, and I am sure they have assisted to keep the camps clear. Our great difficulty is with the streets away from the camps, and we have used 40 D and our police powers to the utmost extent. I shall be very glad to strengthen them, and I will certainly consider what has been said by members of the Conference.

Mr. ROWELL: I have discussed this matter with some of our officers, and they have expressed the opinion that the regulation would be more effective if it were not limited to women but covered both sexes.

Mr. MACPHERSON: You cannot do that. It would be impossible. We can only deal with it as it affects soldiers.

Mr. ROWELL: But is there any penalty on a soldier having relations with a woman when he is suffering from venereal disease?

Mr. MACPHERSON: The only penalty we have under the Army Act is a penalty of two years' imprisonment with hard labour if the soldier conceals the fact that he has got the disease. Indirectly he is punished even if he does not conceal it, because the moment he is diseased and found to be he is sent to hospital, and there are hospital stoppages, and stoppages of pay, and stoppages of leave, and stoppages of the wife's allowance—of separation allowance. So that he is indirectly punished in that way. But the only direct punishment we have in the Army is two years' imprisonment if he conceals the disease.

Mr. ROWELL: I did not discuss it with the officers, but I gathered it would have a deterrent effect if it were to cover soldiers as well as women.

Sir GEORGE CAVE: If we pass our Bill. You could not do it under the Defence of the Realm Act.

Mr. MACPHERSON: We have not got power under the Defence of the Realm Act; but I might state at this juncture that, as the Home Secretary pointed out, as a direct result of the Imperial War Conference these three regulations mentioned were passed. With regard to regulation 40 D, which is the one which has excited the greatest comment in this country in certain quarters, I think it is worth knowing that our American Allies have asked to be covered by that regulation also. The regulation as it runs says that a woman is liable to get six months' imprisonment and a fine of 100*l.* if, when diseased, she knowingly communicates that disease to a member of His Majesty's Forces. We are now extending that so as to include the Americans. We have had several convictions under the regulation, and my belief is that it is really going to work very well indeed. Directly arising also out of the Imperial War Conference of last year, we have in the War Office summoned a conference, and that conference is composed of members, military and civil, of all the Dominions and of America, and the Archbishop of Canterbury and Cardinal Bourne, and a delegate from the Free Churches, and Lord Sydenham (who was at one time the Chairman of the Venereal Disease Commission), are also members. We have sat on two occasions, and my belief is that that conference is going to do a very great amount of good. As a result of the first meeting of the conference, we got instituted in our Army, with the consent of everybody concerned, not what is called prophylactics—but I use a word which is more generally used now—namely, the term Early Treatment. In our Army the soldier is not encouraged to take this early treatment with him before he leaves barracks, but by means of lectures and by means of very careful organisation he can when he comes into barracks procure for himself, without the knowledge of anybody, a certain form of Early Treatment after the exposure. Now, it is rather significant, I think, that even the Purity Leagues of this country have not strongly objected to that; in fact, I may say all the members of the conference have approved of that; and the result is, as General Goodwin will tell you—he has only been able to get statistics in London—a great decrease in venereal disease in the Army.

[19 July 1918.]

Mr. BURTON: Is that during the war period?

Mr. MACPHERSON: Quite recently, within the last month.

General GOODWIN: It has only been in force in London in the last two months.

CHAIRMAN: I am sure the Conference will understand that the Home Secretary has to go to the House of Commons. [Sir George Cave then left the Conference room.]

Mr. MACPHERSON: At the last Conference we went a step further, and this step we are going to take upon the urgent insistence of the Dominion representatives. They have started, I think—I am referring particularly to New Zealand—what we in this country would call a clinic system; I think there are five of these in London under the auspices of, I think it is, New Zealand—either that or Australia—little clinics where a soldier who has exposed himself to this inspection can go and be treated at once. I do not think we shall have much difficulty in extending that in this country, because we have, as a matter of fact, under one or two Acts, established clinics in this country.

CHAIRMAN: Yes, under the Local Government Board.

Mr. MACPHERSON: Consequently, we are going to approach the authorities to extend that, as the Dominions have asked us to do it, to all the populous towns in the country.

And the other point which they are very insistent upon is the point which was discussed by Mr. Rowell and Mr. Massey. It is largely the point mentioned by the Home Secretary—namely, getting rid of women who infest the streets. We have looked at that question from every point of view, and it is really a much more difficult and delicate and dangerous question than it looks at first hand. As the Home Secretary pointed out, solicitation with annoyance is an offence, but we have no control over any woman, even in the neighbourhood of camps, provided she behaves herself, unless we know her to be a prostitute who has had one conviction against her; but I think we have statistics to show that we are making very effective and efficient use of the power we have. I do not know how we could extend that power—it is extremely difficult—but at the next Conference we are going seriously to attempt in some way or other to extend that power.

The other thing we have done since the Imperial War Conference met last year is to place Maisons Tolérées in France out of bounds for our troops. It was said that our American Allies, at the moment they landed in France, placed the Maisons Tolérées out of bounds for their troops, but at the last Conference we found that that was not so. They had placed them out of bounds for their troops at the base ports, but they had not so far placed them out of bounds for their troops in the towns in the interior of France. I understand that that question was left to each individual commanding officer in any particular town, and those commanding officers had exercised their discretion, and in the majority of cases the commanding officer had exercised his discretion in not placing these Maisons Tolérées out of bounds. General Bethell, who came from France with Bishop Brent as representing the American Army in France, assured us that General Pershing was going to place all Maisons Tolérées out of bounds for American troops. We had a French representative there, and we were hopeful that all the Allies would take this step, but instead of that, we were told by the French representative that they were really making their Maisons Tolérées more perfect, and the way in which they were making them more perfect was by having increased inspection of the women, and Professor Gougerod, who came, made it perfectly plain to us that he and the French authorities whatever they may have thought in the past, now thought that venereal disease could be decreased in one way, and in one way only—namely, by having Maisons Tolérées, strictly regulated, made open for their troops. I do not know that there is anything I can usefully add.

Mr. ROWELL: But are not certain sections of London practically "Maisons Tolérées" without inspection?

Mr. MACPHERSON: I think not. We have no Maisons Tolérées in the accepted sense.

Mr. ROWELL: But without the accepted sense—it is all round the city.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I assume, Mr. Macpherson, there is no possibility of the system in France being introduced into England?

Mr. MACPHERSON: No.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Neither is there in our country. So that it looks to me, in connection with this very troublesome matter, that all we can hope for, so far as oversea countries are concerned, is that the amended legislation, which could not get through the House of Commons on the last occasion, may get through soon, so as to give greater power here. After all, the people in our country, especially the parents of young men who come across here, recognise that as long as the attractiveness between the sexes is in existence—and it will be until the Day of Judgment—there are going to be great risks of disease being spread in a percentage of cases. There is no doubt whatever about that. But they are very much concerned at the reports that keep coming out from private people as to the conditions which are said to exist here. Now if these conditions which are reported through private channels to exist do not exist, some authoritative statement made by a responsible Minister in the House of Commons, or someone else in authority, would go a long way towards reassuring them. As a matter of fact, we heard of cases, when we were in France the other day, of a number of men from various countries who had deliberately gone over the top with the intention of not coming back in consequence of suffering from this terrible disease to which we are referring—men who learned their cases were incurable. There is nothing more sad, from the point of view of the relatives of men, either in the British Isles or who have come from all the oversea countries, travelling thousands of miles for the purpose of taking part in this fight against the enemy—there is nothing more sad to contemplate than these relatives being in doubt, or having suspicion of their dear ones returning to their country permeated with this disease, which is certainly going to be handed on and to have ruinous results for many years to come.

In connection with the introduction of the C.D. Act, I want to say this frankly, if you are to have a C.D. Act placed upon the Statute Book, and men and women are to be treated exactly alike, as they should be, then there will be institutions required of such size to cope with the disease as to make it almost impracticable. We had a C.D. Act on our Statute Book at one time, but public opinion was so strong against it that we were compelled to repeal it. I am not at all sure you should not legislate in this country to have decency in the streets and elsewhere with regard to a large number of women insisted on. Some of these men who are out in France seven or eight months, when they come over here see many women half naked. That has arisen during the last four or five years. I do not know whether it meets the visual ideas of a lot of people in this country, or any other country, to find women as near naked as they possibly can be; but we find men who have been across, and they come over here from hardships in France—

CHAIRMAN: Can you tell us, for the information of the Home Office, in what parts of London these women appear in streets improperly dressed?

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I do not say improperly dressed.

CHAIRMAN: Not dressed at all.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: No, but I say the development of fashion appears to be in the direction of allowing—

CHAIRMAN: You need not go into the London streets to find that.

13th Day.]

TEMPTATIONS OF OVERSEA TROOPS.

[19 July 1918.]

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I am talking about the skimpy dress fashions, and I say the effect of that, having regard to sex attractiveness, on men who have been away for a long time, and then they come across here and have this sort of thing placed before their noses practically all over London is, in my opinion, a factor for a part of the trouble that has arisen. I may say that I fully recognise that the people in authority here and the British public are just as concerned and just as desirous as any portion of the Empire to suppress this dangerous disease and the causes that give rise to it. Now if there could be some sensible educative propaganda put into operation by mothers, so as to prevent the exposure of a great portion of the bodies of some of those young women, I believe it would do a great deal of good. It has a tendency to make these men believe that everything is being held out by way of inducement to them, publicly and semi-publicly, and that is a question which has caused a very great deal of discussion amongst sensible women in this country, and in our own country too.

At all events, the information I would like to get to-day on the point of the effects of venereal disease upon our men is this, I would like to have something, if possible, from the Army and from the Navy as to what reduction, if any, there has been since we were here last in cases of venereal disease. That is to say, what is the proportion now as compared to what it was a year ago among those men who are serving on the land and on the sea? If it is a diminishing proportion, it would be very satisfactory to the public to know that. I am sure our people would like to know. I certainly should for one.

General GOODWIN: I am afraid it will be impossible to give the statistics for this year, because they are not out, and I have not got the figures by me; but I think I am correct in saying that in the year 1913 the percentage of venereal disease in the Army was 5·9 per cent.; but I am subject to correction.

Mr. MASSEY: Before the war.

General GOODWIN: The year before the war. Last year the percentage was 2·3. That is subject to correction. I have not got the figures here.

Mr. BURTON: That is quite contrary to the impression which has been conveyed to us abroad, where we are told—I do not say authoritatively, but in a broad, general way—that, owing to war conditions, there has been a very great spread of these diseases.

General GOODWIN: I have not heard it authoritatively.

Mr. MACPHERSON: It is remarkable, when you remember that the Army was supposed to be a segregation camp for this particular disease, that now the proportion in the Army is less than in civil life, or in any profession at the present moment.

Mr. LLOYD: I did not catch that statement. Would you mind repeating it?

Mr. MACPHERSON: The proportion of this disease in the Army is very much less than in any other profession, or among the general population.

Mr. LLOYD: What is the percentage in the general population? How is it determined that it is less?

Mr. MACPHERSON: The statistics can be given.

Mr. LLOYD: We have a general statement that in the Army the percentage is less. What I am asking for is the evidence on which that statement is based.

Mr. MACPHERSON: It has been stated to me time and again.

General GOODWIN: The evidence of recruits coming up for examination. Our experience is that it is less. America has had the same experience. Hundreds of thousands of troops came up in America, and the American public was absolutely horrified to find that venereal disease was enormously more rife in the civil population than it was in the Army.

Mr. MACPHERSON: It will interest you to know that in the first draft 390 out of every 1,000 were infected with this disease in America.

CHAIRMAN: Does that mean infected by actual infection or hereditary disease? Our Royal Commission, which sat for a long time, found that 1 in 10 had a syphilitic taint, and 1 in 10 had a gonorrhoeal taint, and that includes hereditary

19 July 1918.]

TEMPTATIONS OF OVERSEA TROOPS.

[13th Day.]

as well as personally-acquired disease. But the figures and revelations in that Report are of profound interest and instruction as to the real truth in these cases. I think that the report as to the great increase in the number of cases is due to the fact that the sort of cases quoted by Sir Robert Borden last year, and by Mr. Rowell to-day, and by the Prime Minister of New Zealand and others, were cases where a young fellow, clean, healthy, and everything that one desires, comes over here and, unfortunately, gets the disease. His case becomes notorious; he probably gives way to great depression, and his family probably hear of it, and every one of such cases bulks very largely. But the actual number, I think, has decreased, and the Admiralty figures, I believe, are even lower than the Army. What the state of things amongst civilians is, I do not know.

Mr. LLOYD: I ask whether there are any figures available with reference to the percentage of disease amongst those enlisting from the civilian population.

General GOODWIN: I could get them for you, I have no doubt, from the National Service Ministry.

Mr. LLOYD: What is your recollection of them?

General GOODWIN: I cannot tell you.

Mr. LLOYD: Is it larger?

General GOODWIN: I believe that there is a very large number observed every day. If you ask me for figures, it is impossible to give them, because venereal disease is not a notifiable disease, and when a man is suffering from venereal disease—

Mr. LLOYD: That is not what I am inquiring about. I am inquiring about recruits who come from civil life, and what I want to get at is the percentage of the recruits that are infected with these diseases.

Mr. MACPHERSON: We will do everything we can to provide you with the figures.

Mr. LLOYD: You see the importance of it. The importance is this: that it may remove absolutely the charge that the Army is a chief means of conveying this disease to the nation at large.

Mr. MACPHERSON: It is very much the reverse.

Mr. LLOYD: I do not wish to take away the strength of the statement made by Sir Robert Borden, who probably was justified, but I have heard a similar statement made with regard to Montreal. A general statement is of little value. We want to get down to the exact facts.

CHAIRMAN: The best plan would be for you to ask in writing for any figures which you would like to have. Mr. Macpherson undertakes on the part of the War Office to supply the figures they have got.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: There is one point Mr. Macpherson referred to which is very important, and I should like to be perfectly certain that it is not understood by me in a wrong way, because I want to use it in our country if necessary. I understand him to say that before joining the Army 390 out of 1,000 were infected.

Mr. MACPHERSON: That is the first draft from the United States.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: 390 out of 1,000.

Mr. MACPHERSON: The draft army—not the regular army.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: But do you know what proportion of any drafts sent out from here of civilians suffer in the same way?

Mr. MACPHERSON: I could not say that straight off.

General GOODWIN: I doubt if it could be got.

Mr. MACPHERSON: I think it is right also to state, since I gave that figure, that the percentage now is something like 1·5 in the American Army.

Mr. ROWELL: 1·5 as compared with what figure?

Mr. MACPHERSON: I do not know what the figure was in the American Regular Army.

Mr. BURTON: In the first draft from America there were 390 men in every 1,000 infected. That is a fearful figure.

Mr. MACPHERSON: Yes, it is; but we got those figures from General Ireland.

General GOODWIN: It was very shocking to Americans to find that the American civil population was infinitely more affected than the Army or Navy.

Mr. MACPHERSON: They have decreased that to a very small proportion now.

Mr. LLOYD: I have heard precisely the same sort of charges made by naval officers against civil authorities—that certain ports were centres of infection of their crews.

Mr. ROWELL: There is no complaint made against the Army. So far as the situation is concerned, I imagine that in all the countries concerned we are only commencing to realise how widespread and dangerous the disease is.

Mr. MACPHERSON: Mr. Lloyd's point is a good one. The statement should be suppressed that the Army in this country is a purveyor of this disease. In fact, it is nothing of the kind.

Mr. ROWELL: That is true in the sense that the percentage, you say, of the civil population is greater; but it is none the less true that every man who becomes infected, and who might not have become infected if proper and reasonable precautions had been taken, does become a purveyor of the disease, and of all the evil consequences that follow. So far as our troops are concerned, I think they would compare favourably, as regards the incidence of venereal disease, with any other troops in any Army, and no doubt they compare very favourably with the civilian population. I think our officers are doing everything in their power to meet the situation, and it is not from the standpoint of the Army that we feel there is ground of complaint. Our complaint is from the standpoint of the continued permission to these women to infest the streets and go around the camps. We feel there should be further preventive measures taken against that.

Mr. MACPHERSON: There is this point to remember, that in the Army the disease is practically a notifiable one. Unless it is notified, the soldier is penalised, as I say, very severely.

Mr. ROWELL: That is true, of course, in the Army; not only is it notifiable, but preventive, and remedial measures are taken in the Army that are not taken in the civil population. And it is because of those measures that you have produced the results you have in the Army as compared with the civil population.

CHAIRMAN: Of course, there is a most extraordinary difficulty here. Take Salisbury Plain, the Southern Command, where I live. There is an extraordinary difficulty, because there are a large number of towns which have nothing to do with the Command. No troops are located in them, and they have no connection whatever with the military command, and however much women are hunted out of the area where there is jurisdiction, they take refuge in adjoining towns and villages. And I can speak from personal experience; we have had the utmost difficulty, and we have done our best to root them out. But we have had to deal with most extraordinary cases, in which women have established private brothels, and have brought their daughters from service, and have collected other girls there, and it is extraordinarily difficult for the police to find out that this is going on. So far as the communication of venereal disease takes place, the evil has been done before the discovery that the brothel is set up by these dreadful women. Often you have the utmost difficulty in dealing with it. It is hard to find evidence. The soldiers disappear; they will probably bicycle 18 or 20 miles to this village for some reason—they may know of the existence of this place, or they may go there for another purpose; but it is extraordinarily difficult for the military authorities to control it. They cannot be held responsible, and the civilians who are responsible, as the Conference knows, for the care of the counties—it has nothing to do with the Home Office—our county committees—do everything they can to hound these places out, but it is extraordinarily difficult; it is outside military jurisdiction, and it may be 8 or 10 miles from the military camp; the officer commanding the district has no control. All he can do is to say that soldiers resort to a particular place, and when we have found it out—I could give specific instances—we have turned the people out. In some cases we have even had to run the risk of being prosecuted for libel, but we have had them out, and we have hounded them out of the county so far as we can. But the difficulties are enormous, and I believe a great deal more has been done by both military and civil authorities in this country than people realise.

Colonel RAFFAN: They simply move from one area to another. They are shifted from Salisbury Plain area and go to another camp, and they may be three months there before they are discovered.

Mr. BURTON: What is the state of things in the Navy?

Sir WILLIAM NORMAN: I have no figures, but, generally speaking, the disease has not been more prevalent than it was in peace time. Amongst our own Bluejackets it has been rather less so. Of late years we have had a lot of trawlers and fishermen, and there is a certain amount of disease amongst them, but it is not excessive. The men are all given periodical lectures, too, and each man on joining the Service gets a card which points out the consequences of the disease and its symptoms. As far as it is possible, we give them ablution rooms. Amongst our own men of the Grand Fleet it is less because they have not so much leave; but at some of the bases it is perhaps a little more. I have not the exact percentage.

Mr. BURTON: You do not remember approximately what the figures are?

Sir WILLIAM NORMAN: I think it is about two. It can be obtained.^o The other day in getting a report in from Portsmouth, where the disease was much less than the quarter before, the Medical Officer attributed the decrease to the ablution rooms and the clinics which have been established at Portsmouth. In addition to the medical establishment, when, 14 years ago, I was at the barracks at Eastney, I started the ablution method there in the barracks, just inside the drill shed. The men were brought up to us as they came off parade, the recruits, and we told them in a few plain words what they were liable to. Day and night the light was kept burning in the shed, and disinfectants put there, and I hear at the present time, and I think General Aston will bear me out—

General ASTON: I can give the figure for nine months last year: five cases contracted the disease in Portsmouth out of 3,750 men, as far as I can remember.

Sir WILLIAM NORMAN: That only shows what can be done, and that system we are trying to bring in all over the Navy. But now we are extending our ablution rooms, are making them larger and are providing separate places for petty officers and men, with medical officers in charge of them. And lectures are always given, and have been for years.

CHAIRMAN: I do not know whether we can carry it further. Does the Conference wish to pass a Resolution, or leave the matter as it is in the hands of the authorities here? The result of the discussion has been to make it quite apparent that the Conference hold the same views as they held last year, and are extremely anxious that every effort should be made to exterminate this foul pest from the country. Whether the Conference will be satisfied with that, or will wish to pass a Resolution, I do not know.

Mr. ROWELL: I think the way in which you have summed up, Mr. Long, fairly states the situation—unless Mr. Massey thinks a Resolution should follow.

Mr. MASSEY: No, I do not think so.

Mr. ROWELL: Let me ask one question before we pass from this, Mr. Long. As I read the report of the proceedings of the last Conference, I think it was General Childs, or perhaps one of the other officers, pointed out that one of the difficulties here was that the penalty for soliciting was small, and that the effect was not really a deterrent—that the woman only needs to ply her trade a little more briskly in order to make up for the fine imposed, and that nothing less than a term of imprisonment would operate effectively.

Sir EDWARD HENRY: I may tell you that in a great number of cases they can only be fined.

^o The figure is approximately 3·50 per 1,000.

13th Day.] PREFERENCE TO EMPIRE RAW MATERIALS IN GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS. [19 July 1918.]

Mr. ROWELL: If that is the case, cannot some remedy be found for this? It means legislation, I recognise, but why should such legislation not be secured?

Mr. MACPHERSON: I spoke of it to the Home Secretary. I am trying to arrange a conference with him and the President of the Local Government Board—and I can assure you that the matter is not being lost sight of.

Sir EDWARD TROUP: It was one of the proposals in the Bill last session, and I think it was thrown out by a small majority.

Mr. ROWELL: It is still in the Bill this session?

Sir EDWARD TROUP: No, it is not in the Bill this session. It was thrown out in Committee.

Sir EDWARD HENRY: It has been pointed out that the real danger arises, not from the prostitute, but from the "irregular."

Mr. ROWELL: I understand the figures indicate that substantially 70 per cent. of the cases come from the casual rather than from the common prostitute, but I think it will be found that a substantial number of the cases of first contact, when men come to the city, arise from open solicitation, these men are subjected to conditions and environment from which they have been wholly free before, and especially after a man has taken a glass or two of liquor, he may, under the conditions of open solicitation, be started upon a course which ends up in his contracting the disease. This open solicitation we think should be stopped.

CHAIRMAN: May we consider this discussion closed?

Preference to Empire Raw Materials in Government Contracts.

(See pp. 169–173 of [Cd. 9177].)

The part in [] was omitted from p. 172 of [Cd. 9177].

Mr. HEWINS: * * * All the evidence we have shows there is very great willingness here to act upon that principle, and my opinion is that you can give very good preference in that way.

[CHAIRMAN: Where there was departure from this principle during the war, I think it was entirely due to the tonnage question. We discussed it last year, and this is partly a consequential action of His Majesty's Government upon the Resolution of last year; and the other part is found in the action of the same Committee on Trade Relations which recommended a preference of 33½ per cent. upon all dutiable articles, and that the same preference of 33½ per cent. should be levied upon articles upon which duties might be imposed in the future; but we inserted a proviso that it was not desirable that a duty should be imposed upon an article not dutiable at present, solely with the object of enabling us to grant preferences. This recommendation, which was unanimously made by the Committee over which I had the honour of presiding, has been considered by His Majesty's Government and by the Cabinet, and has received definite and final approval; and that fact was announced here the other day; the Chancellor made the announcement that the Government had decided in favour of it, and I think the announcement has been made in Parliament that we have definitely adopted, in addition to an administrative preference policy, a policy of preference within the Empire, and we have practically decided what form it is going to take.]

Mr. MASSEY: Is it going to be given legislative effect in the near future?

CHAIRMAN: I imagine so, as soon as possible. It really requires imposition of duties.

Mr. MASSEY: Does not that require legislation?

CHAIRMAN: Yes, as far as the Finance Act is concerned.

Mr. MASSEY: It is impossible to impose duties without legislation? I know it is so with us.

CHAIRMAN: Yes, you have to put it into the Budget Bill—into the Finance Act.]

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I had not this report in my hands, &c., &c.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

[13th Day.]

Order of Business.

CHAIRMAN: Before the Conference adjourns, may I ask their consideration of our Agenda for next week. There has been a general desire expressed that we should, if possible, conclude our labours by the end of next week, and I think, if we are going to do this, it will be necessary to have sittings in the afternoons as well as in the mornings, and, of course, there will be a good deal of pressure to get through some of the items, especially as I understand that on Monday we shall have some difficulty owing to the absence of the representatives of Australia. Again, there have been several important questions referred to Committees, and I will tell the Conference how these stand. The Raw Materials Committee have done the greater part of their work, but there are 19 reports, and the printing involved is extremely heavy, and I doubt whether the reports can be ready before the middle of next week at the earliest. The next meeting of the Committee has got to be fixed, and it would be a great convenience if it could be settled to-day. Then the Shipping Committee is fixed for five on Monday; it has had to be deferred once already, and I am rather doubtful whether the questions submitted to it will not after all have to be remitted to a special Committee, as proposed by the Board of Trade. The Aliens Committee have agreed to recommend the dropping of most of the items, but the first item, Naturalization, remains, and I understand the Prime Minister of New Zealand proposes to submit a resolution on that subject. Then this afternoon the Committee on Reciprocity with India is to meet, and this is a subject to which the Indian representatives attach enormous importance. I think I may venture to say on behalf of the other members of the Conference that we are all very much indebted to India for the reticence and self-denial which they have exercised, which have enabled us to proceed with other business and to get on as far as we have. It is not that they do not feel very strongly about a great many questions, or that they have not got special subjects to introduce, but, with a genuine desire to advance business and help us in every way, they have treated us with very great generosity. That makes it all the more incumbent upon us to see that this question, to which they attach immense importance, is properly discussed, and it seems impossible to discuss it properly unless all the Dominions are represented; and I am saying this in order that India may, as far as possible, receive full consideration for a case in which she is profoundly interested. Then it is proposed that we should conclude our Conference, if possible, on Friday afternoon by passing a Loyal Address to the King, which I understand His Majesty will be graciously pleased to receive at Buckingham Palace at 5.30 that afternoon, and if the Conference agrees, I will have a draft of the proposed Address ready on Monday.

Mr. BURTON: I do not know how many subjects there are left on the Agenda paper, but are we bound to consider them all?

CHAIRMAN: I have a list somewhere. Everything is on this Agenda (handing it to Mr. Burton).

Mr. MONTAGU: As to the Pacific question, is that raised by Australia or New Zealand?

CHAIRMAN: Australia and New Zealand. They both take an active interest.

Mr. MASSEY: Is there a motion?

CHAIRMAN: There is no Resolution handed in yet. This list exhausts everything now left.

Mr. ROWELL: I know it is the view of Sir Robert Borden, Mr. Long, that the Admiralty Memorandum had better be discussed confidentially by members of the different Governments with the Admiralty. I think the form of Resolution passed at the last Conference was to the effect that the Admiralty should be requested to prepare a memorandum which should be communicated to the different Governments for their consideration* and suggestions; and as to the Memorandum† which has just now been presented, I know the view of the Dominion of Canada is that our Government has not had opportunity to give it consideration, and that we would prefer discussing the matter with the Admiralty before there is any discussion here, and before we could feel that any discussion could be of much use in the Conference.

* See page xli. of Dominions No. 62.

† See p. 349.

CHAIRMAN: You propose a discussion with the Admiralty in substitution for a discussion here?

Mr. ROWELL: We do not feel that progress can be made, so far as Canada is concerned, by discussion here. If it comes up for discussion in the Conference, we shall have to take the position that we should follow the procedure outlined in the Resolution of last Conference and discuss the Admiralty Memorandum between our own Government and the Admiralty before we discuss it here at the Conference.

CHAIRMAN: We need not do anything for the present, because this matter does not come on till Friday. The First Lord is away, and I shall be glad if it is decided to hold the discussion confidentially with the Admiralty authorities; it will relieve us; but, of course, I am entirely in the hands of the Conference.

Mr. ROWELL: Do I understand the Australian members will not be here on Monday?

CHAIRMAN: Not till the afternoon.

Mr. BURTON: Will that affect our sitting in the morning?

CHAIRMAN: I think Mr. Cook will be here.

Mr. ROWELL: Sir Robert Borden suggested to me that further consideration of the Resolution for the creation of an Imperial Court of Appeal might be given on Monday, but it could not come up if Mr. Hughes will be away. I assume it will therefore come up on Wednesday.

CHAIRMAN: May I take it that you adopt the general sketch I have given of our business as stated in the paper which has been circulated, and my proposal with regard to an address to the King? The Raw Materials Committee meets on Tuesday at 10.15.

Sir S. P. SINHA: In fixing the questions of reciprocity between India and the Dominions for Monday, I do not know whether you have borne in mind that the Australian representatives, who were not here last year so far as I know, are not able to be present.

CHAIRMAN: Mr. Cook will be present on Monday morning, and both of the Australian representatives in the afternoon. Sir Robert Garran will attend for Australia this afternoon. You will represent Australia, Sir Robert?

Sir ROBERT GARRAN: Yes.

Sir S. P. SINHA: There is no Committee on Raw Materials this afternoon?

CHAIRMAN: No. General Aston has asked me to say that there is a map in the War Cabinet Room, No. 2, Whitehall Gardens, specially marked with the results of yesterday's fighting on it, in case anybody wishes to see it.

FOURTEENTH DAY.

Monday, 22nd July 1918.

THE IMPERIAL WAR CONFERENCE MET AT THE COLONIAL OFFICE AT 11 A.M.

The names of those present are printed on pp. 174, 175 of [Cd. 9177].

Demobilization.

CHAIRMAN: Demobilization is the first subject which is raised, and it is raised by your Government, Sir Robert Borden.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It will not take a great deal of time.

CHAIRMAN: Mr. Macpherson cannot come, but Sir Reginald Brade is here, and will represent the War Office. So we had better begin. We will take Demobilization, raised by Canada.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The general question of demobilization was considered last year, and a Resolution was passed on the subject, which did not, however, go very much into detail.* But, apart from that Resolution, there was a discussion on the subject, and it was generally agreed that it presented very difficult and serious questions. The mother-country and each of the Dominions of the Empire, India as well, must, of course, deal with those problems in so far as they specially relate to the part of the Empire in question. One question upon which we desired information and consideration was that relating to the return and transportation of troops from the various theatres of war to their own country, as to whether or not they shall come back according to the length of service, or by classes of occupations, or whether their priority of return shall depend on whether they are married or single. All these are questions which, I suppose, each Dominion must deal with for itself. The transportation of the troops which Canada sent to the front cannot be effected, so far as we can learn, in less than about nine months, and it is possible that it might occupy a very much longer period. It seems desirable, therefore, that in the immediate future some consideration should be given upon consultation between the authorities here and the Governments of each Dominion and of India as to the provision of shipping which shall be made, how it shall be allocated, and what principles shall be followed in its allocation. It is a matter of great importance to us as to whether our troops shall return to Canada within nine months or two years, which has been spoken of as a possible period over which transportation might take place. I am not aware as to whether or not any consideration has been given to this aspect of the subject, which is very important from our standpoint.

The subjects which have been confidentially put forward by the Canadian military authorities as proper to be taken into consideration in the future are the following:— (1) The ships to be made available for transportation during armistice, of the wives and dependents of members of the overseas forces. (2) The ships to be made available for transportation of Canadian troops on cessation of hostilities. (3) The allotment of berthing and such other accommodation as may be required at ports of embarkation in England and France. (4) The allotment of suitable concentration camps in England and France for Canadian troops. (5) The provision of facilities for a limited cross-channel service for Canadians during demobilization. (6) The arms, munitions, equipment, stores, and animals to be taken by Canadian troops to Canada. (7) The disposition to be made on demobilization of surplus arms, munition equipment, stores, and animals. (8) The occupation of Canadian troops during their enforced stay in England and France pending embarkation.

We did discuss last year, in a very confidential way, the occupation of the troops of the various Dominions of the Empire during the period they might be required to remain in France or in Great Britain, before they could embark for their own Dominion. It was universally recognised, at that time, that this question presented very serious difficulties. Since then, in our Dominion, and, doubtless, in other Dominions of the Empire, there has been a movement towards the establishment of educational facilities by which men can be instructed in various occupations, including agriculture, and doubtless they might receive instruction during any period while the war is being carried on, when their services were not actually required for fighting or other purposes. Possibly this movement might be extended, so as to be of service to Dominion troops after the cessation of the war, and during the period for which they must remain before they can embark to their own country.

However, I have indicated the subjects, and our purpose in bringing the matter to the attention of the Conference is not to move any Resolution, but rather to have a discussion so as to obtain the views of the authorities in the mother-country and the oversea Dominions and India, and to obtain information particularly upon the question of shipping and other facilities for embarkation.

CHAIRMAN: Is anybody going to speak on this matter?

Mr. MASSEY: We discussed this at considerable length last year, and passed a Resolution, but, as a matter of fact, the Resolution was so colourless that it was practically of no value, except on one point, and that point was that soldiers from the oversea Dominions desiring to visit the United Kingdom before going back to their own country, and not having had the opportunity of doing so, should get furlough for that purpose.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not think that was expressed in the Resolution.

Mr. MASSEY: Oh, yes. The Resolution agreed by the Conference was: "It was agreed that all Dominion contingents in France should start as soon as possible with their equipment from a French or Belgian port, but arrangements will be made to give individual soldiers desiring to visit this country furlough for that purpose."

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes.

Mr. MASSEY: The Resolution does not apply in any way to the soldiers serving on other fronts than the Western front. It does not apply, for instance, to the soldiers serving in India, or Palestine, or Mesopotamia. Their case must be dealt with separately. But there was an understanding arrived at, so far as we were concerned—I am speaking specially, of course, of New Zealand. Demobilization is probably of more importance to New Zealand in proportion to its population than to any of the other Dominions, because we happen to be the furthest away from Europe. What we arranged was this—and, as I say, I am now speaking on behalf of New Zealand only, not of what took place at the Conference, but on conferring with the General in Command of the New Zealand Forces in England, General Richardson and myself agreed that, if it was possible to arrange it, our troops should go back in the order in which they arrived—that is to say, those which came first should go first. We thought that would be more satisfactory than any other arrangement we could possibly make. We require New Zealand traders for carrying them, we do not depend on the ships which were specially requisitioned for carrying troops. I suppose half our troops are carried by the ordinary oversea trading ships, and we propose to utilise them when demobilization takes place for carrying the troops back. Each of these ships will carry 1,000 to 1,500 men, probably more than that number. And if special arrangements are made, we think that will be the best way to get our troops back. If we are able to commence directly the war comes to an end and peace arrangements are carried out—and I do not think there will be any difficulties placed in the way by the Imperial Government—we can get our troops away in from six to nine months; that is our estimate, and I do not think it is too optimistic, of course taking them through the Panama Canal, which is a little shorter than the route which was used before its opening.

Then Sir Robert Borden spoke of utilising the time of the men between the end of the war and when they depart to their own countries in giving them instruction with regard to the occupations which they will probably take up when they return. I am glad to say that, as far as New Zealand is concerned, we have already made a commencement, and, I think, a very good commencement, at our two camps in England, one at Hornchurch, and one—in a small way—at Oatlands, not far from Walton, where these men, and especially those—and it applies to them more than to any others—who have been partially incapacitated, and who could not go back to the occupations they previously followed, are being trained. We are giving them, there, instruction in the callings they select to take up, such as acquaintance with electrical machinery, agriculture, horticulture, and so on. My colleague and myself were down there the other day, and they showed us a man being instructed in horticulture; others were under instruction in shorthand and typewriting, men who had lost one hand—there were several of these—and, as far as we were able to judge, they were doing particularly well. The men, as we could see for ourselves, were taking the subjects up quite enthusiastically, and were giving great satisfaction to the officers who were instructing them. If any of the members of the Conference, any of the Dominion representatives, would like to go to Hornchurch or to Oatlands, I am sure General Richardson will be very glad to arrange accordingly.

I do not know that there is anything else I can say, Mr. Long. Each country, of course, has its own requirements and difficulties with regard to getting its troops back, and I take it that each country will make its own arrangements.

Mr. COOK: Hardly that.

Mr. MASSEY: We expect to be assisted by the Imperial Government, and any difficulties removed; that is not, I think, too much to ask or expect. But what we arrived at last year was that our troops, those from Australia and New Zealand, who want to come to England in the way of furlough, who have not had the opportunity, should have the chance of doing so.

Mr. COOK: I should like to hear a statement as to what is the present position of affairs from the point of view of the War Office. Can we have that?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: As to the facilities for transportation?

Mr. COOK: As to the Dominion problem as a whole.

Mr. LLOYD: I think that would be far better; I do not think that any good purpose would be served by going the round of the representatives of the Dominions and asking their opinions.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The root of the matter with us is this question of transportation, and we want to know what the arrangements are.

CHAIRMAN: Is it the wish of the Conference that Sir Reginald Brade should tell us what he has to say on the part of the War Office, especially with regard to tonnage?

Sir REGINALD BRADE: Of course, the War Office interest in this matter is to see that the military process of demobilization is carried out effectually. There is also a reconstruction side to demobilization, and that is being worked out in conjunction with the War Office. But the civil authorities are more concerned with that; it is their business. With regard to the problems which have been raised by Sir Robert Borden and Mr. Massey, they are all problems that we are struggling with ourselves. And in regard to transportation, I do not think that the War Office can settle that, but they are trying to work it out in conjunction with the Ministry of Shipping. But it all depends on the position of the armies, and the state of the tonnage when the war comes to an end and the process of demobilization commences. It is very difficult to say—I do not know whether there is a representative of the Ministry of Shipping here, and I do not know whether they would be in a position to say very much on that subject now. As I say, we are struggling with these problems, and I could not be of much assistance at the moment, as decisions cannot be reached finally in regard to the more important of those that have been referred to until we know more definitely the conditions in which demobilization will be conducted.

14th Day.]

CHAIRMAN: Would you like to have somebody over from the Ministry of Shipping?

Mr. MASSEY: I think it would be a very good thing.

Mr. LLOYD: Yes.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Perhaps it might be more useful if the Ministry of Shipping were to put their views in the form of a memorandum and circulate it to us.

Sir REGINALD BRADE: We could also help in a similar way by circulating a memorandum showing the manner in which we are endeavouring to deal with the Imperial troops, and solving the problems which have been raised, because they are all problems we have to solve for ourselves.

Mr. COOK: After all, the Imperial transport relates to the armies in the field; the Imperial side of it relates to questions of transport and the maintenance of the armies there until they get back. The rest, I take it, is our problem.

Sir REGINALD BRADE: Certainly.

Mr. LLOYD: One advantage of having a representative of the Ministry of Shipping here would be that we could discuss the matter with him. A memorandum would not have the same advantage.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It would, of course, have to be discussed afterwards. If the Ministry of Shipping is ready, we can discuss it now.

Mr. MONTAGU: You said, Sir Reginald, you were struggling with the problem of the conveyance of the Imperial troops. But have you not finished your struggle? Have you not arranged your plan? Have you not arranged to deal with so many troops per day?—and does not that mean that you have assured yourself of the tonnage which will be available?

Sir REGINALD BRADE: I think not. We have drawn up a scheme of the order in which men will come back into civil life, and we have made a rough calculation of the numbers that can be dealt with each day. We do not think we can pass more than a certain number, but we have not guaranteed that that number will come, because we do not know exactly where the neck of the bottle will be, whether it will be train facilities, ships, or wharfrage. The problem may be all three combined.

Mr. MONTAGU: But have you made an estimate of the amount of shipping you will require, and indented, as it were, upon this figure?

Sir REGINALD BRADE: No. That is being worked out, as far as it can be worked out, by our Movements Branch in association with the Ministry of Shipping, but I do not think we have developed any sure and final estimate.

General BURNETT-HITCHCOCK: The estimate for France is quite clear; we can work for a maximum coming from France. The estimate for those coming from Mesopotamia and from Egypt is not clear, owing to the lack of knowledge as to what shipping will be left. There is no difficulty with regard to France. The wharfrage accommodation is the factor there which governs everything. And we cannot know beforehand which ports we shall have, whether we can cross from Dunkirk, how far east and west we shall be, and what ports the French will allot to the Americans.

Mr. BURTON: That refers to shipping to bring men back to England.

Mr. LLOYD: I take it the American problem is intimately connected with your own, because, after all, wharfrage accommodation will be limited by what shipping can be afforded for the purpose by the Ministry of Shipping.

General BURNETT-HITCHCOCK: The calculations at present show that the wharfrage accommodation will be lower than the ship accommodation.

22 July 1918.]

DEMOBILIZATION.

[14th Day.]

Mr. LLOYD: I mean there will be an intimate connection between the British ships and the wharfrage accommodation allotted to the American Government troops.

Mr. COOK: There are troublesome questions, not the least of which will be, I should think, the doing of the fair thing by the Dominions. Mr. Massey spoke, just now, of getting all his men home in six to nine months. I hope he may.

Mr. MASSEY: If we have the ships we can do it.

Mr. COOK: I hope we may get ours home too, at the same time. The question is, how far one Dominion can get all its troops over, and that will depend very largely on how soon the whole problem is settled. After all, it is a combined problem, and there is always the question what is the fair thing to do amongst the Dominions, as well as the problem which relates itself to the Imperial side of things. There are a lot of factors which cannot be settled in the present uncertain state of things. For instance, the Peace Conference may last many months.

Mr. MASSEY: That is not included in my six or nine months.

Mr. COOK: You have all the armies in the field. I do not know whether the Imperial authorities have considered that aspect of it, but it is a very serious problem what to do with all those armies for, perhaps, a prolonged period which, I can readily understand, may be occupied in bargaining over terms of peace; and these troops will require to be kept there and fed for all that time. What is it proposed should be done with those troops during that time? Are they to stand to arms during all that time, or are they to be trained with a view to reconstruction or repatriation, whatever you choose to call it, during that interim period? These are questions which, I think, might give us all serious concern. We also have good men over here working at this problem of repatriation. It is quite clear that a useful beginning can be made over here, and I shall hope to avail myself of Mr. Massey's invitation to see what the New Zealand people are doing. We have one of our very best men working over here at the problem, in the person of Bishop Long. He is at work seeing what can be done in this respect, and only the other day I cabled over to our Minister of Repatriation asking him to cable the latest developments of his scheme with the view of seeing how far we could begin over here to get the soldiers ready by the time they arrive home. All these are problems, of course, which concern the Dominions only. These other questions, of transport and the maintenance of armies until they can be transported, as to what should be done with the troops while they are awaiting transportation, are matters, I think, which relate themselves to the efforts of the Imperial authorities, and cannot very well be settled without them. If the war lasts much longer I fancy this question of transport will begin to ease. Already we are getting ahead of the U-boat quite well, and transport facilities will, I think, begin to multiply; that is to say, there will be an accumulation of shipping again, which will be all to the good. But just how this shipping is to be allocated, what troops are to go, and where to, and what degree of priority is to be given to them, are all, as it seems to me, troublesome questions which will have to be considered later on. And it would be interesting, I think, to get what is in the minds of the Imperial authorities up till now. I think that since this Conference met before, and since these very useful statements were made by Sir Reginald Brade, we have been studying the question, and if we could know whether there are any fresh developments, or whether you yourself, Sir Reginald, are waiting to see what shipping will be available, it will help us very much. We want to get our men home as soon as we can, and we want to make them as fit as we possibly can, that they may on their arrival home get back to civil life as quickly as possible. As to this matter, a great deal can be done over here, it seems to me. For instance, there is that class of boys who came before their education was completed, men who came from schools, men who left their apprenticeships, men who left their colleges: they will all have to go back and begin again in many cases. That is a national problem. And it does appear to me that things can very well be gone into over here, so as to make a useful beginning with that end in view, and I am glad to hear that other Dominions are at work on this subject as we ourselves are. That is our side of the problem. We want to know from the Imperial authorities, if they can tell us, how long it will take, after peace is declared, before we can get our troops over. That is, after all, the essence of the question.

Sir REGINALD BRADE: I do not think we can say that until the shipping problem is clear, and other allied problems, such as wharfage and so on. That is the crux of the whole situation. We have our plans for getting our soldiers back according to the industrial needs after the war, and we are having arrangements made so that when the right time comes the right men can be got back first. A great amount of detail work is being done, and the whole of that information can very well be placed at the disposal of the Dominion authorities for what it is worth from their point of view. For instance, about occupation during demobilization, I understand Mr. Massey to say New Zealand is already doing something, and I think Australia has already a scheme at work.

Mr. COOK: Yes.

Sir REGINALD BRADE: We are also working out a scheme. Apart from the larger questions as to what the military situation will be when peace comes, whether there will be a long armistice or no armistice, I think nobody can say anything—the War Office cannot, nor can we here say anything very profitable—as to the shipping side of the problem, but we are working steadily, on detail after detail, upon various alternative assumptions. All those plans, and all that detailed information, can be readily placed at the disposal of the Dominion authorities, and it has occurred to us to make a suggestion that a co-ordinating committee might be formed to sit in more or less constant session here for the exchange of ideas, and for the exchange of information, and for the procuring of decisions readily; that would keep the subject in all its aspects before one body, and when that body came up against large questions of principle, then the various authorities, the Dominion and the Imperial authorities, could be asked for decisions. I do not know whether that suggestion would be of any use to this Conference. I have had it reduced to writing, and I think copies are available here for circulation.

Mr. MASSEY: Have you got it here?

Sir REGINALD BRADE: Yes.

The following draft Resolution was then circulated:—

"The Conference agrees that an Advisory and Executive Committee—to be known as the 'Military Demobilization Committee of the British Empire'—should be set up forthwith:—

(a) To consist of representatives of the military authorities of the Dominions and Colonies and of representatives of the War Office, under the chairmanship of the Secretary of State for War, or someone deputed by him, the secretariat of the committee to be provided by the Mobilization Directorate of the War Office;

(b) To consider all military questions of demobilization affecting both the Imperial and the Dominion or Colonial Governments by:—

- (i) making decisions in regard to matters of detail;
- (ii) submitting questions of principle which may arise from time to time to the Government or Governments concerned;
- (iii) arranging for the fullest interchange of information with regard to plans for demobilization.

(c) To sit, prior to demobilization, at such time as may be considered necessary by the chairman; during demobilization, as frequently as may be necessary to secure the complete mutual co-ordination of the Imperial and Dominion or Colonial demobilization procedure."

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Mr. Long, I take it that very little can be done in this Conference in addition to what was done at the last Conference. These Resolutions were proposed of a pretty wide nature on account of the uncertainty due to the shipping problems which are bound to arise at the end of the war. But there can be no doubt, as the result of interviews Mr. Massey and I had with the war authorities, that they think it best to work out a scheme of demobilization generally. General Richardson has worked out a scheme for us in connection with the demobilization of New Zealand soldiers. There is a very great deal going to depend, when the time comes, upon the distinct allocation of ships to particular Dominions for conveying their own troops back to their own countries. If there is going to be a scramble for ships in any way whatever, then it may very well be that the time estimated by the War Office will be extended. It was anticipated that the demobilization would be effected in six months, but it may be extended beyond that. But it has to be remembered that in addition to the ships belonging to each of the countries, there is going to be released immediately peace is declared—and I do not suppose there will be a long armistice—that large proportion of ships which have been withdrawn for war purposes now used by the Navy for purposes other than the conveyance of troops and supplies. A large number of those ships will be released, and it should be clearly understood that a portion of those, in addition to the ships belonging to each country, will be devoted to the purposes of taking back our troops.

This whole matter raises tremendous complications so far as New Zealand is concerned. If the time for demobilization is going to be extended from nine to 12 months, we are going to have a position in our country—I cannot speak of other countries—which will be of the most serious kind; and at this juncture something requires to be done to meet that situation, or else there is going to be trouble arising. The great alteration since the matter was discussed last year is the coming in of America with its millions of men who are coming over here. That is going to be an overriding factor in the obtaining of sufficient transport to convey the troops back quickly after the completion of war. We are in this position at the moment, so far as New Zealand is concerned—that a large number of our refrigerating steamers have been taken, upon which we are dependent, as a country producing articles which require to be conveyed by refrigerating steamers chiefly—indeed almost entirely—and we are in the position of having 24,000,000^l, or 25,000,000^l, of produce held up in our country now because of the diversion of our refrigerating steamers for the conveyance of American troops. I am not complaining of this at all, for I recognise its necessity; but I am pointing out that we are getting into a position in New Zealand which is going to embarrass the country if it is not met. I am of the opinion that in some way or other the Shipping Ministry—I regret it is not represented here to-day—ought at this juncture to consider seriously the position by giving authority for the building of refrigerating ships in order to take up our trade; because we have got to provide the whole of the money for war purposes in New Zealand, and we are in a very serious position. We are dependent upon the return from our produce in that country to enable us to carry on our share of the war expenses, and if, in addition to the diversion of our steamers to America now, at the end of the war we are to have them locked up for six to nine months conveying troops, and not being available for our refrigerated products, it will bring about a condition of things in that country which will be very serious—indeed, it is serious now. Both Mr. Massey and myself have made continuous representations about it, and I think the Shipping Ministry are doing all they can to meet it, but it is governed at present by the carrying men from America. But when this transportation starts, if we are going to have our ships used for transport purposes, they cannot be used for carrying refrigerated cargoes to England. I think the matter is of sufficient importance for this Conference, before it rises, to make representations to the Shipping Ministry as to the seriousness of the situation which has been created. We are at such a distance that it takes our steamers probably forty-five days to get here, and in all probability it takes them three to four months to do the round trip. Last month from New Zealand we had one steamer for the whole of the export of our produce from that country. There is a country which is providing a very large number of men in proportion to its population; it is maintaining its reinforcements right up to date, and it is providing a large amount of money locally for war purposes, and we are dependent upon an outlet for the produce of that country to enable us to carry on financially, and if it is suggested now that demobilization is going to have another three months added on to it, that is going very seriously to embarrass the people of New Zealand. I hope that the exigencies of the war, from the point of view of ships, may very soon, if not now, be able to allow a proportion of ships to be built with refrigerated space on board to enable that side of the work to be carried on; otherwise it is going to be very embarrassing. I have little to add to what was said on this matter last year.* That Resolution in a general sense conveyed as much as the Conference could convey. The coming in of America has made the difficulties greater, and I think that is all the more reason why, apart from the general scheme of demobilization, which appeared to me at the time to be a very good one, and I do not suggest it can be very much advanced now. The question of ships is the key of the whole position, and I do not see how the War Office can say what it is going to do until it is known what ships are to be available.

Mr. LLOYD: What we want is information as to what has actually been done, what principles have been laid down, and what principles must be laid down; and that we have not before us. Apparently there are some principles already laid down, but here is a proposal for an advisory and executive committee; that recommends itself, but still it does not go into the matter of the principles generally of demobilization. We should also know what preliminaries can be taken, what plans have been outlined or can be outlined, and with such information as that before us we shall have something to discuss. Otherwise it seems to me we are doing nothing but wasting our time.

Sir REGINALD BRADE: That was done after the last Conference, I think. We arranged to be in close touch with the representatives of the Dominions in this country, and we had a series of conferences from time to time. These have been in abeyance lately, I understand. However, all the latest information will be readily given, of course.

Mr. MASSEY: I think the setting up of a committee is a good idea, and it ought to be gone on with. As far as we are concerned, we are prepared to submit our representative right away. And the sooner it gets to work the better. The difficulty is that conditions and circumstances are continually changing; things are occurring which were not dreamed of, and could not possibly be anticipated, and a committee such as is suggested here would be better able to meet those difficulties than the members of the Conference themselves—very much better—and it would be of great assistance to the War Office in putting these views before them. I do not know whether we shall get a representative of the Shipping Ministry here.

CHAIRMAN: He will be here in a minute. He is on the way.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I should like to submit this draft Resolution to the Minister dealing with the organisation of the Canadian overseas military forces, Sir Edward Kemp, who is not present at the moment. The idea which is expressed in the draft Resolution seems a desirable one. The Resolution does not, however, directly touch in terms the question, which seems to me after all the important question, what ships are to be available, and how they are to be allocated? I hope that in considering the very important question of bringing the British troops back from France, with the kindred question of conveying the troops of the United States back to America as soon as can conveniently be arranged, the importance of the question from our standpoint will not be overlooked. We have had a very large number of men from all the Dominions taken away from their ordinary civil avocations. The problem of dealing with them after they have returned, and establishing them once more in civil life, is a very serious one, and in some of the Dominions no doubt it will be a very difficult problem. The manner of dealing with it will depend to some extent on the expedition with which the troops can be returned. In common with the other Dominions we have in Canada a Minister who devotes his attention to that question. We call him in Canada the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. In addition to that we have already begun the task, about a year ago, among the troops in Great Britain and France, of giving to them, so far as military exigencies will permit, training in various occupations, the occupations which they are likely to take up again, and, generally speaking, education in the broadest acceptance of the term. I have a printed Memorandum as to the proposals which have been embarked upon in respect of the Canadian forces, setting them forth in a general way; and I shall be very glad to furnish that Memorandum to the Government of the United Kingdom, and also to the Ministers from the various Dominions. I should be equally glad if they will be good enough to let us have any information in their possession with regard to the steps which they are taking for the same purpose. I am referring to the utilisation of every available effort while these men are overseas to re-educate them and to fit them for the work which they are likely to take up in civil life after the war has come to an end. I do not know whether Sir Reginald Brade can tell us—perhaps he cannot tell us—whether the Ministry of Shipping have made any study of the conditions which are likely to arise. I quite appreciate what he has said as to the impossibility of foreseeing all the contingencies with respect to transportation, but it seems to me that the subject should be studied; perhaps it has been studied, and in so far as the result of that study is available we should like to have it. Indeed, that was the principal purpose that I had in bringing the question to the attention of the Conference to-day.

Sir REGINALD BRADE: I think the Ministry of Shipping will do the best it can. As far as the problem of getting back the Imperial troops from France to this country is concerned, it is a different shipping problem from that of the long distance one. It is not a question of ocean transport.

[Mr. E. J. Foley, Director of Military Sea Transport, Ministry of Shipping, here entered the Conference Room.]

CHAIRMAN: Mr. Foley, who is Director of Military Sea Transport, has come over, and I gather that the main questions upon which the Conference desires to have some information from him upon are, first, has the Ministry of Shipping been able to ascertain what the available amount of shipping will be for demobilization; secondly, what principles have been laid down, if any, as to its allocation; and, thirdly, whether there is any prospect of releasing some of the shipping, which is specially required for the transport of produce, back to its original occupation? Those are the three questions which have been raised.

Mr. FOLEY: As regards the first question of the amount of shipping available on demobilization for repatriating troops, the only answer which the Shipping Controller can give is that he simply does not know what the facts will be when demobilization becomes a practical question, and it is impossible to give you an estimate of what tonnage will be available. As regards the second point—

Mr. LLOYD: Is there any chance of getting the present outlook as to what it will be?

Mr. FOLEY: What is at present being done is this: Each quarter the War Office give us a statement of the numbers of troops in the different theatres of war requiring repatriation to the various Dominions, and we take the tonnage as it is at that moment; these are the only facts we have, and we endeavour to fit those troops to the tonnage and arrive at an estimate of the time which will be taken to repatriate the men of the various Dominions. That is as far as we can get.

Mr. LLOYD: Cannot you give us that?

Mr. FOLEY: We do that quarterly, but, unfortunately, the statement is not ready. We have not the whole of the figures from the War Office. There is a meeting with the War Office to-morrow.

Mr. COOK: That is for the current quarter?

Mr. FOLEY: Yes.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It seems to me this might be suggested. If the war ended to-morrow we should know pretty well what shipping would be available for returning the troops to the various Dominions, as well as for bringing back the troops which are in France to the United Kingdom. You might perhaps assume, whether safely or not, that the shipping available at the conclusion of the war will not be less than at the present time. Whether that would be a safe assumption or not I do not know. Perhaps we might consider it safe. Then, if that is so, what allocation could be made of shipping for the purpose of taking back our troops? I thoroughly realise that the question is rendered more difficult by the fact that it cannot at present be perceived what number of troops from the United States will require transportation at the end of the war. That is a quantity which we cannot now estimate.

Mr. COOK: But there is no reason why a table could not be worked out.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No, I do not know why some kind of table could not be worked out.

Mr. FOLEY: It is not a question merely of the amount of shipping available: it is a question of its distribution, and at present a good deal of shipping is concentrated in the North Atlantic. Probably some of that could be diverted, but that depends on what the import programme, the cargo programme, at that time may be. The factors are very numerous.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Allocation is the main problem, and that is what we want to find out.

Mr. LLOYD: If we have a basis to start with, we know where we are, at all events, at present, and the varying factors can be altered when they come.

Mr. FOLEY: That is what we aimed at in the quarterly allocation, and it is rather a pity we were not able to get the first quarter done before this meeting.

Mr. LLOYD: It would have been helpful, because we could have a basis to start with.

Mr. FOLEY: We drew out some figures a little time ago when we made this proposal for quarterly allocation; we drew out what would be required by the Ministry of Shipping for repatriating the men, dividing the world into zones, and dealing with the tonnage in zones. It would be quite possible to circulate copies of that, but it is rather lengthy to go through at the Conference.

Mr. MASSEY: It would be a good thing to submit to the proposed committee.

Mr. FOLEY: It would give the committee some figures upon which to base its considerations.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Are the zones irrespective of the number of men who require to go back from the particular zones?

Mr. FOLEY: The number of men in each zone have been put together and against that the tonnage roughly available in that zone.

Mr. MASSEY: Is it intended to allocate ships in proportion to the distance as well as the number of men? That is an exceedingly important point.

Mr. FOLEY: The whole question of allocation depends not only on the repatriation of men, as Sir Robert Borden says, but upon the import programme at the moment—the necessity of importing food, raw materials, and so on.

Mr. MASSEY: I hope an opportunity will be given, Mr. Long, before this Conference breaks up, of our expressing an opinion on what has been going on with regard to the importation of food to Great Britain within the last six months. I am utterly dissatisfied with what has taken place and I consider that the country which Sir Joseph Ward and I represent has been very unfairly treated. I shall not go into details now, but I shall certainly have something to say later on.

Mr. COOK: I should like to suggest very strongly that the Conference should pass this proposal here for a committee, and I think there should be represented on this committee the Ministry of Shipping.

CHAIRMAN: It is proposed to amend the third line by putting in "and the Ministry of Shipping"

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I should like to defer it until three o'clock so that I can speak to our Ministers about this.

Mr. COOK: I also should like it to be left over.

Mr. LLOYD: When is it likely that you will have that table of information ready for circulation?

Mr. FOLEY: I think you can have it by the end of this week, sir. It will be rough, but it will give certain important data.

CHAIRMAN: You want India put in also.

Sir S. P. SINHA: Please.

[At this point the Conference adjourned and resumed at 3 p.m.]

CHAIRMAN: We adjourned in order that the different Governments should have time to consider the War Office Resolution and discuss it with their colleagues and officials. You have got the Resolution now.

General BURNETT-HITCHCOCK: Yes, I have got it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Are the India Office and the Ministry of Shipping added? We see no objection to this: we think it is a desirable resolution to pass. How many representatives are suggested? One from each Dominion?

Sir REGINALD BRADE: Do you think you want one, or two? You will let us know, of course.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think very likely we shall require two, one of them having some expert knowledge.

Sir REGINALD BRADE: Yes, quite so. We shall have experts from time to time, of course, as special subjects come up, and it might be necessary, and would be necessary to summon specialists from time to time in addition to the members.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes; we should probably have a standing expert representative, and it might be advisable to have a second representative; if it should be desired that each Dominion should have only one representative, one could act as an adviser or assessor.

Sir REGINALD BRADE: Yes.

CHAIRMAN: Does anybody else wish to ask any questions or make any suggestions before I put the Resolution? Perhaps I had better read the Resolution: "The Conference agrees that an Advisory and Executive Committee—
"to be known as the 'Military Demobilization Committee of the British Empire'—
"should be set up forthwith:—(a) To consist of representatives of the military "authorities of the Dominions and Colonies, and of representatives of the War
"Office, under the Chairmanship of the Secretary of State for War, or someone
"deputed by him; the secretariat of the Committee to be provided by the Mobiliza"tion Directorate for the War Office; (b) To consider all military questions of "demobilization affecting both the Imperial and the Dominion or Colonial Govern"ments"—had it not better be all the Governments, or do you leave out India?

Sir REGINALD BRADE: That is only a matter of drafting. I could make that fit in.

CHAIRMAN: Yes, it is only a matter of drafting—"by:—(i) making decisions
"in regard to matters of details; (ii) submitting questions of principle which may "arise from time to time to the Government or Governments concerned; (iii)
"arranging for the fullest interchange of information with regard to plans for "demobilization; (c) To sit, prior to demobilization, at such time as may be "considered necessary by the Chairman; during demobilization, as frequently as "may be necessary to secure the complete mutual co-ordination of the Imperial
"and Dominion or Colonial demobilization procedure."

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think it would be just as well to put in the word "general" before demobilization, because demobilization as a matter of fact is going on all the time. We have got 40,000 men back. Say in the last paragraph "prior to general demobilization."

CHAIRMAN: Yes, we put in the word "general" in the first line of section (c). Is the Conference prepared to adopt this Resolution as amended?

Mr. COOK: The Ministry of Shipping is in there, is it?

CHAIRMAN: Yes.

The Resolution as amended was carried in the following form:—

The Conference agrees that an advisory and executive committee—to be known as the "Military Demobilization Committee of the British Empire"—should be set up forthwith:—

(a) To consist of representatives of the Military authorities of the Dominions and Colonies, and of representatives of the War Office, India Office, and Ministry of Shipping, under the Chairmanship of the Secretary of State for War, or some one deputed by him; the secretariat of the Committee to be provided by the Mobilization Directorate of the War Office.

(b) To consider all military questions of demobilization affecting the various Governments concerned by:—

- (i) making decisions in regard to matters of detail;
- (ii) submitting questions of principle which may arise from time to time to the Government or Governments concerned;
- (iii) arranging for the fullest interchange of information with regard to plans for demobilization.

(c) To sit, prior to general demobilization, at such time as may be considered necessary by the Chairman; during demobilization, as frequently as may be necessary to secure the complete mutual co-ordination of the demobilization procedure of the various Governments concerned.

Order of Business.

CHAIRMAN: There is a Committee on Shipping which was fixed for 5 o'clock to-day, but the President of the Board of Trade has to be in the House of Commons, and he asks whether it could be deferred till 10 o'clock on Wednesday at the Board of Trade. I do not know who are members of it.

Mr. MASSEY: My Resolution is part of the business, I think. I have no objection.

CHAIRMAN: Then it will be at 10 o'clock on Wednesday at the Board of Trade.

Petroleum.

Now the next subject is Petroleum, in regard to which there is a Resolution. "The Conference takes note of the Memorandum on the question of Petroleum, and, having regard to the great and growing importance of petroleum and its products for naval, military, and industrial purposes, desires to commend the suggestions contained in the Memorandum to the serious consideration of the Governments concerned." The Memorandum is entitled "Petroleum Position of the British Empire."² It is written by Lord Harcourt, who has been good enough to come, and who is at present presiding over a Committee dealing with the whole future policy in connection with petroleum. He has been good enough to come, and I daresay the Conference would be glad if he would say anything he wishes to say to start with.

LORD HARCOURT: Mr. Long, and gentlemen, I am very much flattered by your kind invitation to attend the Imperial Conference to-day, in which I find myself in familiar surroundings and amongst old friends. I am quite aware, sir, that you have no desire that I should make a speech to you even on the fascinating subject of oil, and I have no intention of doing anything of the kind; but, knowing the great pressure of business which rests upon the members of the Imperial Conference, I think I might perhaps be safe in assuming that you have not all, or possibly any of you, had the time to consider my Memorandum, although it is a short one, which has been placed before the Conference by Mr. Long. And therefore, without detaining you more than a moment or two, I think I could put before you what is the present position of mineral oil, within and without the Empire, and the seriousness of the situation.

There is undoubtedly to-day—well, or there certainly will be in the future—a world scarcity of mineral oil, but there is an Empire scarcity of a very acute kind at this moment, and in the future it will become more acute. The Navies and the Mercantile Marine of the world are turning more and more to oil as their fuel, and if they continue to burn oil as a fuel, instead of using it in internal combustion engines, there will be such a shortage of that fuel in the world, as to bring industry almost to a standstill. It is essential, in my view, that both the Navies and the Mercantile Marine should in future consume oil in internal combustion engines, and not by burning it as a fuel, because by using it in internal combustion engines you can get five times the productivity out of the oil that you can by using it merely as a fuel, as an alternative to coal. The world's production of petroleum to-day is 79½ millions of tons, and of that amount the United States of America produce no less than 45½ million tons, or 64½ per cent. of the whole world production. Russia contributes 13 per cent., and Mexico 11 per cent., and—this is the remarkable and alarming fact—the whole of the British Empire contributes only 2 per cent. of the world's production, and of that four-fifths comes from India.

Gentlemen, it is a serious situation now, and it will become worse in the future. We are dependent to-day on the United States for 80 per cent. of our requirements of oil, and what our position would be if, unhappily, America, instead of being an Ally, had been a strict neutral, withholding oil for war purposes, it is hardly necessary for me to describe. What is necessary, then, for all of us is to develop within the British Dominions, the British Colonies and Protectorates and Dependencies, and in our spheres of influence—and also in Persia and Mesopotamia, which I suppose, at the moment, could hardly be described in any of those categories—as much oil as we can get. Mr. Long and the Colonial Office are already at work on this matter in the Crown Colonies. Egypt is developing very well—surprisingly well during recent months, and there is, I believe, a fair promise of good oil in Somaliland. But we want larger production and greater and new oil fields everywhere throughout the Empire. We want the Dominions especially to encourage prospecting for oil, but to encourage prospecting by the right people, and, if necessary, after the discovery of the oil, to take Government control of the licences issued for that purpose. Canada produced only 27,000 tons of oil in 1917 a decreasing production, unfortunately, because it was as high as 72,000 tons in the year 1908. Ontario, which used to be the main source, is giving a diminishing supply now, but Alberta is progressing and deserves, I think, further investigation. In British Columbia there are good indications, and also amongst the sands on the eastern slopes of the Rockies and on the Alaska and Macaskie Rivers. It is believed by those who know the circumstances that Canada might become the great Imperial oil field of the future.

In Newfoundland there is some shale at Deer Lake which seems to be worthy of further exploration. In Australia, unfortunately, there is only a small production at present, but fair prospects. A Commonwealth Committee of last year, 1917, reported that an investigation of well oil throughout Australia should be made, and that the shale deposits should be developed without delay. Shale production in New South Wales has been decreased. It was 17,000 tons in 1916 as against 86,000 tons in 1912. You can take it generally that a ton of shale will produce, according to its richness, from 33 to 66 gallons of oil.

Mr. COOK: Will you give me those figures again?

LORD HARCOURT: The production in New South Wales in 1916 was 17,000 tons, and in 1912 it was 86,000 tons. That is, of shale unconverted. I think the oil value of shale in New South Wales is higher than in Canada. I think it has been put as high as 66 gallons per ton of shale converted, but those figures are only in my head, and are subject to correction, though I believe they are accurate. Tasmania has great potentialities for oil, and there are indications in British New Guinea which are well worth pursuing. In New Zealand there is very little production, but some promise, especially in the neighbourhood of New Plymouth, but I am afraid the oil is at a very great depth, over 3,000 feet; and there are also prospects on the neighbouring Sugarloaf Islands. In the Union of South Africa, at Port Elizabeth, there is a geological formation which is said to be similar to that of the Caucasus Belt, with indications of rich petroleum beds there.³

LORD HARCOURT—cont.

Well, that is a general indication of what there is of oil in the Self-governing Dominions of the Empire. The Empire needs to-day, I am quite sure we all feel, more prospecting, even if it is necessary to encourage it by a subsidy given either by the Dominion or by the State or Provincial Government. I have not dealt to-day with oil outside the five Self-governing Dominions. There is prospecting and great development in other parts, and in Africa too, but I purposely, as this is the Imperial Conference, devoted myself only to the five Self-governing Dominions.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Is there any production in India?

LORD HARCOURT: There is a very large production in Burma and in India. British India produces 1,133,000 tons of oil, or 1.60 per cent. of the world production, but British India constitutes four-fifths of the total Empire production which we have at present. Besides the prospecting, of course, we want eventually more production, and that to be followed, wherever possible—and it is very essential—by Imperial control. How you are to obtain that control is a legal question of some difficulty. If future licences to prospect, and to bore, and to get, and to refine, and to sell oil were given only to British subjects and British companies, that result might probably be obtained; but you still have the problem of how you are to keep those companies British all the time, which is not so easy. One method might be by the Dominion Government having holdings in those companies, as the British Government has in the Anglo-Persian Company, a majority holding. Another possibility is voting trusts under Government direction, but there is always the snare and the danger of bearer shares. You do not know in whose hands they are; but there is also a method of dealing with those in the Articles of Association of new companies, by which bearer shares should carry with them no voting powers. And there is a fourth expedient, of imposing export duties upon oil, in order to control its eventual destination, and in order to keep it within the Empire. All those matters, of course, must be left for your own judgment, and to the ingenuity of your jurists. But I want to say to you again, from my experience of the Committee of which Mr. Long has appointed me Chairman, that the vital necessity of to-day is more oil within the Empire and the Imperial control of that oil wherever it is found.

CHAIRMAN: Lord Harcourt will be very glad to answer any questions, and we also have Sir John Cadman here, who is the head of the Oil Executive Department created since the war, and any questions connected with his Department he will be prepared to answer.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The supply of oil is particularly essential for naval purposes, I suppose?

LORD HARCOURT: Very essential for naval purposes. The Navy had been burning more oil shortly before the war, and I think it has been burning a far larger quantity during the war, and the consumption is very great. And the Mercantile Marines of the world are burning oil also. But unfortunately both the Navy and the Mercantile Marine are turning to it as a fuel and not for internal combustion purposes, and therefore are consuming, as I have said, five times the amount of oil that would be necessary with internal combustion.

Sir JOHN CADMAN: It may interest the Conference to know that just under one-tenth of the world's production of oil is being used for war purposes by the Allies in Europe alone to-day.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: On land and on sea?

Sir JOHN CADMAN: Yes.

Mr. ROWELL: How are the other nine-tenths distributed?

Sir JOHN CADMAN: Consumed chiefly within the zone of production.

CHAIRMAN: Of course, the consumption of spirit for aviation has increased enormously, and we have a difficulty there in this fact—that the variations of the atmosphere have an extraordinary effect upon the amount of flying and spirit consumption, to such an extent that occasionally the estimates made by the Air Ministry for their consumption, on which we have to work, vary, as compared with the actual consumption, by about 60 per cent.; and I am told it is very largely caused by the weather. But the result is that our consumption since the Oil Executive was established, which was about 14 months ago—the consumption of oil spirit has been enormously increased. I do not know what the figure is during the 12 months or six months, but it is tremendous.

Sir JOHN CADMAN: About 25 per cent.

CHAIRMAN: Although as regards petrol we have cut down the consumption of petrol for civilian purposes in this country to the narrowest possible limit.

Mr. MASSEY: Can Lord Harcourt tell us whether the Standard Oil Company have acquired properties within the British Empire?

LORD HARCOURT: I do not know. I have not the absolute knowledge, but I believe that the Standard Oil Company controls some of the companies which are operating in Canada. I should not say controls, but it has a supreme share in them, possibly amounting to control.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Absolute control.

LORD HARCOURT: The Imperial Oil Company.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I mean as far as Ontario is concerned; but it is not true as regards Alberta.

LORD HARCOURT: No.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Imperial Oil Company is organised in Ontario and is subject to Ontario laws.

LORD HARCOURT: It is difficult to obtain or regain the control in some cases of companies which have lost it already, but it is not difficult, or not so difficult, to provide that future companies created shall be under British Dominion control.

Mr. MONTAGU: In India, Mr. Long, I think we have already carried out everything that Lord Harcourt has suggested this afternoon, and under the Mining Rules, 1913, no prospecting licence or mining lease can be granted except to a British subject or a British controlled company; and transfers are prevented without the sanction of the Government, which can be withheld if the transfer infringes the vital principle of British control. Further, the Government has the power of taking over all the oil-producing concerns of the country in case of emergency or of war, and the Government can decide what it considers to be an emergency. I have here a copy of the model agreement used in the case of concessions of what are called preserved minerals, which I understand include oil and apply to all minerals except things like limestone and slate, for which no licences are required, a copy of the model form of concession, and a model of the prospecting licence. So I think that so far as India is concerned we have nothing but approval of this memorandum. I shall be glad to circulate copies of these model forms if they will be of interest to the Conference.

Mr. MASSEY: Mr. Long, I think it is a splendid thing that in this connection India has given a lead to the Empire, and I think we should express our appreciation, though I do not go the length of saying there should be a Resolution. Lord Harcourt has given us so much information that I have no questions to ask; but he has undoubtedly disclosed a very serious state of affairs so far as the Empire is concerned. It would be an exceedingly serious thing if the oil within the Empire became scarcer than at the present time. I hope this will not be the case, and I hope that following up what has been suggested to-day something will be done by the Governments of the Dominions to encourage prospecting for oil.

I am afraid we cannot promise to do very much in New Zealand. We have been boring for oil for some considerable time; considerable private capital has been expended for that purpose, and the Government has helped to some extent. I am not prepared to say how much the Government has contributed, probably 10,000*l.* to 15,000*l.*, to assist in boring at New Plymouth, where one bore promised very well for a long time. We offered a bonus for the first million gallons of oil produced, and one company was able to claim the bonus; it produced the million gallons and got the bonus, but I am sorry to say the output of oil has not been increased—in fact it is rather going off at present. The geologists tell us the country is too broken to produce much oil, at all events in the locality in which New Plymouth is situated. There are several oil wells at New Plymouth, and I do not think any one of them has paid its way, though bores have been in some cases put down to a great depth: in one case I think the bore is down 5,000 feet and they are not getting as much oil now as they did at 3,000 feet. Another bore was at 4,000 feet and others less than that; but, as I say, most of the oil which comes to the surface is from 3,000 feet.

There are also shale deposits in New Zealand, as to which experts have expressed the opinion that they will produce oil if treated in the ordinary way for the purpose. On that point I am not able to express a personal opinion; I have not seen the deposits, although they have been referred to time after time in the Parliament of the country, and at one time I believe it was intended to commence the manufacture of kerosene.

LORD HARCOURT: Is that in Southland county?

Mr. MASSEY: Yes. The project dropped, and I do not know whether there is any intention to revive it. Possibly something can be done by means of a Government bonus. I think it is the duty of the Governments in the Dominions to do all they possibly can to discover oil. Apart altogether from the requirements of the Navy, and war purposes, we require oil for many of our industries,—industries which could not be carried on unless oil was available and at a moderate price. I think the suggestion is a good one, that if oil is discovered it should be owned only by British subjects. I think that is one of the exceedingly important articles of which ownership should not pass out of the Empire. So long as the ownership remains in our own people we can control it, but if it passes into the hands of foreigners, even though friendly, it is a very, very difficult thing to do. I am very glad this matter has come before the Conference, and I feel certain that each and every one of us will endeavour to impress its importance upon the people whom we represent.

Mr. COOK: Mr. Long, I have listened to Lord Harcourt's statement with very great interest, more particularly as it relates to Australian possibilities. I know a good deal about that field to which he alluded; I live close by, and I can tell him why that reduction took place. It is one of those concerns in which a big British interest wastes its money, sinks its capital, and gets very little for it. And the reason for that reduction of which he speaks is that for some time they had practically to go out of business. They have since written down the capital and made a fresh start, and the Federal Government has given them a very substantial bonus to begin operations again. We are to-day paying them a bonus of 2*d.* per gallon on all shale oil produced, with a view to stimulating the industry into activity again, and we are hoping that they will soon get back to the old condition of things.

LORD HARCOURT: Is that the Commonwealth Corporation or the British Australian Oil Company?

Mr. COOK: Commonwealth Oil. It is a very unfortunate affair altogether. We need not go into the history of it, but altogether we are making a determined effort to get the thing back again to a commercial condition, and I believe the amount of subsidy which we have already granted to that company amounts to about £25,000 or £40,000.

As to the question of extraction of oils from shale, if that is what the British Government is after, I can tell them that there are millions upon millions of tons of shale in Australia only wanting the necessary financial assistance to produce oil in almost any quantity that is desired. Reference has been made to that deposit of shale in Tasmania. There is a very, very large deposit there, and the Tasmanian people are most anxious to develop it, but they have not the capital to do it on a large scale. There have been many negotiations going on from time to time between the Tasmanian Government and the Federal Government. They wanted us to give them a guarantee as to output, which we were not able to do. Our requirements there are more or less limited, although I should say here that our own Navy oil bill is now a quarter of a million a year, and it was with the view of developing this company of which I have spoken, and stimulating it back to prosperity again, that we gave them that bonus. But there are still these fields in Tasmania to be exploited, and I am afraid if they are to be exploited, those who want the oil specially will have to come to the rescue. In addition to paying these large subventions to this company, we have been for the last five or six years carrying on boring operations in British New Guinea. We know the oil is there. We have not yet got it in commercial quantities. We had Dr. Wade superintending operations there, and I may say that four years ago, when I was Prime Minister in Australia, I was considering very seriously a proposition of this kind—that we should divide the area which we believed to be oil-bearing, giving the private company, which I believe is a British company, a concession of half the area, and exploiting the other part ourselves, so bringing the two into competition. In that way I hoped it would have a very good effect. However, politicians propose and the people dispose, and nothing has come of it.

The whole of that oil-bearing strata is still under control by the Commonwealth Government, and if the Imperial Government is interested, I strongly suggest that they should come and have a look at it and give us some help to accelerate exploitation. The field is there, we are spending a lot of money there every year in boring, and we are going on spending it for long periods. If this is to be considered as an Imperial question, as I think there can be no doubt it should be, all I have to say to the Imperial Government is, Come along, give us financial assistance and scientific help, and let us accelerate the whole process. The oil is there, we believe. We are doing something at present which is very substantial, and believing as I do—indeed as I know—it is not a matter of belief—that there are plenty of possibilities in Australia, both as to well oil and shale oil, I strongly suggest to Lord Harcourt that he should look further into this matter, and see if he cannot get the Imperial Government to give us some financial help and scientific knowledge to develop these fields.

As to the Tasmanian fields, what they want is a guarantee that their product will be taken. The Tasmanian Government will provide the capital if you can guarantee them for some years the prospect of their product being taken at a proper price. We have taken on just now this other concession, and we cannot do the two. There is the shale—mountains of it—millions of tons of it—and it only wants getting out and converting into oil; and I strongly suggest that Lord Harcourt should turn his attention in that direction. There, and in New Guinea, and at another place in New South Wales called Murrumbidgee, there are well-known deposits of shale of good oil-bearing capacity, and they only need exploiting; so that if the Empire is so hard up for oil as all that, the oil is there, and it only wants getting out. We are doing what we can. I do not think we can promise to spend very much more money than we are doing; it is already costing us a great amount, but the possibilities are there.

And there are other possibilities too, down there. For instance, at Timor, in the Portuguese territory, it is well known, I think, that that contains a great deal of oil-bearing country. The Portuguese have had it for some hundreds of years now, and have done nothing with it. My own impression is, that the Imperial Government, if they went the right way about it, could get a pretty substantial concession there, for very little, and if they do not get it, if we do not get it, somebody is bound to get it in the long run, and it is likely to fall into the hands, I should think, of some of these big oil monopolists, and I strongly suggest that Lord Harcourt should look into that proposition, and see if it is possible to get a concession from the Portuguese Government, and set about developing the field scientifically. And then there is the Dutch East Indies, generally. I have here a Memorandum which was supplied to us some time ago. Perhaps I had better read it:

"(1) While the Dutch East Indies are of great importance to Australia, from a strategic point of view, owing to their situation across our line of communication with China and Japan, and on the flank of our line of communication with Egypt and India, this importance is enhanced by the fact that they form also one of the great oil-producing areas of the world.

Mr. COOK—cont.

"(2) In 1915, their production ranked fourth among the world's oil-fields, only being exceeded by that of the United States, Russia, and Mexico, and being four times that of Japan.

"(3) The possession, or even the economic control, of these islands would make a possible enemy of the Commonwealth independent of other sources of oil-fuel, and would at the same time deprive the Commonwealth of its quickest—and very important—source of supply. The possibility of developing at an early date, the substitute source of supply in British Papua must also be considered, but it is unlikely that any developments in British territory will replace the Dutch oil-fields so far as the Australian trade is concerned, for some years to come.

"(4) Moreover, the Dutch fields are capable of much greater development. In the month of February alone, five new concessions were granted to existing Dutch companies, one in North-Western Sumatra, three in the Palembang district of South-Eastern Sumatra, and one in South-Eastern Borneo. This last-mentioned district is being carefully studied at present, and proposals for a railway from Banjermassin to Balikpapan, with branches tapping the ranges between them, are already under way.

"(5) It may further be noted that Japan (which still seems to import 25 per cent. of the oil she needs) is looking abroad for fields to work. Late in 1916, it was reported that Japanese companies were securing the right to sink wells in the rich areas of Russian Saghalien, and more recently Japanese agents are known to have visited Timor, seeking information about oil-fields there."

It is well known that Japanese agents have visited Timor, and I think altogether it is a field which needs a good deal of further exploitation. As to Timor, I suggest strongly that you should try and get a concession from the Portuguese Government and exploit the field thoroughly; and as to these other shale deposits in Australia, if you can give us any help, there is no doubt whatever that the oil is there.

LORD HARCOURT: I should like to say that one British Company is already in negotiation for the concession of oil in Timor. As to the Dutch Indies, of course the production there is dealt with by the Royal Dutch Combine, which is a very powerful combine and is already developing a very large quantity of oil.

Mr. COOK: Who is negotiating for this concession in Timor?

LORD HARCOURT: I cannot say, except that it is a British Company.

Mr. COOK: Why wait for a company to do it? Why do not the Government get in themselves? It is a matter which concerns the Navy so vitally that one wonders why they do not go into it themselves.

LORD HARCOURT: The British Government have never gone into the oil business themselves, though they have effected control over one of the companies which has been doing this business.

Mr. COOK: I have no objection to looking kindly on private enterprise—in fact, I think private enterprise is more likely to succeed than Government enterprise, but it seems to me this matter is so vital that it wants a combination of both. Take these deposits I speak of in Australia. All they want is a guarantee that their output will be taken, and if the British Government to-day will give a guarantee of that kind, those fields will be developed at once. It is because we cannot give them a guarantee as a Federal Government that they are not being exploited to-day. The last thing that Mr. Lee, Premier of Tasmania, came over to consult us about was the very question of opening up these shale properties. The State Government, the Tasmanian Government, will provide the capital necessary to do it, but it is no good their doing that unless there is a guarantee of continuity in taking the oil. I suggest that the Government should take this question of Australian oil up.

CHAIRMAN: Take it up themselves?

Mr. COOK: Yes. I quite think the proper thing would be to send out competent authorities to look over these propositions, with some sort of plenary power to make some commercial arrangements about them. That is all they are waiting for.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I should explain that as far back as 1913, when the possibilities of a large oil production in Alberta were first brought to public attention, the British Government communicated with us through the Admiralty, and we passed certain regulations, the exact purport of which I do not recall, but which had the effect of giving to the Government of Canada complete control of the output in case of any emergency or in case of war. So I think the position in our country is very satisfactory, so far as any new discoveries are concerned.

LORD HARCOURT: That is control in case of emergency of war.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, I think so. I have not a copy of the Order before me, but that is my recollection. It may go further than that; I am not quite sure.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Mr. Long, this matter is a very important one, and I want to say a few words concerning it. The proposal, or the recommendation, made here, suggesting that there should be licences for prospecting and boring, and making all Crown land subject to a Government licence, is a very good one, and I think can be very easily put into operation. But I want to point out to Lord Harcourt, who is taking special interest in this matter, what arose in New Zealand several years ago in connection with an effort made to keep oil borings within that country in the general interest of the British Empire. When it was believed they were going to be successful, representatives of the great oil concerns in the United States of America came down to New Zealand and got options from men who could not carry them on. Now assuming the licence was put into operation, and that those oil wells were not to be worked by foreigners, all that those people who had given the option to the United States explorers would have required to do was to have formed a local oil company and to work for them, then they would not be foreigners. I foresee that is one of the great troubles in connection with this matter, and I am of the opinion that while it looks the proper thing to do, and I think would be done very readily by any of the countries that want to protect the oil interest, I am afraid in practice it would be defeated. That is my opinion.

I hold a view similar to Mr. Cook; I do not believe that in the oversea countries we should ask the British Government to provide the capital to work our oil fields at all, either shale fields or liquid, but I do believe if there was some way by which the output could be assured to those who put their money into it, that they would then go to work, and the output could be used within the British Empire.

I will give an illustration of what is in my mind on that point. There is a company in New Zealand, in Southland, which owns machinery and everything in connection with the working of shale. It is an English company; the men live somewhere in the vicinity of Hull, and there is no New Zealand money in it at all. They provided something over 100,000*l.* for working shale there some years ago, and there was every prospect of success; but as soon as they got well under way, and were producing oil and accessories, the American company came down to New Zealand and lowered the price of oil so as to make it unpayable. Now those people kept their works in perfect order for a period of years, though they were not using them at all. That is English capital—all of private people—capital invested in that particular concern with the idea of using it from a commercial standpoint, and of making a profit for the company, no doubt. Certain oil experts from this country went out on their behalf, and the firm of Johnson and Company, I think, of Glasgow, examined into the shale works there and the shale supplies, of which, as in Mr. Cook's place in Australia, there are millions of tons available—shale of a very high quality indeed. The report upon the examination of fifty or one hundred tons of that shale sent to England by those people said it was the highest oil-producing shale in the world. There is at all events a place where apparently shale could be worked profitably, but for the power of the oil concerns in the United States of America, who, immediately that got under way, and these people worked it, lowered the price so as to beat them out of competing with them in any portion of the country. Now what is the position to-day? In New Zealand to-day the ordinary person is paying 3s 6d. a gallon for petrol—that was the price when we left New Zealand. As a matter of fact, there is an oversupply of petrol in New Zealand, notwithstanding the shipping shortage. When we left New Zealand there was no such thing as restriction of petrol; it was not required to be done, but the price was at the rate I have stated, and everybody who wanted to buy the oil had to pay that price. There is the fact remaining, according to this Memorandum, that of the oil used in the British Empire, 80 per cent. comes from the United States, and they have 65 per cent. of the world's supply, and as a matter of fact to-day they are controlling the price to the people in New Zealand; there is plenty of oil out there, and the people in England who own it cannot work the local product.

It is very hard to say at all what will occur in those districts where they have been boring for liquid oil for a considerable period. Many believe it is going to be successful, but here is an aspect of the matter which I want to call attention to. I am not quite sure of the exact facts—I speak entirely from memory, but I understand you have a petrol tax in England.

LORD HARCOURT: Sixpence a gallon.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Well, I want to direct attention to that aspect of it, as to how it strikes me. If there be anything in the proposal to increase the production of oil in the British Empire, it is to make us independent of countries outside the British Empire, and if the heart of the British Empire is going to impose a tax upon petrol, as it is doing, surely it will help the people who are our opponents outside the British Empire to keep up the price against us; and with this 80 per cent. coming from the United States, it seems to be an impossibility to stop them by taxation; neither do I think it would be a very friendly thing to do to the United States.

LORD HARCOURT: The tax is not a tax on the import, but a tax on the use of it—the licence which you receive from the Government.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Well, the point is, Lord Harcourt, if there is a tax of 6d. a gallon here upon an article which is used very largely now for practical purposes and not alone for pleasure purposes, although a percentage of it is used for that—but if there is an article upon which 6d. per gallon is imposed for the purposes of local taxation, it seems to me—I may be wrong—that must have the effect of pushing up the value of an article which is now used far more for business than private purposes. As to the Navy, I suppose there is no tax for that, but it looks like crippling the very thing which we are trying to improve within the British Empire itself. All I want to say about it is this. I do not believe that we can for some years to come get anything like even semi-independence of the British Empire in the production of oil; but I do believe that with the shale that is available in Australia and New Zealand, if there was a reasonable price for their output—well certainly as to New Zealand I feel perfectly confident—the people who own those works would start them immediately, and as a matter of fact they can pipe from those works right down to a deep-sea port and put the oil right on board the steamer and save all transport charges. The fact of the matter is that at present we are under the grip of huge monopolies in connection with oil. I am not sure that there are not some even in the British Empire—I think there are—but certainly we are under the grip of monopolists in the United States of America in connection with this oil who are making enormous profits in New Zealand and elsewhere. Before the war the highest price charged in New Zealand was, I think, 10d. a gallon, and now it is 3s. 6d. a gallon, and there is no such thing as a shortage there of any sort or kind to warrant the price going up; there are no war conditions in New Zealand to put it up. The fact remains that it paid them originally to sell at 10d. per gallon and they could make a profit, and it is quite obvious that if they are to-day selling at 3s. 6d. a gallon they are making an extortionate profit. It looks to me, apart from the recommendation which is referred to here, that if there could be some reasonable arrangement made by which the output of any of the oilfields or shalefields within the British Empire could be taken at a fixed price, then I think you would go some distance towards getting an active competitor against these people who control 80 per cent. of the world's output, and certainly you would get a diminution in the price charged, in England and in the oversea countries, for an article used for general purposes as well as pleasure purposes.

Mr. ROWELL: I understand Lord Harcourt to say that he has in view the question of the oil supply of the Empire not only in time of war but in time of peace.

LORD HARCOURT: Especially in time of peace.

Mr. ROWELL: There are one or two practical aspects of the question as it affects Canada to which I should like to draw Lord Harcourt's attention. In five Provinces of Canada the lands and all mineral rights, including oil, are under the control of the Provinces. In four of the Provinces they are still under the control of the Federal Government. In my Province, Ontario, and in others, the oil business is controlled by the Standard Oil Company through the Imperial Oil Company, which latter has the control of most of the oil wells in Ontario. The practical question would immediately arise,—a man applies to the Government of Ontario for a licence to prospect for oil. There are lands where oil may be found. A man succeeds in finding oil, but that oil is only of value to him as he can develop it and find a market. The Standard Oil Company is so influential and dominating a factor in the oil situation on the continent of America that, if they desired to do so, they could force him to sell to them if he has no alternative market; and that would apply to oil in any part of Canada if the Standard Oil Company chose to exert its powers. There are other Provinces where the land is controlled by the Federal Government. Now, if a man wished to develop his property, and dispose of the oil, is there any practical method by which the market could be assured to him, particularly in the case of developing substantial oil propositions in the newer portions of Canada? Otherwise if there is no—

Mr. HUGHES: Have you shale deposits in Canada?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There are some in the eastern Provinces.

Mr. HUGHES: Are you working them?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think they are being worked to some extent.

Mr. ROWELL: I am more familiar with the conditions where you bore for the oil in wells. We have wells in Ontario and Alberta.

LORD HARCOURT: There are, of course, other interests on the continent of America which are not controlled by the Standard Oil Company, and which are indeed opposed to it. There is a very large American interest which is known as the Doheny, who control a large quantity of oil, and there are the British interests in Mexico, the Mexican Eagle, and the Royal Dutch-Shell Company's interest in Mexico. They are large competitors of the Standard, and I should think, though I do not profess to know anything about oil companies, there are large interests which might be willing to take up the thing, especially in competition with the Standard. That would be my general answer, though I confess I do not know much about oil companies.

Mr. ROWELL: As it now stands the Standard is on the ground, and is the first there to take advantage of any new development. Others probably would have to be encouraged to come in.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Lord Harcourt, could you tell the Conference whether there has been any result from the efforts to substitute alcohol for motor-cars?

LORD HARCOURT: I do not think so. I was interested, when I was Colonial Secretary myself, in the possible development of crude alcohol, especially in tropical Colonies, for use in motor traction; I had a good many experiments made, and I found that there was one other person who was experimenting in the world on the same lines, and that was the Kaiser. For the tropical Colonies it was very important; petrol was extraordinarily costly to take up to Central Africa, but it was easy to produce crude alcohol. But I found that while you could work slow traction and ploughs fairly well with alcohol, you did not get rapid transport with the alcohol.

Mr. HUGHES: Was it something to do with the carburettor?

14th Day.]

PETROLEUM.

[22 July 1918.]

LORD HARCOURT: It seems to be inherent in the machine. I consulted Mr. Edge, and he stated he thought it could be overcome if there was a large enough market for alcohol cars for the tropical Colonies. There is this danger, which you must never forget in such an industry in the tropical countries—that unless you are able to de-nature the alcohol and make it unpotable, you will destroy those Colonies and destroy the population. If you have a lot of cheap alcohol which the natives can get hold of they will drink it. We were able to produce nothing which was sufficiently horrible to prevent the natives from lapping it down, so you must de-nature the alcohol.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Did they drink it?

LORD HARCOURT: Yes.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: How would it do to put a little poison into it?

Mr. HUGHES: Did you ascertain from any of the scientists what their opinion was as to the supply of petroleum? Is it unlimited? Supposing we go on relying more and more on oil as fuel and less on coal, is there an unlimited supply of petroleum, or will the wells give out?

LORD HARCOURT: I do not think any scientist could tell you that. The petroleum of the world is so insufficiently explored, and even if they knew the fields of petroleum, I do not know that it would make much difference. Our experience of the prophecies of scientists about the exhaustion of coal in this country is that they have varied between exhaustion in fifty years and exhaustion in a thousand years, so that if you employ a sufficient number of scientists you obtain results which are totally misleading.

Mr. HUGHES: Looking at this thing from the point of view of your statement of the data, is the position that we only produce 2 per cent. of what the Empire consumes, or of what Britain consumes?

LORD HARCOURT: We produce 2 per cent. only of the world's production.

Mr. HUGHES: How much of our own consumption do we produce? What is our proportion of the world's consumption?

Sir JOHN CADMAN: For Europe it is roughly just under one-tenth of the world's consumption—that is, of the Allies fighting in the war—the oil that is imported to Europe.

Mr. HUGHES: I want to be clear. Is it that the European Allies consume one-tenth of the whole petrol production of the world?

Sir JOHN CADMAN: Of petroleum—just under one-tenth of the world's production of petroleum.

Mr. HUGHES: Where is the major portion consumed—in the United States?

Sir JOHN CADMAN: It is consumed round where it is produced. India consumes practically her own production. America, of course, consumes a lot, and at the moment the policy is to carry the oil from the point of production to the nearest market.

Mr. HUGHES: I do not know anything about it, but it is extraordinary that countries like Britain, France, Russia, and Italy only consume about one-tenth of the whole of the petroleum products of the world.

Sir JOHN CADMAN: That is it.

LORD HARCOURT: Do you include Russia?

Sir JOHN CADMAN: No; that is what is being used by the Allies to-day.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: For war purposes and peace purposes?

CHAIRMAN: War purposes.

Sir JOHN CADMAN: War purposes, and the quantity is limited by tonnage.

LORD HARCOURT: There is very little consumption to-day except for war purposes.

Mr. HUGHES: 65 per cent. of the world's production is in American hands, so it says here. Where does that go to? Is it consumed at home, the greater portion of it?

22 July 1918.]

PETROLEUM.

[14th Day.]

274

Sir JOHN CADMAN: The greater portion of it, yes.

Mr. HUGHES: I should like to have this thing verified. It seems most extraordinary if it is the fact that 100 millions of people in America are consuming, say, six times as much as the 200 millions—or there are more than that; 180 millions in Russia, 45 millions in Great Britain, 40 millions in France, and 30 millions odd in Italy. America is consuming six times as much as a population two-and-a-half times her own.

LORD HARCOURT: You must remember that in those countries where petroleum is found industry has gone on a petroleum basis to a far larger extent than in countries which have to import petroleum.

Mr. COOK: And consumption is limited by capacity to get it over

Mr. HUGHES: That does not apply to Europe, because you can get it from Russia.

LORD HARCOURT: We have not got it for four years during the war.

Mr. HUGHES: I assume this is peace and war.

LORD HARCOURT: Those are war figures only.

Mr. HUGHES: Was it true before the war?

Sir JOHN CADMAN: The quantity consumed by Great Britain was much less before the war.

Mr. HUGHES: I do not think we have the problem stated yet in such a way that we can deal with it effectively. No one tells us how much Britain wants, or how much the Empire as a whole produces or could produce, and how much it wants. We are told that there is 65 per cent. in American hands, and 18 per cent. comes from Russia and 11 per cent. from Mexico.

Sir JOHN CADMAN: May I state the case? At the present time Great Britain is using at the rate of over 6,000,000 tons per annum.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What is the world's production—70,000,000?

Sir JOHN CADMAN: Yes, about 70,000,000.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Britain is using 6,500,000 out of a total world's production of 70,000,000?

Sir JOHN CADMAN: Yes.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Can we get some information from you as you go along without interrupting you too much? What is Britain's war consumption?

Sir JOHN CADMAN: At the outbreak of war it was between 2,000,000 and 3,000,000 tons; now it is six and a half millions.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Out of the total production of the world of 70,000,000, which was the same then as now.

Sir JOHN CADMAN: Yes. I want to show that at the present time the consumption of oil in this country is over 6,000,000 tons. The amount actually produced in this country is only about 200,000 tons—from shales. A certain proportion of oil is obtained from tars from coal, which brings that 200,000 up to 600,000 tons. Our internal capacity to carry on our own work during war is only 600,000 tons, and we require 6,500,000.

Mr. HUGHES: 6,500,000 now, and 3,000,000 in ordinary, normal times.

LORD HARCOURT: The 3,000,000 tons is what we consumed before the war but it will not be possible to go back to the 3,000,000 tons after the war, because ships built for the Navy during the war have gone in so largely for oil, and so have ships built for the Mercantile Marine.

Mr. HUGHES: We ought to have the figures we will have to deal with. The pre-war figure is only useful to us if it is an indication of what the post-war conditions will be.

Sir JOHN CADMAN: We have not attempted here to put out peace conditions, because it would involve bringing in the consumption of all the self-governing Dominions, India, and the Colonies, and that is a separate thing altogether.

Mr. HUGHES: I thought we were talking of Britain now.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We are talking about Britain, but the subject came up in this way—that Lord Harcourt invited the Dominions to encourage oil production as far as possible, and it is very important to know what Britain needs.

Mr. HUGHES: I want to know what Britain wants after the war. Suppose she wants 4,500,000 tons, for instance, instead of 3,000,000 tons.

Mr. LLOYD: Can you give us the production of the Empire, and also what is exported from other parts of the Empire, excluding the British Isles?

Sir JOHN CADMAN: I can give you a statement of all these details, but may I first clear up a couple of points which have been raised here—that is, the difference between oil from shale and natural petroleum which is drilled for. Oil obtained from shale requires very large capital, it requires a great deal of labour. Take, for example, the Scotch shale industry, which is one of the few shale industries in the world which is operated successfully, and only 20 gallons to the ton of shale is obtained. The shale has to be mined, and there is a valley filled with plant and materials for producing oil. Compare that for a moment with, say, Egypt, which is producing something like 2,000 tons a day from a mere half-dozen wells. Or take Persia, which is producing over 1,000 tons a day from three wells without any labour at all; holes are put down, a tap is turned, and the oil runs out. If I may be allowed to make a suggestion, it is this—that the Dominions should investigate very carefully the possibilities of obtaining oil, first naturally, and secondly, from shale. They will each have their particular sphere of usefulness, and it is a matter which is dependent on the price and cost of production. I have myself kept as far as possible in close touch with the very excellent work which has been done by the geologists in the various Dominions, and if I may venture to make a suggestion it is that this oil question is developing so rapidly that what is true to-day is not true to-morrow; it is a new science, the search for oil; and I suggest that there should be some means of getting closer co-operation between the Geological Departments, so as to place the Governments in a position to know what they are dealing with, instead of having to bargain with prospectors without first-hand, up-to-date information.

Mr. HUGHES: Do you think there is any means by which oil produced from shale can compete against Standard Oil products? The suggestion has been made, and we do it to some extent in our own country. Mr. Cook has already dealt with the question. We have some very fine shale beds, and if anybody can make shale pay, we ought to be able to do it, but we cannot make it pay without a bonus, and we have given 2d. a gallon; and the proprietor is a very energetic man. Millions of investors' money has been spent in this business—millions—and the water has been skimmed off, skimmed off, skimmed off, and on the bedrock capital he cannot make it pay. He proposes to take it out naturally by running a pipe to the sea, and dealing with it in that way, and if that were possible, he might be able to produce shale oil at a minimum; but in the meantime he has to haul it 120 miles, of which the first few miles are very bad. I do not think there is any means at our disposal by which we can hope to make shale pay against natural oil, but all the same in a country like ours we must go on with the shale we have—and the same applies to Britain. But we can never hope to land the shale here and, under any devisable system, compete here with natural oil; the Government could not afford to pay the price, nobody could pay the price of Australian oil landed in Britain. But still, the question for the consideration of the various Dominions and for Britain is this—that whatever deposits of shale we have we ought to develop; that is clear; it is a second string to our bow. Mr. Cook has told you what we are doing with regard to boring for oil, and the oil we get is all right; you can see it sweating up on the tools, and no doubt eventually we shall strike the rivers, or the wells. It is said there is oil in the middle of Australia; I do not know if that is so, but if there is, that settles our supplies as far as we are concerned. It is a serious trouble for us, and it must be very serious for the British Navy, and as it is a question appertaining to the national defence of the Empire, it should be taken up from that point of view, and not in the direction, I submit, of encouraging the shale production, except for the purpose of supplying the demand of the Dominions in which this shale does occur. That will be good so far as it goes.

LORD HARCOURT: I have said nothing to-day in the direction of encouraging production from shale. All I suggested was that it was to the advantage of the Empire that all production—and, of course, I meant economic production—of oil was desirable; but I hope I have not led the Imperial Conference on to a side track. Indeed, my Memorandum, which Mr. Long has printed and circulated, referred not so much to the production of oil, which I did mention in the few remarks I made in opening to-day, but the Memorandum is directed to keeping the oil, and the companies producing it, somehow or other under British control for the future.

Mr. HUGHES: I think you have put your finger on the real point. Now what is being done there, Sir? Have we here the dossier of the different companies? What is their genealogy? What is their industry? Who owns them? The Standard Oil we know; but who is the British Imperial, who is the Anglo-Persian, and who is the Shell Transport? Are they one and the same?

LORD HARCOURT: We do know that.

Mr. HUGHES: I should like to know, because one man comes to us and professes to be entirely dissociated with them, but he is not.

Lord HARCOURT: If you have a few months to spare, you might begin to understand all the ramifications of oil. It is by far the most intricate and complicated business in the world. Mr. Long's Petroleum Executive will supply you with all the information.

Mr. COOK: All I know is, we are paying the British Imperial 105s. for oil to-day, and they are giving it the Royal Navy at 30s. to 50s. a ton.

Mr. HUGHES: Is it impossible to know as a fact whether British capital and British citizens—I mean natural-born citizens—control any of these companies or not? Is that a question which it is difficult to understand?

LORD HARCOURT: It is possible to know in some cases, but where there are a considerable number of bearer shares having voting power at meetings, we cannot know who are the owners of those bearer shares, nor can you be sure that even an English individual holding 10,000 shares may not be controlled by some alien.

Mr. MONTAGU: You can tell in the case of the Anglo-Persian?

LORD HARCOURT: Yes, of the Anglo-Persian the British Government owns the majority of the shares.

Mr. HUGHES: That is not suspect.

LORD HARCOURT: And the Burma Company is not suspect.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Nor Lord Cowdray, in Mexico?

LORD HARCOURT: So long as Lord Cowdray keeps it. I have no means of knowing whether Lord Cowdray has parted with any of his interests in it.

Mr. HUGHES: Is it not possible for Britain to pass such legislation as to compel disclosure of such facts as you speak of? The law lays it down as a basic principle that the law cannot be evaded by subterfuge, and if you say that oil coming into this country, other than oil produced by companies or persons of British origin or controlled by British capital, shall be liable to whatever you please, would that be of any avail at all?

LORD HARCOURT: You would be discouraging the import of the greater quantity of the oil which you require here, because our production within the Empire is so small that we must be dependent on foreign countries, and in many cases on foreign companies, though a great deal of the production in foreign countries is done by British-owned or partly British-controlled companies.

Mr. HUGHES: How much does the Anglo-Persian produce?

Sir JOHN CADMAN: About one and a half million tons a year.

Mr. HUGHES: How much Burma?

LORD HARCOURT: The Burma oil is all consumed in India; it does not come here. Anglo-Persian is mainly naval.

Mr. HUGHES: Have we come to an impasse? Is it admitted that in this vital particular—vital for the defence of the Empire and vital for the manufacturers of this country, because there is no doubt that petrol or petroleum products will be the fuel of the future—we are absolutely dependent for supplies upon persons who are our actual or potential enemies on the field of battle?

LORD HARCOURT: Certainly you are, and that is what led to my Memorandum.

Mr. HUGHES: Are we to sit down under that?

LORD HARCOURT: No, we are not sitting down; and that is why Mr. Long invited me to come to explain what the Memorandum means. The Memorandum states that in the matter of oil the self-governing Dominions are practically negligible. I should like to see them produce more. I have not spoken of the oil which we are arranging to produce and bring under control in other parts of the Empire. There is Egypt, and the Crown Colonies and Protectorates, and there are other countries with which we are in close connection—for example, Mesopotamia and Persia. But the self-governing Dominions are a mere speck in oil production, and I should be sorry to see them remain so. And if you increase your oil production, I beg you to keep it under your own control, which means British control.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: So far as I understand the situation, Lord Harcourt, it is this: you have to depend on foreign countries for the greater part of your supply of oil at present. As far as foreign countries are concerned, you may organise companies under British control, and as long as the territorial jurisdiction of those countries is not exercised against you, you are comparatively safe. But in time of war you might not be safe, because you might be at war with those countries, or those countries might place an embargo upon it; and you really cannot alter that situation very much except by seeking to have British control as far as it is practicable to obtain it. Therefore you say to us: If it is possible in the Dominions to produce oil, whether from shale or from wells, on an economic basis, go ahead and do so as far as you can; and, in doing so, keep it under the control of British interests.

LORD HARCOURT: That is the whole thing in a nutshell.

Mr. HUGHES: I think it is only fair to point out that as far as shale oil is concerned, it must be for our own consumption.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Because it cannot be produced and transported economically.

LORD HARCOURT: I can, of course, only make suggestions, but I had been in conversation with Mr. Long on that subject, and I knew what he had been doing outside the Dominions, and I think there is more being done now; geological surveys are being made in a large number of the Crown Colonies, Nigeria, the Gold Coast, and there is a successful one in Somaliland.

CHAIRMAN: It is hard to get the men.

LORD HARCOURT: Yes, it is very hard to get the men, but all these things are being developed as rapidly as opportunities and scientists will allow. I have not dealt with all those, because I thought it would be inconvenient if I covered ground which really did not concern the Conference.

Mr. COOK: That is one which does concern us.

Mr. HUGHES: It does make a difference to us to know what has been done elsewhere, because what is the use of our developing shale oil if in Somaliland you can get oil which can be sent to Australia at a less rate so that you can undersell us? We want, therefore, to see the whole circumstances.

LORD HARCOURT: Oil from the Dutch Indies could be sent to Australia to compete with yours, no doubt.

Mr. HUGHES: For our own purpose—that is to say, for Naval requirements—whatever it is necessary to pay for the production of shale oil in sufficient quantities to provide fuel for our vessels, we shall pay that money, no matter what it costs. It will be better for us to pay even what Mr. Cook says is the amount, 105s. a ton, for oil inside Australia than 50s. for oil got outside Australia; because the day may come when we shall not be able to get the oil in, and we shall want it very badly on that day.

Mr. COOK: That is the point, and it is the point of view of the Empire too, or should be.

CHAIRMAN: May I put the Resolution?

Mr. HUGHES: What is the Resolution?

CHAIRMAN: It is on the paper. (The Chairman read the Resolution). It does not commit you to anything.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: The Resolution is all right.

Mr. LLOYD: Before it is put I should like to ask, are we to be supplied with facts and figures? We have nothing at present before us? We have certain things expressed in general terms, but we do not even know what is exported from different parts of the Empire.

CHAIRMAN: You can have any information we have got which you like to ask for, but obviously we cannot circulate in public papers information as to our sources, and distribution, and powers of control over oil at this moment. That is one of the most vital secrets, which we do not give to anyone. We keep that information under lock and key, and do not allow anybody to see it except one or two of my executive officers.

Mr. LLOYD: Probably that is the reason of the form which this discussion has taken; but that has not been stated hitherto.

CHAIRMAN: We are obliged to keep these things to ourselves.

Mr. LLOYD: I am satisfied with that answer.

Mr. COOK: You will keep your eye on New Guinea, I suppose, will you?

CHAIRMAN: Yes. Then may I put the Resolution?

Mr. HUGHES: But that Resolution is purely for consideration.

CHAIRMAN: That is all you can do at present.

The Resolution was then put to the Conference and carried unanimously, as follows:—

The Conference takes note of the Memorandum on the question of petroleum, and, having regard to the great and growing importance of petroleum and its products for naval, military, and industrial purposes, desires to commend the suggestions contained in the Memorandum to the serious consideration of the Governments concerned.

CHAIRMAN: Thank you, Lord Harcourt.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: * * * * we are going to have a much more restrictive effect upon any possible chance of the enemy countries, Germany particularly, getting alongside of us in the years which are to come, than was the case during the last forty years.

[I mentioned the other day at this Conference that before the Conference rose I proposed to test the feeling of the Conference upon the question of differentiation of rates through the Suez Canal, and I have written a notice of motion out to-day for the purpose of bringing this matter up. I propose to read it, and it is one of the directions in which I think we should grapple with that fear of the future which we have regarding an enemy who has proved himself so unscrupulous and barbarous in every possible way, and I think we want to start to grip it through trade channels. I mention it here only incidentally to show that this, amongst other things, is another way in which we should approach it: "That in the opinion of the Imperial War Conference the rates levied upon shipping using the Suez Canal should be differentiated to impose an additional 50 per cent. upon all enemy-owned or chartered vessels using the Canal. The additional charge to be for a period of 10 years after the conclusion of peace." I am of opinion that when dealing with this, &c., &c.

Order of Business.

CHAIRMAN: The next subject on the agenda paper is the Imperial Court of Appeal. Very great difficulty has arisen here. The original motion stands in the name of the Prime Minister of Australia, and to that there is, I believe, an amendment to be moved—at all events, there is a draft amending Resolution on the paper. Unfortunately, Mr. Hughes has sent to say that he cannot be here this morning, because he is not well, and has asked that it should be taken this afternoon. On the other hand, the Lord Chancellor, whose presence is very essential, is waiting to come to the Conference. He is ready to come at a moment's notice, and he cannot attend this afternoon. So that it is my duty to put it to the Conference, in whose hands the matter entirely rests, and ask them to decide, in face of those two conflicting difficulties, what course they will take.

Mr. MASSEY: May we have the benefit of Mr. Cook's advice, as representing Australia?

Mr. COOK: I can only say how much I regret the absence of my colleague. I suggest it could very well be left over till this afternoon.

Mr. MASSEY: What about the Lord Chancellor?

CHAIRMAN: What shall we do about getting somebody to represent the Lord Chancellor?

Mr. COOK: Surely that could be done.

CHAIRMAN: We cannot have him, I understand. Sir Joseph, are you ready to go on with the question of the Suez Canal?

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Yes, at any time.

CHAIRMAN: Then perhaps it would be convenient if we put down Medals for this afternoon. There is an Army Council meeting going on.

Mr. COOK: Could we not deal with Medals this morning?

CHAIRMAN: I am afraid we cannot get the Adjutant-General. He is at the Army Council.

Mr. BURTON: I thought an agreement had been arrived at about that.

CHAIRMAN: We have got a programme for Friday. We might occupy the time usefully whilst we are waiting for Lord Robert Cecil, who is coming, in just considering it. We will take the subjects on the Agenda and go through them. The Imperial Court of Appeal, and Medals, we shall deal with this afternoon, and then that leaves us on Friday with the Admiralty Memorandum, Raw Materials, and Shipping, which come from Committees, and the Address to His Majesty.

Mr. COOK: What about the Pacific question?

CHAIRMAN: And, of course, now the Pacific question will come on on Friday. That gives us rather a long programme. I do not know what the discussion on the Admiralty Memorandum is going to be.

Mr. MASSEY: I have two very important resolutions which have been put back time after time. I hope they will not be put off till Friday evening at nine o'clock, or something of that sort. There is one on Shipping, which is most important.

CHAIRMAN: That is put down for Friday morning.

Mr. MASSEY: There is the other one about alteration in the Royal Arms.

CHAIRMAN: I must see you about that. We cannot raise that here.

15th Day.]

NAVAL DEFENCE.

[24 July 1918.]

Naval Defence.

Mr. ROWELL: Would it expedite matters if I were to repeat what I said the other day, Mr. Long, in reference to the Admiralty Memorandum? I have since had an opportunity of consulting Sir Robert Borden about it, and his view is just as I expressed the other day—that at the present stage of the proceedings it is not a matter which we could discuss here in the Conference, because the Admiralty Memorandum would have to be submitted, the Prime Minister feels, to his colleagues in Canada, and the whole situation reviewed and discussed with the Admiralty here, before Canada would be prepared to enter into any discussion in this Conference of the Admiralty proposals.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I might say that, as Minister of the Naval Service in Canada, I confirm Mr. Rowell's statement. I have had several talks with the Prime Minister, and he thinks it would be better if the representatives of the Oversea Dominions would meet the Admiralty with us and discuss the question first. Probably we should in that way get a better idea of each other's views, and of what the Admiralty really want.

Mr. LLOYD: Has the Memorandum been circulated?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: It is not much use discussing it here, and also discussing it with the Admiralty. Do you not think so, Mr. Cook?

Mr. COOK: I do not think I should say anything about this, because it is a matter which affects more nearly others. We have had our arrangements for the last eight or nine years, and upon those lines we are developing.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Who is raising the question—New Zealand or Australia?

Mr. COOK: The Admiralty raises the question by submitting a Memorandum.

Mr. ROWELL: May I suggest, Mr. Long, that you take the judgment of the Conference on the question whether it should be put on the Agenda at all? Our feeling would be that it is not desirable in the present session of the Conference to put it on the Agenda.

Mr. LLOYD: But before that can be put I would like to know what is referred to.

CHAIRMAN: Last year we had a discussion on the Admiralty arrangements for the future, and as to what steps it was proposed to take to protect the Imperial position in the Pacific against risks in the future, and the discussion ended in the understanding that there was to be an Admiralty Memorandum prepared. But there was some question apparently as to what course this Conference was to take. Now the Admiralty have prepared a Memorandum: it has been circulated to the Conference for some considerable time now, and it has made its appearance on the Agenda. But we now know that Canada does not propose to discuss it here—does not want it discussed here.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: And for a very good reason. If you refer to the proceedings at last year's Conference, you will see that it was stated clearly that there would be no discussion on the Admiralty question—the question of local navies or Imperial navies—until after the war; and that is the reason why Canada is not fully prepared now to discuss the matter.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: No one wants to force a discussion against the will of any other country, I am sure, but is not the position we are taking up a little illogical? At the last conference a Resolution was carried here, inviting the Admiralty to frame a system which they thought most likely to protect the Empire, whether local or general.† The Admiralty have done that, and they have sent a Memorandum to the Conference, and surely there should not now be a sort of shyness on the part of this Conference in discussing it. As I say, I am quite sure that no one would wish to force the matter, but surely, having asked the Admiralty for the report, and having got that report, it is a little illogical for the Conference to decide, when we have got it here, that, instead of discussing it here, it should be referred to the respective Governments for their consideration.

NAVAL DEFENCE.

[15th Day.]

278

Mr. LLOYD: That hardly meets the case.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: On Friday, March 30th, last year, this is what was done: "That the Admiralty be requested to work out immediately after the conclusion of the war what they consider the most effective system of Naval Defence for the Empire, for the consideration of the several Governments summoned to this Conference, with such recommendations as the Admiralty consider necessary in that respect for the Empire's future security."

CHAIRMAN: That does not prevent the matter being raised this year in any way at all.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Canada has not any objection to its being raised, but before I left Canada I talked the matter over with the Prime Minister, and he said the matter was not coming up at all on account of this Resolution. We have no objection to discussing it, but as we are going to discuss it with the Admiralty, we do not see the necessity of discussing it here.

CHAIRMAN: You do not propose to take any part in it?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Not as far as this Conference is concerned.

Mr. MASSEY: I do not see how it is possible to do justice to it at this period of the Conference. We are all intensely concerned—I am speaking now of all British citizens—with the defence of the Pacific, because up to the present it has been very unsatisfactory; there is no question about that. It is no use at the present moment going into details, but nobody feels more strongly about it than I do, and I am very anxious that we should bring about a better state of things as soon as we possibly can. I know the present arrangement will hold out till the end of the war, but we had some very serious happenings in the Pacific at the commencement of the war, and I think it was from want of understanding the position on the part of the Admiralty. However, it is no use going into it now.

CHAIRMAN: Shall we let it stand for Friday, or take it off altogether?

Mr. LLOYD: There is the other suggestion—that there should be a meeting of the various Governments outside.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Canada is very anxious—and I am anxious as Minister of Naval Affairs—to know your views, Mr. Massey, and Mr. Cook's, before I leave London; but I thought I could get the benefit of them when we were discussing it with the Admiralty.

Mr. COOK: I am inclined to think it would be better to discuss it there before bringing it here.

Mr. MASSEY: I think so, too. This is a matter which should be regarded during the war period as strictly confidential, and it is a fact, disguise it how we may, that anything of importance we agree upon, becomes—not at once, but in course of time—the property of the Empire. We create an atmosphere by discussing it, and that atmosphere finds its way outside.

CHAIRMAN: What the Admiralty say is that they cannot go on with their schemes until they have an understanding as to certain definite principles with the Dominion Governments.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: That is quite right, Mr. Long. What the Prime Minister would like, and I would like, is to have it removed from the Agenda here, and have it discussed at the Admiralty.

CHAIRMAN: Do you propose that?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes.

CHAIRMAN: Canada proposes that the Admiralty Memorandum now down for discussion on Friday should be removed from our Agenda, and that the Governments should decide to discuss it with the Admiralty. Is that the pleasure of the Conference?

Mr. LLOYD: What does that mean?

CHAIRMAN: That we shall not discuss it in the Conference at all.

Mr. LLOYD: That is another point. Does that mean not discussing it again, or to discuss it all together—to get all the Dominions?

* Resolution IV. of Imperial War Conference, 1917, p. xii. of Dominions No. 62.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes, to get them all together.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I see no objection to discussing it in the Conference, and it is put down on the Agenda. If we are to pass Resolutions at this Conference deciding upon a particular course, and we have that course recorded in our proceedings, and then, at a subsequent meeting, we expunge from our own record what we deliberately decided before, anybody looking at the records a year hence would wonder what sort of a Conference it was. We expected to get a decision after the war, but if the Admiralty send in their Memorandum before the war is concluded, surely we should be prepared to let it come before the Conference, and then decide what course to take. I have no objection to discussing it with the Admiralty. What are we going to do after discussing it with the Admiralty, supposing there is any disagreement between any of the members on any of the points which come before the Admiralty? The discussion is to be confidential, and rightly so, and until the Admiralty removes that confidentiality, as far as the people of the British Empire are concerned they have no knowledge whatever of what is going on as between the representatives of the Admiralty and their own representatives as to what is to be done in connection with naval matters. It has to be decided in our own countries finally, and by our own Governments, who have, after all, the full right to decide what to do, and they will decide in accordance with what they think best in their own circumstances and for the Empire as a whole. I am of opinion that it should come up here, and if you like then to refer it again to the Admiralty for a subsequent Conference, by all means do so. But to pass a Resolution of this sort expunging it from the records I look upon as a most unusual and unsatisfactory thing to do.

Mr. COOK: What we are proposing to do is what Sir Joseph Ward does every day of his life at home—he alters the programme of Parliament as it suits the Government from time to time. And certain it is that however you may discuss it here, you have got to discuss it in secret as well. You cannot discuss the strategic aspects of the naval question across this table—nobody can do that—it has got to be done by the Admiralty at some time and place, and what is suggested now is that in order to save time we should get down to these considerations first with the Admiralty, and then, if necessary, bring it to this table afterwards for ratification.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Whatever is secret will be kept, and if necessary, secret for all time, but if this united Empire cannot show combined strength, and let the enemy know how far we are prepared to stand together with a view to muzzling him and downing him in future, then it is a weak course to take. The time may and will in all probability arise to remove the confidence in order to allow your enemy to know what you have made up your mind to do, when it is to your advantage, and not to his advantage, to know what has been decided.

Mr. MASSEY: I do not know whether it is possible to arrive at an understanding as to what should be done from the naval point of view. Personally, I know there are strong differences of opinion with regard to it, but I do think that some of the advantages which the enemy has had during this war have been owing to the knowledge that he was able to obtain about everything we were doing. Nothing was kept from him, no matter what it was—he was allowed to go to our naval reviews, and our military reviews, and places like those great establishments where munitions are manufactured, and weapons prepared, and guns made, and all that sort of thing. It came out in the Law Courts just recently that he had been keeping an accurate record of it—of nearly everything done in England—nearly the whole of our preparations. I do think that sort of thing should be avoided as far as possible. When we have arrived at an understanding, and come and ask for legislation, either by the British Parliament or by the Dominions, then it must come before the public, so far as it is desirable to make public the understandings at which we arrive, but until then I do not think we should publish anything more than we can possibly help, especially on a matter such as this.

CHAIRMAN: Is it the wish of the Conference that the Admiralty Memorandum be not taken here, and that it be left to the Governments to discuss the matter with the Admiralty in person.

[Agreed.]

Differential Suez Canal Dues.

CHAIRMAN: Now, Sir Joseph, will you be kind enough to raise your question for which Lord Robert Cecil has been good enough to come?

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Yes, sir. I move:

"That in the opinion of the Imperial War Conference the rates levied upon shipping using the Suez Canal should be differentiated to impose an additional 50 per cent. upon all enemy-owned or chartered vessels using the Canal; the additional charge to be for a period of 10 years after the conclusion of peace."

I want to say that I am quite aware of the fact that in passing this Resolution, it is only a recommendation for consideration of those who govern the Suez Canal—that means principally the representatives of the British Government and the French Government—and that nothing can be done in a matter such as this without the full concurrence of the British and the French Governments. I also know that the British Government has seven-sixteenths of the whole shareholding in this great company. It does not alter the fact that, since the beginning of this war, Germany has shown very clearly that she was prepared to down the British Empire in all parts, and by the most diabolical means they have endeavoured to strike terror into innocent and undefended communities, both on the Continent and among the British people as well, both on land and sea, by most diabolical means that before this war were unknown. And it seems to me that if we want seriously to prevent the Germans from remaining in the position that they were fast approaching before the war, we have every right, in a legitimate way, to use all the means that we control—and we practically own with the French Government the Suez Canal—so as to prevent them obtaining a similar position in the years that are to come.

I do not know whether it is generally known or not what proportion of the trade going through the Suez Canal was German prior to the war, but I propose, at all events, to put on record what the position is; and I sincerely hope, Mr. Long, that we are not going to be placed in the position of saying that we are not to take the gloves off in connection with this water-way on the score that it would be an interference with the freedom of the seas. That aspect of the question I do not propose to discuss here, except to say that a piece of land which prevented two oceans from meeting has been dug out and has been created a part of the highway connecting the seas. There is a great deal of talk about the enemy's right to have the freedom of the seas, but I hold that the people who carry a work of that kind out—the French people in the first instance, and the British Government, through the purchase of shares by the then Prime Minister of the day, coming in for a share in the control of the Canal—I hold that the Suez Canal, which was dug out by those people, and is largely owned by the British as well as the French, who were originally responsible for its construction, is in a different position to what is covered by the ordinary term "freedom of the seas." And I hope that the gloves are going to be taken off in a matter of this sort, and that the British Government and the French Government, while allowing the use of the Suez Canal upon even terms to those Powers which have been friendly to us during the currency of this war, are not going to be squeamish about Germany in connection with the future use of the Suez Canal.

In 1913 there were 4,979 vessels passed through the Suez Canal, with a net tonnage of 19,758,040. The British had 2,902 vessels, with a net tonnage of 11,887,170; the Germans 771 vessels, with a net tonnage of 3,317,593; the French 255 vessels, with a net tonnage of 925,709; the Dutch 338 vessels, with a net tonnage of 1,283,986; Austria-Hungary 244 vessels, with a net tonnage of 843,068; Russia 109 vessels, with a net tonnage of 337,342; Italy 89 vessels, with a net tonnage of 256,594; Norway 44 vessels, with a net tonnage of 93,352; the Ottoman Empire 11 vessels, with a net tonnage of 19,896; Denmark 56 vessels, with a net tonnage of 172,938; Japan 68 vessels, with a net tonnage of 343,580; Spain 26 vessels, with a net tonnage of 75,645; and other nationalities 66 vessels, with a net tonnage of 201,167. In 1915 there were 3,708 vessels passed through the Suez Canal, with a net tonnage of 15,266,155. In 1915 Germany had no vessels passing through it; Austria-Hungary had none. Turkey none, Siam none, Persia none, China none, and Portugal none; and that owing to war accounts for the reduction of about 4,000,000 tons during that particular year.

Now, Mr. Long, it may be said, by those who are intimately concerned, that by carrying a Resolution such as this finally into effect, it is going to interfere with the revenue of the Suez Canal. The revenue in 1906 was 4,430,749*l.*, and it went up year by year. In 1907 it was 4,752,381*l.*; in 1908, 4,411,039*l.*; in 1909, 4,782,724*l.*; in 1910, 5,289,887*l.*; in 1911, 5,461,358*l.*; in 1912, 5,535,914*l.*; and in 1913, 6,140,403*l.* Well, my answer to that is that if such a proposal as this can be put into effect after the war is over, whatever loss of trade is due to enemy vessels no longer carrying a large proportion of their trade through the Suez Canal to the East, Australia, New Zealand, India, and those countries—the Suez Canal was the shortest route to enable steamers to go there—the great proportion of that trade is going to be secured and taken up by British vessels and by vessels owned by friendly Allied countries. It seems to me we ought not to consider for a moment whether this step is going to affect injuriously the trade carried by Germany after the war as compared with what she previously carried. Because, after all, there is the fact that in the year 1913 and previous years, the Germans had the next largest tonnage to the British going through the Suez Canal, and our partner in the business, the French, were very low down upon the list—they were only 927,000 tons in the year previous to the war, and, indeed, since the war, with Germany out, their net tonnage is only 666,122; so after all this proposal is one to enable British interests and those friendly Allies of ours to have the benefit of this Canal, and by receiving the benefits of it, it must tremendously influence manufacturing in Britain, and that, I take it, will be part of the policy to be brought into operation when this war is over. At all events, I hope it will be.

The British tonnage in 1911 passing through the Canal was 63 per cent.; in 1912, 63·4; in 1913, 60·2; in 1914, 66·5; in 1915, 76·3; and in 1916, 79·6. So that the British tonnage, by every examination of what has gone through that Canal, is distinctly and by far the largest that was using it prior to the war. Now is it justifiable for these countries who control the Canal to say that they are going to charge enemy countries a higher rate than they are going to charge themselves for the use of what belongs to themselves? Well, as a matter of fact, if Germany had it, I am perfectly certain they would take it out of the British people within a month after the war was over, and in all probability use it for purposes of indemnity if they succeeded in winning the war, which I do not think there is the slightest chance of their doing. Is it justifiable, Mr. Long, for a country to say it is going to favour its own people in regard to what belongs to them? As a matter of fact, no man in ordinary life would put his enemy on the same footing as his friend, if his enemy was trying to cut his throat; and here is a country which has been trying to cut our throat all along, and all these years they have had the advantage of using the Suez Canal on even terms with ourselves. In years gone by that has helped them, by increasing their trade, to get into the position of being able to force this war upon us, which has resulted in Great Britain having to borrow thousands of millions of money, and in imposing enormous liabilities on all the oversea countries and our Allies, because Germany attempted to make its already strong position still stronger at the point of the bayonet and at the mouth of the gun by an attempt to dominate the whole world.

The charges on the Canal before the war were 8·50 francs per ton, and now they have risen 75 per cent. above the pre-war rates. My opinion is that, as the highway to the East and as the highway to the oversea countries in the Pacific, the pre-war rate, as soon as the war is over, ought to be brought into operation as quickly as possible. But if you bring the 8·50 francs per ton rate into operation as soon as the war is over, and allow Germany to have the use of the Canal at that rate, that is going to be a most powerful weapon up against the British merchant, the British shipowner, and the British people in the oversea countries, and you will handicap them to an extent that is going to allow Germany to run a race on even terms for equality and supremacy in mercantile matters that, in my opinion, will be very injurious to the future of ourselves and countries friendly to us. Personally, I would go a great deal further than that. I suppose after the war is over, it could only be done with the consent of the British authorities—I do not know—but as far as New Zealand is concerned, I for one, and I have said it publicly, would be prepared to put a big handicap against them in our harbours by making our harbour dues, our lighthouse charges, and so on, very much heavier for German shipping than for those of British and friendly Powers. And, as a matter of fact, in New Zealand we have already upon our Statute Book—the importations from enemy countries ceased, of course, from the beginning of the war, but we have the authority of Parliament to bring into operation a handicap of 60 per cent. on all importation of goods from Germany after peace has been arranged. Now what is the use of our oversea countries taking this course with a view to confining the trade to interests friendly to us and to the British Empire in particular, unless we have co-operation from the point of view of preventing the growth of this trade by our arch enemy in years to come by their using the Suez Canal upon equal terms?

DIFFERENTIAL SUEZ CANAL DUES.

[15th Day.]

Well, I am not going to detain the Conference by elaborating this matter further. I have put a few facts on record for the purpose of showing what the position is. I believe we all recognise that the Germans were preparing to oust us, they were preparing to ruin us as a country, and I do not think, as a matter of sensible procedure, we ought to allow them to utilise those advantages which, in regard to the Suez Canal, ourselves and France have got on terms equal with our own people. I sincerely hope this Resolution will be carried, and I have enough sense to know that, if carried, it will require to go to the War Cabinet, and that from them it will require to go and receive the concurrence of the French Government, and that unless it did, we could not do anything. But I apprehend that the French are just as deeply impressed as we are with the fact that they are fighting for their very existence against an unscrupulous foe, and just as ready to use the natural and legitimate means for the purpose of preventing that country, in the years to come, from getting into a position which they will use every means to do, if not firmly handled, for the purpose in the years to come, of again trying to put down the British Empire and the French nation, to gain an ascendancy for themselves. I move the Resolution.

CHAIRMAN: The Resolution is:—

“That in the opinion of the Imperial War Conference the rates levied upon shipping using the Suez Canal should be differentiated to impose an additional 50 per cent. upon all enemy-owned or chartered vessels using the Canal; the additional charge to be for a period of ten years after the conclusion of peace.”

Would Lord Robert Cecil like to make a statement to the Conference now?

Lord ROBERT CECIL: If it meets with the wishes of the Conference. Of course, I hope it is quite unnecessary for me to say that the British Government are as anxious as Sir Joseph Ward, or any member of the Conference can be, to utilise all our powers to prevent the Prussian power ever being in a position of striking not only at the British Empire, but at the world at large, in the way in which they have struck in this war. If Sir Joseph Ward will forgive me for saying so—I am sure he will not think I am adopting in any sense a hostile attitude—I rather resent the use of such phrases as that “the time has come for taking the gloves off.” As far as the British Government is concerned, they took the gloves off at the beginning of the war, and they have done everything they can—everything they thought was in the interest of the Allies—to carry on the war with the utmost vigour and power. Certainly I can speak very definitely since I have been a member of the Government, now over three years, and I do not like it to be said, even in the privacy of this Conference—I do not like it suggested—I do not suppose Sir Joseph had that in his mind, but I do not like phrases to be used which might suggest to outsiders that there is any want of wholeheartedness in the prosecution of the war by this country.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I did not intend or desire to suggest that at all.

Lord ROBERT CECIL: No, I am sure you did not, but the phrase is just one of those that might be misunderstood. Just let me say one other word before I come to the difficulties that there are in the way of the proposal. I quite agree with Sir

Lord ROBERT CECIL—cont.

Joseph Ward that this is not a matter in which we should too nicely weigh questions of revenue. I should not ask the Conference to deal with this on the basis that it might, or might not, injure the revenue to be obtained from the Suez Canal users. That is much too small a matter to be dealt with in connection with so big a subject.

The difficulties are twofold. In the first place, Sir Joseph Ward spoke as if the Suez Canal belonged to us. That, of course, is not the true position at all. Until the beginning of this war Egypt was in no sense part of the British Empire; it was part of the Turkish Empire technically, and all our position and the position of the other European Powers was that we had Consuls-General resident in Egypt, who gave advice to Egypt which the Egyptian Government was theoretically entitled to neglect or adopt as they liked. It is quite true we had relatively great forces there, both economically and militarily, and in reality our position was much stronger than the technical phrases might imply; but it had this great importance—that our rights as against other foreign Powers were no greater than theirs, and we could do nothing in Egypt, practically speaking, or very little, without the consent and approval of all the other foreign Powers. I hope that position will become much easier in future, but that is the position even to this day. When the Canal was first constructed, it was constructed by a French Company on the basis of a concession given to it by the then Viceroy of Egypt, Mahomet Said, and in giving it, knowing the international position which Egypt even then had gained, he made this statement:—

"We declare solemnly for us and our successors, under reserve of ratification by His Imperial Majesty the Sultan, the Grand Maritime Canal from Suez to Pelasium and the ports dependent on the same to be free for ever as neutral passages, to all merchant ships passing from one sea to the other without any distinction, exclusion or preference of persons or nationalities, upon payment of the dues and compliance with the regulations established by the Company."

Well, that was a perfectly clear statement that there was to be no preference for one nation over another. And in 1888 Great Britain, Germany, Austria-Hungary, Spain, France, Italy, the Netherlands, Russia, and Turkey entered into a Convention respecting the free navigation of the Suez Maritime Canal. The basis of the Convention was that they wished to establish by a Conventional Act "a definite" system destined to guarantee for all time, and for all the Powers, the free use of the "Suez Maritime Canal, and thus complete the system under which the navigation of" this Canal has been placed by the Firman of His Imperial Majesty the Sultan, "dated 22nd February, 1866." That is not, I think, the Firman I read—it was not a Firman strictly, but a concession, but it was the Firman which ratified that concession. And in this agreement these two clauses are contained: "The high contracting parties" by application of the principle of equality as regards the free use of the Canal, a "principle which forms one of the bases of the present treaty, agree that none of" them shall endeavour to obtain, with regard to the Canal, territorial or commercial "advantages or privileges in any international arrangements which may be concluded. Moreover, the rights of Turkey as a territorial Power are observed."* The Convention goes on: "With the exception of the obligations expressly provided by the" clauses of the present treaty, the sovereign rights of His Imperial Majesty the "Sultan, and the rights and immunities of His Highness the Khedive, resulting" from the Firmans are any way affected."†

Now I think that on a fair reading of that, everybody will agree that it was an agreement made between the Powers represented there on the basis of the previous concessions and firmans, and defining the obligations and rights of the parties to that agreement in the Canal. The Conference will observe that the signatories of the Convention included three of our enemies—Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Turkey—and as far as they are concerned, they would have, I think, in all probability, no rights after the war in respect of this agreement, which, like all other agreements between us, has been put an end to by the war. But the other parties to it, of course, retain their rights—that is to say, Spain, France, Italy, the Netherlands, and, I suppose, Russia, if she has a Government which we recognise as a successor of the previous Government. And therefore, as far as I can see, there would be very great difficulty, unless we were to imitate the German attitude in regard to treaties and treat them as scraps of paper—I think there would be very great difficulty in our doing anything which any of the signatories thought contrary to the terms of this treaty except with the consent of all the signatories of the treaty. It is quite true you might say you propose only to penalise the enemy countries, therefore it is only they who could object.

* See C. 5623, p. 7.

Mr. COOK: The countries which you say have no rights.

LORD ROBERT CECIL: Yes. You might say that, but it would be open to Spain, for instance, to say, "Well, as far as you are concerned, Germany has no" rights, that is true; but, as far as we are concerned, the Convention remains "operative between us and Germany," which is also true. Spain is not at war with Germany. Spain might say, and would, I think, very probably say, "You have no" right to make any difference in this treaty affecting Germany without our consent: "you must get our consent to it"—and though I should be quite willing, if the Conference thought it desirable, to suggest to the Secretary of State, to urge on the Secretary of State, the desirability of entering into such negotiations, I must honestly say that I think such negotiations are not very likely to succeed, because I do not see quite what Spain would have substantially to get out of them. She certainly has shown during the war extreme reluctance to quarrel with Germany, and the same thing is as true of the Netherlands as of Spain. Therefore I see, from the treaty point of view—I am bound to put this before the Conference, and I should not be assisting in any way if I did not—I see a great difficulty from the point of view of the treaty position, though, of course, I am quite ready, if the Conference desires it, to investigate the matter, and enter into negotiations, and see what can be done in the direction which Sir Joseph Ward desires.

I am bound to add a second consideration which I think the Conference must consider rather carefully. The Suez Canal does not stand altogether alone. There are other waters which are under international control in the same kind of way. There is the Danube, there is the mouth of the Scheldt, which is very important to us, because it gives us access to Antwerp, and, of course, most of all, there is the Panama Canal. And in the case of the Panama Canal, it is interesting to observe—I am not going to trouble the Conference with the history of the controversy—that we had a very great controversy with the United States in order to preserve under our existing treaties our complete freedom of passage through the Canal, and the right we have to prevent any preference being given to American ships. We have therefore stood very strongly there on the principle that there should be complete freedom of navigation in that Canal, and some of—indeed, a good many of—our shipowners are strongly of opinion that we must do nothing which should weaken our position with regard to other international passages of the same kind. Quite recently a Committee was appointed by the Board of Trade to advise them on shipping and shipbuilding industries. I am not an expert in these matters, but I can see by the names of the signatories that it was a committee which was representative of all the largest shipping interests in this country, and I find that at paragraph 320 they reported that—

"the right of transit has three forms, according as it affects ships, goods or persons. It is a right that should be given to vessels of all flags to pass through a waterway in the territory of a given country from one sea to another sea or to goods and persons to pass in transit across the intervening territory of a third country. Such a right is an integral part of the general policy of freedom which we advocated above; and we think it sufficiently fundamental to be embodied in the diplomatic instruments which will no doubt be drawn up at the end of the war for the future regulation of international intercourse. Practice in the past has been as follows:—

"(1) Vessels.—The outstanding instances of equal treatment for all flags are afforded by the Suez Canal and by the Panama Canal. The principle of equality, which is of the utmost importance to international relations after the war, was furthered by the acquiescence of the United States Government in the claim of His Majesty's Government that preferential treatment in respect of the remission of tolls on the Panama Canal could not be accorded to American coastwise shipping under the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty. We should, therefore, deprecate any arrangement, direct or indirect, which would give British shipping preferential treatment in respect of Suez Canal dues."

Well, I am not an expert on the shipping trade, but I think the Conference ought to consider that, from the point of view of the very important interests here, we should be doing ourselves injury by insisting on any such proposal as that which has been brought before the Conference.

Those are the two difficulties. It is my business to bring them before the Conference. It is for the Conference to decide what it thinks ought to be done. And the only thing that I hope and trust the Conference will not do, if I may very respectfully say so to them, is to pass any Resolution which could be construed by our enemies as indicating indifference to the sanctity of our treaty obligations. I am quite ready to negotiate about treaties and get those who have rights under them to make concessions as to their rights, but I do hope we shall do nothing which should indicate in any way that we regard lightly the treaty obligations into which we have entered. I do not think there is anything else I have to say. I should not like the Resolution as it stands. I would like it put more tentatively, if Sir Joseph Ward will excuse my saying so.

Mr. ROWELL: While we have been greatly interested in the statement which Sir Joseph Ward made and the figures which he has given us as to the Suez Canal, I think that as far as we are concerned we feel, in view of the statement made by Lord Robert Cecil as to the true position, and also the practical considerations governing this matter, that perhaps Sir Joseph would agree that, having brought it before the Conference, it was unnecessary for him to press the Resolution. I think our view would be that it should not be pressed.

CHAIRMAN: We could not pass this Resolution in face of what Lord Robert has said, because it expresses a desire that we should do a thing which, apparently, as things stand at present, would result in our tearing up a treaty as a scrap of paper.

Mr. ROWELL: I think the matter is safe in the hands of the Government.

LORD ROBERT CECIL: I would rather, on the whole, that there were no Resolution, but I do not press that. If the Conference desires that the matter should be further examined and looked into to see what can be done, I should not resist any Resolution in that sense. The reason why I do not like this Resolution is that it definitely defines what should be done immediately, without, apparently, having any consideration of treaty obligations, and I think Sir Joseph Ward will probably see that there is a difficulty about passing it in that particular form.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Perhaps the Conference will allow me to say a word at this juncture. I want to remove an impression which Lord Robert Cecil apparently entertained regarding my remarks about "taking the gloves off." I made no allusion to the British Government, directly or indirectly, as to their having shown a want of whole-heartedness in their desire to win the war in any of my remarks to-day nor at any time. On the contrary, in England and elsewhere I have frequently spoken in strong support and approval of what has been done by the British Government since the commencement of the war, and I hold the opinion, as I have said repeatedly, that what has been done here no other country in the world could have done so well. I have never presumed to criticise the conduct of the Government of this country in regard to the conduct of the war while I have been in England, here in the Conference, or elsewhere. The whole of my object was to emphasise the very serious position after the war, and in talking about taking the gloves off I was applying that to the whole British people in all parts of the Empire, and was certainly not reflecting upon anything which the British Government have done during the term of the war. I recognise just as much as anybody else does that, in the Titanic struggle in which we are engaged, what this country had to do was phenomenal, and I also realise that no other country could have done what this country has done, and if my remarks appeared to imply any reflection upon the British Government or a want of whole-heartedness on their part to win the war, or to conduct operations to bring that about, when I spoke about taking the gloves off, I desire to say that no such thing was in my mind, nor did I ever intend it to so apply.

LORD ROBERT CECIL: I am very much obliged.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Now I quite recognise that Lord Robert Cecil's statement, in the responsible position he holds, as to how we stand with regard to treaties which have been signed by neutral countries, and, in the particular case he cited, by Spain, a country which is not at war with Germany, naturally it makes it impossible for my Resolution to be carried in its original form. But I would prefer that the Conference in a general way should pass a Resolution urging that inquiry or investigation, or whatever it may be called, should be made with a view to seeing whether we cannot impose some extra charges upon those enemies using the Suez Canal that have been trying to wipe us out of existence.

LORD ROBERT CECIL: I should be quite willing, as far as my opinion is worth anything, to accept that.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Well, if the Resolution can be altered in that way, I shall be only too glad to move it. Personally, I want to say to my friends from Canada—and I want to say it with all respect, and I am sure they will understand it—that I do not believe as a general principle in running away from a proposal. Here is a matter in which we are all vitally concerned, and as to which I, for one, am in dead earnest—and I know you are just as much in earnest as I am. But if we bring Resolutions up with a little sting, and, because there are some difficulties in putting them into effect, we at once drop them, and decide that we are not going to carry anything at all, I do not think that is good policy though it may be necessary after full discussion to do so. I do not think that is the way a general who has had a bad time in fighting an enemy acts; on the contrary, he alters his course, and tries in some form or other to get his ground strengthened. That is what I would like to do. I shall be extremely glad to have the assistance of the Canadian representatives in agreeing to some Resolution in the terms to which I have just referred. As I have already said, I fully recognise the difficulties suggested by Lord Robert Cecil, and I recognise them with complete cordiality.

Mr. COOK: I think we are under great obligation to Lord Robert for having put this matter so clearly to us. It is not so simple a matter as I had supposed, because of the fact that it affects our relations with neutral countries, and this fact seems to present what seem at the moment almost insuperable obstacles to our carrying out what otherwise would have been a very desirable thing to do. I agree with Sir Joseph Ward that we must not be squeamish about our treatment of our enemies, either militarily or economically, and that any weapon which comes handy can be used in a war of this kind. But, on the other hand, we may not use weapons which are forbidden by the law of nations, which it is the great purpose of this war to uphold and to compel respect for. We must be very careful that we are not guilty of the very crime as a result of which we are fighting at this moment. Therefore, it seems to me, that all we can possibly do in this matter at the present time is to ask the Imperial Government to investigate the matter, to see whether we can, consistently with our treaty obligations to our neutral neighbours, interfere with Suez Canal rates so as to give preferential treatment to the Allies. Everything depends on that. There can be no objection to our asking the Government to go as far as that, but, without violating the obligations which we have entered into with neutral countries, it appears plain that we cannot proceed further in a matter of this kind at the present time.

Mr. BURTON: Mr. Long, I only want to say that this is how the matter strikes me, after the very interesting explanation which Lord Robert has given us of the diplomatic position—that really, at present, the subject is one which we may safely leave to the Imperial Government to deal with. I feel that we are quite safe in the hands of the Foreign Office in this matter, and that they will make any inquiry which may be suitable and possible for them to make. That is my feeling about it. I think that after the statement which Lord Robert Cecil has made to us we should not pass a Resolution at all, but simply leave the whole matter to the British Government to deal with.

Mr. LLOYD: That represents my opinion. I do not think we should pass a Resolution dealing with how a differentiation of rates between neutrals and enemies in the Suez Canal is to be brought about; because it seems to me there is the much larger question of how any change would affect our own trade with reference to the use of the Panama Canal and other waterways. That appears to me to be far more important, and I would deprecate any Resolution being passed, except something very, very general, with regard to investigation, upon this occasion. Perhaps the suggestion will be enough.

Mr. MASSEY: I should just like to say that in my opinion, consistent with treaty obligations, of course, and the principles of common justice, we should leave nothing undone which will assist us in connection with the commercial and industrial struggle upon which I feel certain we shall be compelled to enter when the war comes to an end. I have it on the most reliable authority that in neutral countries to-day, and especially in Spain, there are warehouses, many of them as big as these buildings in London, crammed to the roof with raw materials, ready for the time when the Germans will be able to use them for their manufacturing industries. There is not the very slightest doubt that they are getting ready now in every possible direction; and I think this Resolution has a bearing upon the preparations which are being made. In saying that, I should be the very last to interfere with any treaty obligation that may exist to-day. We had quite enough of the tearing up of "scraps of paper," and that sort of thing, at the commencement of the war.

Following that up, I should like to add that we happen to know the intense importance which Germany attaches to the Suez Canal. I picked up a book the other day to read during a few moments of leisure, and I came across a quotation from a German writer—one of those who was encouraged in every possible way by the German Government, and by the Kaiser himself—and in all probability the publication of the book was subsidised, as was the case with so many others. I have not the book at present before me, but I recollect enough of it to give the gist of what I referred to, and it was this: "To be able to stab Britain to the heart we must get possession of the Suez Canal." Now that was a German opinion. Probably Lord Robert Cecil has seen the book I refer to.

LORD ROBERT CECIL: Oh, yes.

Mr. MASSEY: I just mention that as showing the intense importance which Germany attaches to the Suez Canal. And perhaps the Conference will recollect that there was an attempt made by the Turks, at the commencement of the war, actually to obtain possession of the Canal. That attempt failed, and it has not been renewed. But if the war happened to go against us, we could make up our minds to this—that we should lose the Suez Canal, and probably, in addition to losing the ownership, we should lose the right to use it. And it was also with the object of crippling our commerce, and our position in the East, that arrangements were made to start the Baghdad Railway. There is not the slightest doubt that Germany, by starting the Baghdad Railway, intended to interfere with our position in the East. I see the difficulties in the way of what is proposed, but in another direction, Mr. Long, I would like to go further, and I would like to see the British Government take in hand the reconsideration of the navigation laws.

LORD ROBERT CECIL: That is a very different matter.

Mr. MASSEY: Yes, it is a different matter to imposing additional duties on present enemy countries in connection with the Suez Canal, I know; but still, the result would be the same, and if something was done in that direction it would give us an advantage which we do not possess at present. Half a century or so ago—I am not sure of the exact date—the navigation laws then in existence were practically wiped out, leaving us in this position to-day—that when this war comes to an end, there is nothing to prevent Germany or any other enemy country sending its ships to trade between British ports. No other country would allow anything of the sort. America would not think of it for one moment. Only American-owned ships can trade between American ports, and I think I am right in saying that only French-owned ships can trade between French ports. I am speaking now of French possessions in other parts of the world—and in speaking of America I am not speaking only of the United States, but of United States possessions in any other part of the world. Take the islands in the Pacific, for instance; no ships, except American-owned ships, can trade between, say, San Francisco and the islands which America possesses in the Samoan Group. Take Honolulu, for instance, though I was thinking more particularly of Pagopago, which is an island with a very small population but a very good harbour. There is an illustration of what is going on. We allow them to come along—German-owned ships, ships owned by Austria, or by Turkey, can come along directly this war ceases and commence to take up trade which should belong to British ships. We have been far too generous in these respects in past years, and I think the time has come when we should reconsider our position, in connection with Empire matters, as regards the rights and privileges we have granted to outsiders, many of which rights and privileges should be reserved for British citizens themselves. I take the opportunity of making this suggestion because Lord Robert Cecil is here, and I have no doubt he will have the opportunity of repeating something of it to his colleagues in the Government.

LORD ROBERT CECIL: I do not know whether the Conference would think this a satisfactory Resolution, if they desire a Resolution on the subject:—"That this Conference urges the Imperial Government to investigate the circumstances affecting the Suez Canal, including international obligations, with a view to seeing if the Allies can, consistent with our treaty obligations to neutrals and the interests of the British Empire, impose differential duties upon enemy countries after the war." That indicates the policy which Sir Joseph Ward wishes pursued, but guards all our international obligations, and also—what must be considered, no doubt—the interests of the British Empire, because, after all, we do not want to cut off our nose to spite our face.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I think, Lord Robert, with all due deference to you, that that Resolution means that we would not do anything. I recognise your wisdom in putting it in that way, but that practically means this Conference passing a Resolution saying that in view of treaty obligations nothing can be done with regard to the Suez Canal.

LORD ROBERT CECIL: No, no; nothing without regard to our treaty obligations.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I think I would prefer not to move that Resolution, because, if I may say so, if you hold out the olive branch to the neutral countries, some of whom have treaties with us regarding the Suez Canal, and suggest to them that they should continue as they are, the obvious answer will be, "Yes, we will go on as we are—that is, we will do nothing." I realise that we can pass nothing here without full recognition of the necessity of the British Government fulfilling their treaty obligations—that I recognise fully—but if we are to pass a Resolution that everything is to be done upon the basis of existing treaties, I think it would be better to pass no Resolution at all. I am afraid that is how it stands.

LORD ROBERT CECIL: I have taken the words suggested to me by Mr. Cook.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I suggest that if we pass a Resolution we pass one that in the opinion of this Conference it is desirable that the British Government should after the war endeavour to arrange for differentiation in charges for the use of the Suez Canal as against enemy countries, and not a general Resolution passed simply asking that you should go into it. If the treaty obligations are such that the British Government cannot get them altered, I recognise that at once.

Mr. COOK: Sir Joseph, if you look at it, the Resolution amounts to this—that this Conference is in favour of tearing up our treaties.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I am not in favour of doing that.

Mr. COOK: That is what it means. That is the trouble.

DIFFERENTIAL SUEZ CANAL DUES: ORDER OF BUSINESS.

[24 July 1918.]

Mr. MONTAGU: I could not accept Sir Joseph Ward's suggestion, because I think there are two things we have to guard against—the one which was mentioned, tearing up treaty obligations without the willingness of our Allies, and the other thing we have to avoid is doing ourselves harm. We have now got, I am glad to think, free access to the Suez Canal; we also have free access to the Panama Canal, and we shall continue to enjoy it. Do not let us start doing something which might have the effect of depriving us of that, because that would be just as serious to us as penalising our enemies in regard to the Suez Canal would be to them. Lord Robert Cecil's Resolution brings both in—both the interests of the Empire and our treaty rights—and if, upon investigation—I am not speaking wholly ignorantly, because the country which I represent is particularly interested in the Panama Canal as well as in the Suez Canal—it is proved that the apprehensions about the Panama Canal are not well founded, then by all means let us go on; but I do not think we ought to stand solely upon our treaty rights without making provision for the other.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I hope Sir Joseph Ward will agree not to move a Resolution in the way he has suggested. I would like to remove the impression that Canada shies away from difficult questions—it has never been Canada's way to do that—but in view of the very lucid explanation placed before the Conference by Lord Robert Cecil and the complexity of the question, I think the Conference would be acting wisely in not passing a Resolution at all, but in leaving the matter entirely in the hands of the Imperial Government. It is a very large and wide question.

Mr. LLOYD: There is just one point which occurs to me. I should hesitate to support any Resolution which would contain a suggestion to the American Government to go and do likewise with regard to the Panama Canal.

CHAIRMAN: What you want to decide in the first place is whether you will have a Resolution at all, or whether Sir Joseph Ward will be content with the discussion of the matter—the very interesting debate we have had—and the statement from the Foreign Office, and leave matters there for the present.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I would like to see that Resolution of Lord Robert's.

CHAIRMAN: What I am afraid of is not concerned with the particular subject under discussion, but I am always rather suspicious of passing Resolutions which are drafted hastily in endeavouring to meet differing views. However able the draftsman, he is apt to land you in difficulties which you do not see at the moment, and I should have been very glad if the Conference could have rested content with the discussion, which has been very important, and which has elicited a very full and grave statement from Lord Robert on behalf of His Majesty's Government. If we could have left it there without a Resolution, I think it would have been the wise course for the Conference to take. That is my opinion.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: In deference to Lord Robert's and your opinion, Mr. Long, I am quite prepared to take the course which is suggested. I do not wish, in view of what Lord Robert has stated, to press further my view unduly upon the Conference. It is a matter about which I feel very strongly myself, but I am quite content to leave the matter where it is for the present. I feel quite sure that the British Government will do all they can to help the British Empire; I am quite satisfied as to that. This is not the first time I have brought the matter up, because long before the war I was on the same job. I fully recognise the difficulties that exist with regard to treaties, and I pay every respect to the very important statement made by Lord Robert Cecil. I recognise quite well the difficulties in the way, and rather than embarrass anybody by pressing my Resolution, I am quite content, after having heard the full discussion, and recognising the great difficulties pointed out by Lord Robert Cecil, to let the matter stand as it is for the present.

Order of Business.

CHAIRMAN: Shall we take Medals now? I understand there is agreement on that question.

Mr. MASSEY: There is no agreement as far as I am concerned.

CHAIRMAN: If there is not agreement, we will take it after luncheon.

CHAIRMAN: India is not here, but I think we ought to begin. We come now to the adjourned question of Medals. We have the Adjutant-General present (General Macready) and Sir F. Ponsonby, and also Admiral Palmer from the Admiralty. The proposal made by the War Office is now before the Conference, as the result of the adjourned consideration of the question. Perhaps the Adjutant-General would, first of all, like to make a statement.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: I might simply give the result of yesterday's meeting. We had a meeting at my office yesterday, at which representatives of Australia, New Zealand, Canada, and Newfoundland were present. And the proposal put forward, after some discussion, was that an Imperial decoration should be given to the Dominions, that is to say, Australia, New Zealand, Canada, South Africa, and Newfoundland, to commemorate the participation of the Dominions and Colonies in the Great War, the Dominions to decide upon an emblematic ribbon for their own troops. The conditions laid down by the Dominions and Newfoundland were to be so far analogous to those of the 1914 Star as to confine the decoration to a limited number of soldiers who had taken part in certain operations, or served during a period, to be decided upon by the Dominion or Colony concerned. That is as far as it has gone. I will read this Memorandum of the proceedings:—

"The Adjutant-General presided at a meeting of the Representatives of Australia, New Zealand, Canada, and Newfoundland. Representatives of the Admiralty were present.

"The Representatives of Australia, New Zealand, and Newfoundland expressed themselves satisfied with the idea of an Imperial Decoration to be given to Dominion and Newfoundland troops under conditions which would be supplied by the Governments of those Dominions.

"The Representative for Canada agreed generally, but asked for further time to consider.

"The proposal now put forward is that an Imperial Decoration should be given to the Dominions (Australia, New Zealand, Canada, and South Africa) and Newfoundland, to commemorate the participation of the Dominions and Colonies in the Great War. The Decoration to be identical for all oversea troops.

"The Dominions to decide upon an emblematic ribbon for their own troops.

"The conditions laid down by the Dominions and Newfoundland to be so far analogous to those of the 1914 Star as to confine the Decoration to a limited number of soldiers who had taken part in an operation, or served during a period, to be decided upon by the Dominion or Colony concerned."

Mr. MASSEY: I may say that I am somewhat surprised at what has taken place, Mr. Long. I will tell the Conference why. You will recollect, sir, that we had a lengthy discussion on this subject of war medals at the last Conference, occupying practically two days, and no decision was arrived at, because the War Office came forward with no definite proposal, and nothing was done. We came to the conclusion—we representing the Dominions—that nothing was going to be done in the way of providing recognition for those oversea soldiers—I am speaking practically of oversea soldiers—and I suggested at the time, and I am willing now, that recognition should be given to the Imperial soldiers who took part in the Gallipoli campaign. I say that so that it may be clear. But at the end of the Conference, practically as the last business—judging by the Report I have before me—the question of medals came up. And I asked this question, and I want to ask it again now: "I want to ask the Adjutant-General whether he sees any difficulty in the way of a Dominion Government providing any special recognition for any part of the campaign or war in which their soldiers are specially concerned?" That was because we realised it was impossible to move the War Office, and we had to do it ourselves. The answer from Sir Nevil Macready was:—"I could not answer that."

MEDALS.

[24 July 1918.]

Mr. MASSEY—cont.

Then I asked again: "Is there any special difficulty?" And the answer to that was: "It is a question for His Majesty." Then the discussion went on thus:—

(Chairman.) It will have to go to the King. All medals come from His Majesty.

(Mr. Massey.) What about clasps?

(Sir Robert Borden.) They go with the medal.

(Sir Nevil Macready.) They go with the medal. There is a medal with the King's head on it and clasps.

(Mr. Massey.) I understand that, but is the Royal permission necessary before a clasp can be issued in the way I have suggested?

(Sir Nevil Macready.) Yes.

(Chairman.) Certainly.

(Mr. Massey.) That is all right, I was only asking for information.

Now it was left at that, and I reported what had been done to the Defence Department of New Zealand and to the Defence Minister there, and I have no doubt it was also reported to the Defence Department of Australia and to the Defence Minister there too. A correspondence at once commenced between the two Departments, a good deal of which I had the opportunity of seeing, and at last an understanding was arrived at with regard to a ribbon and a star.

Mr. HUGHES: A ribbon and star.

Mr. MASSEY: Yes, a ribbon and star. The ribbon was submitted to the New Zealand Cabinet, at all events, and an agreement was arrived at between the Department in Australia and the Department in New Zealand. Again, it came up when we met here. And I agreed that all that was wanting was an agreement on the part of Australia, through Mr. Hughes. Mr. Hughes had ventilated it. I thought the thing was done and finished, that it was complete. The consent of the King was asked, and was forthcoming; it was given. Now, to our intense surprise, this is brought up again, after it had been practically decided, and I do not know how long it is going to remain open. We know something of these things. It was mentioned the other day that the Waterloo medal was issued fifteen years after the battle of Waterloo, but I hope it will not be as bad as that this time. I want to know what, really, is the proposal.

Though this is going to be an Imperial decoration, there is not a word about the Imperial troops, and I think, if there is to be an Imperial decoration, it should go to the Imperial troops as well as to those from Australia and New Zealand. If not—I have not consulted with Mr. Hughes since we heard the new proposal—I say we should be prepared to stand where we are. We do not want any invidious distinctions of that sort. I shall be glad if the decoration goes to the whole of the troops who took part in the Gallipoli campaign, irrespective of the period at which they landed. I was quite clear in my mind as to what was meant by this first proposal. It was that the decoration should only be given to those troops who landed in Gallipoli in 1914. But that will not do at all. Personally, I will have nothing to do with that, because the greater part of them landed in 1915, and those who took part in the campaign of 1915 are as much entitled to the decoration as those who fought in 1914, and they fought just as valiantly. I know great value is attached to this decoration by these men, and I am exceedingly anxious they should have it, for the reasons mentioned on the first two occasions, one important reason being that this was the first occasion on which troops from the overseas Dominions took part in European warfare. In any case, it would be unfair, and it would be wrong on my part to undertake to do it, without consulting with my colleague the Minister of Defence in New Zealand, who would in turn consult his staff. I would like to hear what Mr. Hughes thinks of it.

Mr. HUGHES: Mr. Long, I have only just seen this Memorandum of the proceedings which took place yesterday. The second paragraph sets out that the representatives of Australia, New Zealand, and Newfoundland expressed themselves satisfied with the idea of an Imperial decoration to be given to Dominion and Newfoundland troops under conditions which would be supplied by the Governments of those Dominions. Well, I do not object to an Imperial decoration being given to Imperial, or British, or any other troops who took part in that campaign, or in any other, but I am entirely at one with my friend, Mr. Massey. The matter of an Anzac star and ribbon has been the subject of negotiation for some months—a year nearly.

Mr. MASSEY: More.

Mr. HUGHES: And we have come to the British authorities—the Army Council—and the Adjutant-General stated the other day that the Army Council had no objection whatever to the issue of that decoration. We have accepted it, both New Zealand and Australia. There the matter stands, as far as we are concerned. I agree with Mr. Massey, it is finished. Now, if you are going to bring up anything else, do not let us mix it up with that, which is a res gesta. I do not want it reopened and overloaded with other proposals, and the effect of which would be that we should hear no more of it, or very little. As for our part, we stand by the spirit of the bond. An agreement has been arrived at between the British Government and our respective Governments for the issue of a star and ribbon. The pattern, and so on, of the decoration have been agreed upon, and nothing remains now but its issue. I think that is the position.

Mr. MASSEY: Yes, that is the position.

Mr. HUGHES: There the matter ends, as far as I am concerned. If we are to be asked now to consider the question of an Imperial decoration, I do not think that this is the place to bring it forward. If there is to be an Imperial decoration let the British Authorities issue it. We are not to decide what the British troops should get; that is for Great Britain, of course. Our position is, that the troops of Australia and New Zealand who took part in the Gallipoli campaign should receive a star and ribbon. That has been agreed upon, and there is an end of it.

Mr. COOK: What meeting is this that is referred to?

Mr. HUGHES: I do not know. I am informed, by the way, by Sir Robert Garran, who held a watching brief—to use the language of my noble profession—yesterday, and he said he did not assent. He, perhaps, nodded, but even Jove nods. He did not assent. I do not know what the New Zealand representative did; perhaps Mr. Massey can tell us.

Mr. MASSEY: I think, from what General Richardson supplied me with, that he was favourably inclined to the proposal, on certain conditions.

Mr. HUGHES: That is, to the Imperial decoration.

Mr. MASSEY: Yes.

Mr. HUGHES: But that is not a substitute; that is in addition.

Mr. MASSEY: If it is an addition, there is nothing more to be said. I will read you what he said: "General Macready will submit proposals making a star an Imperial decoration, for issuing to all overseas troops on conditions which the respective overseas Governments may decide, and their decision shall be final."

Mr. HUGHES: However, on behalf of Australia, I decline to be bound by anything which was done yesterday. I am standing on what was done and what was agreed to between the British Government and the Australian Government.

CHAIRMAN: I gather that only Australia and New Zealand are concerned with the decoration. You are not concerned with the Gallipoli decoration, Mr. Lloyd, are you?

Mr. LLOYD: Yes. I would like to draw attention—it is only a small matter—to the form of this report of the meeting yesterday, in making a distinction between the Dominions and Newfoundland. It says, "Dominion and Newfoundland troops." I take it that is an informality.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: I am sorry. That is my ignorance. It is an informal report.

Mr. LLOYD: I must say I was under the impression—at all events I gathered at that meeting—that what we did there met with the fullest concurrence of the representatives of Australia and New Zealand. That was the impression with which I left the meeting. And I, for one, gave my assent on the understanding that the decoration, which was intended originally, so far as these Dominions were concerned, to be issued as a local matter, would become an Imperial matter, and would be issued by the Imperial Authorities to all overseas troops who took part in the Gallipoli campaign. Apparently, that is a clear misunderstanding. It is exactly what we in Newfoundland would prefer.

15th Day.]

MEDALS.

[24 July 1918.]

Mr. MASSEY: I think Newfoundland troops were in Gallipoli.

Mr. LLOYD: Decidedly. I am only objecting to the form.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: I ran this out the moment the delegates left the room, it was not an official document.

CHAIRMAN: It is only a matter of striking out the words "and Newfoundland." There seems to be some misunderstanding, because we understood the other day that the representatives of troops who took part in the Gallipoli campaign were not satisfied with the matter as it then stood, and would prefer that the decoration for Gallipoli should be an Imperial one, given in accordance with the wishes of the respective Governments. And that was the origin of this draft proposal, which is, of course, a substitute for the decoration to be issued by the Dominion Governments. But if the Governments of Australia and New Zealand would prefer to revert to the original proposal, of course the War Office have no objection, they will concur in that.

Mr. HUGHES: I think we are using some terms here a little vaguely when we speak of the Imperial Government. The only thing which is entitled to be so called is a body like the Imperial War Cabinet. What we are speaking of now is the British Cabinet, and the War Office, the Department which represents the British Cabinet, says, for its part, it has no objection to this, and there the matter ends. If the British Government would sanction this and approve it, it will carry additional weight with us, and we shall be very glad.

General MEWBURN: The medal issued by the Dominions themselves, to their own troops, would not be a British medal.

Mr. HUGHES: I am inclined to think it would be a British medal. The Department of the British Government which is concerned with this matter examines and makes a recommendation, and, in effect, approves it. Mark you, these troops are troops which are at the disposal of the British Government, who can say to one man "Go here," and to another "Go there." So they can say "You will have a medal."

General MEWBURN: I understood these medals were to be issued by New Zealand, Australia, and Newfoundland to their own troops, with the approval of His Majesty the King. And it would be a distinct medal from the general medal, would it not?

Mr. HUGHES: The Adjutant-General explained that quite clearly. The general medal is to be a medal given to everybody who was in uniform.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: Quite right.

Mr. HUGHES: And there would be, in addition, a different medal, which would have clasps, as determined.—

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: Those who were in a theatre of war.

Mr. HUGHES: And the question of clasps would be decided by a Committee?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: You would not favour one medal showing distinguishing bars, such as a bar for Gallipoli?

Mr. HUGHES: Not unless it is an additional one. I have tried to explain that the position of the British troops who took part in the Gallipoli campaign is entirely different from ours. It was really the first time Australia and New Zealand had taken part in a great war.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: But the South African war was your first.

Mr. HUGHES: That was not a great war like this. This is different entirely.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Supposing all the oversea Dominions said, "We would like a special medal for our troops," would not that be rather invidious?

Mr. MASSEY: That would not do.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: We do not want it. So far as we are concerned, whatever the Imperial medal is, it will satisfy the Canadian troops.

24 July 1918.]

Mr. HUGHES: You must have regard to circumstances. You give one man a medal, you withhold it from another, and the authorities proceed upon the same principle: one man is noticed, another man is not. One deed may be as great as another, but its effects may be different. And our Gallipoli campaign has a distinctly different effect, and a different aspect, from that of our European campaign. Our troops have been exposed to greater dangers in France and Flanders than in Gallipoli, but Gallipoli is quite different. We do not ask for a decoration for Mesopotamia and the other campaigns.

General MEWBURN: There is the Mons star, and that is the only Imperial distinction.

Mr. HUGHES: The Adjutant-General says it is confined to the Imperial troops.

General MEWBURN: That is up to the end of December 1914.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: Midnight 22-23 November 1914.

General MEWBURN: There are very few other than Imperial troops who have the Mons star.

Mr. HUGHES: Very few—practically none.

CHAIRMAN: This is a proposal to repeat the Mons precedent.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: Yes—to use one of Mr. Hughes's phrases, to celebrate the birth of a nation, the entry of the Dominions into a great war.

CHAIRMAN: I understood the idea of the War Office was that as the Mons 1914 star had been established for the troops that took part in the campaign between the 4th August and 22nd-23rd November midnight, it was suggested, on reconsideration, that a decoration, to be the equivalent of the Mons star, should be issued which would include all the forces from the Dominions, and other forces, of course.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: No, only the Dominions. We cannot extend it to the British forces, only to the Dominions.

CHAIRMAN: And that would carry a clasp for Gallipoli?

Mr. HUGHES: I think the decoration loses all its virtue when you object, for some reason or another, to confining it to Australians, New Zealanders, and Newfoundlanders, and propose to extend it to all Dominion troops. Why do you stop there? You say you are not satisfied to restrict it to Australians, New Zealanders, and Newfoundlanders: you want to extend it to the others. Then why not extend it? Why not extend it to all the British troops who fought in Gallipoli? You object to that. Why? It is not our business to enquire. But you do. And therefore I think we had better sit fast on what we have agreed.

Mr. MASSEY: My position is perfectly clear. I could not agree unless I consulted with the New Zealand Defence Minister as to what has taken place, after all the work we have done out there. I could not do it. I do some things on my own account occasionally, but not such a technical thing as this.

Mr. MONTAGU: The last paragraph of the Memorandum says the Dominions can lay down any conditions they like to define. Therefore, if the Commonwealth of Australia were to say to the War Office, "We want it confined to soldiers who took part in Gallipoli," they get it. Mr. Massey can do the same thing. The only difference between this and what we were discussing the other day is, that it is given by the War Office from here, instead of giving it in the Dominions. Is that right, Mr. Hughes?

Mr. HUGHES: I do not know whether it is right or not. After all, why should we discuss a matter which, so far as we are concerned, is settled? We do not get any forwarder with this at all.

General MEWBURN: As I understand it, Australia, New Zealand and Newfoundland settled at the previous Conference what the decoration should be, and it had the approval of the War Office and His Majesty the King.

15th Day.]

MEDALS.

[24 July 1918.]

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: Not with our approval. We finally gave in at the last meeting.

General MEWBURN: The medal would be issued by the Dominions themselves to those troops who fought in Gallipoli. I do not see that the other Dominions have anything to say about it.

Mr. HUGHES: It is only proper to say that this had the sanction of the British Government, because the communications passed, of course, through Mr. Long.

General MEWBURN: And that was approved, as I understand.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: We quite approved of that proposal. If I could, I would like to clear up this difficulty. When we had the last meeting here, I came, as a representative of the War Office, thinking that the arrangements which had already been approved in regard to the decoration which had been arranged between the Governments of Australia and New Zealand were simply going to be ratified—that the thing was all done. At the discussion at this last meeting here, I gathered that there was a wish—certainly the representative of Newfoundland came in, I think for the first time on that occasion, to participate in that, and several references were made to the Dominions as a whole having some decoration to mark, I think Mr. Hughes's words were, "the birth of a nation." There were several references of that kind. It was in order to meet that, and to see what could be done in the direction, that we had this informal meeting the other day, not to see whether it could be extended, but purely and simply to try and meet the wishes of the various Dominions. If matters are to stand as already arranged for the decoration which is approved, with a ribbon for Australia and New Zealand, and that is final, the thing is done as far as the War Office is concerned. We are simply trying, if an enlargement is made to other Dominions, to find a way out of the difficulty. That is the whole point. As regards the British troops, that is, of course, a matter purely for the War Office, and the War Office attitude in that respect is, that they will get two medals at the end of the war, and those who were lucky enough to have been there at the start will get the 1914 star. Beyond that, with the exception of clasps to the medal, we are not prepared to go. But it is clear about the oversea decoration, whatever the official name may be. I understand that was the wish, and we are simply trying to meet it. Therefore the proposal is, that if it is to be extended to the other Dominions, that each Dominion should let us have, at the War Office, their conditions. The Australian and New Zealand idea probably was, that every man who landed at Gallipoli should have it, and probably Newfoundland would say the same. Canada, if they wished, would say their first contingent for Europe. South Africa might choose their troops in South West Africa, or their first contingent to Europe. I am trying to put the position to you. And those conditions would be embodied in the Army Order, the decoration given for so and so. If there is no extension the thing is settled, so far as I am aware.

Mr. MASSEY: It was settled as far as New Zealand and Australia were concerned, only Mr. Hughes's consent had not been officially given. I want to know where we are. Does the War Office intend to give this decoration to the whole of the men who landed in Gallipoli? I am speaking of Australia, New Zealand, and Newfoundland. Please understand I am not speaking in any antagonistic spirit. I prefer that it should not be re-opened, but I want to know exactly where we are, now it is reopened. Do you intend to give it to the whole of the men who landed in Gallipoli, or to confine it to the men who landed before a certain date?

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: We should give it to your men, to the New Zealand troops, under the conditions which you will give us. And the same with regard to Mr. Hughes. We shall accept your conditions.

Mr. HUGHES: There is no objection to that, so far.

Mr. MASSEY: When do you propose the issue shall be given? These are official questions given to me to get an answer to.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: We propose that you should, if possible, make the star yourselves.

Mr. MASSEY: Yes, I think so.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: This medal question is a very big one. We have not begun to do it, but we have our plans drawn up. We propose to break away from the old idea by which all these decorations were made by the Mint. They cannot do it. We have already got contracts out as regards Great Britain, and what we suggest is, that, the design having been finally approved, the various Dominions should make their own, if possible. That would help us considerably.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Mr. Massey, may I ask for a little information? The New Zealand troops who have fought in Gallipoli, I understand, will have a distinguishing medal. What kind of medal?

Mr. MASSEY: Not a medal, a star.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: What will your troops have who have been fighting in France?

Mr. MASSEY: The general one.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Will not there be some jealousy? Have not your New Zealand troops fought in France as well as in Gallipoli? Suppose I was unfortunate enough not to have been in Gallipoli, but I had fought in France, the man who had been in Gallipoli would have a star and I should not? I should feel a little jealous.

Mr. HUGHES: That is what the British "Tommy" says. He says "You went out there in November, 1914, when the war was not as severe as it is now, and you get a medal, that is, the Mons star, but I do not get anything."

Mr. MASSEY: I do not think there will be jealousy.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: It is not our affair, of course.

Mr. COOK: There are distinctions. Anzacs all wear the "A" on the shoulder.

General MEWBURN: Do I understand, assuming that a medal is going to be issued by New Zealand and Australia, that a medal will be issued by those Dominions and not by the British Government?

Mr. MASSEY: It becomes Imperial.

Mr. ROWELL: This proposal is, in effect, to make it so.

General MEWBURN: The Adjutant-General says in this Memorandum "The proposal now put forward is that an Imperial Decoration should be given to the Dominions—Australia, New Zealand, Canada, and South Africa and Newfoundland—to commemorate the participation of the Dominions and Colonies in the "Great War." Will that Imperial decoration be confined to Dominion troops, and not to be given to British troops?

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: Yes.

General MEWBURN: I think that is a very great mistake. Do you mean that our troops fighting in Flanders besides the Guards will get a different medal from the British troops?

Mr. HUGHES: I think that is an unfortunate distinction.

Mr. MONTAGU: I do not want to bring in any new controversy, but apart from British troops there are the Indian troops.

General MEWBURN: The Canadian troops in 1914 numbered 50,000.

Mr. MONTAGU: But why could not they be the same as the British?

General MEWBURN: They are all British troops.

Mr. MASSEY: I understood all the Dominion troops were to participate in this, and I made it clear a year ago that all the remarks I made applied to the Indian troops as well as to Australia and New Zealand.

MEDALS.

[24 July 1918.]

General MEWBURN: What I would like to see would be an Imperial decoration for all troops fighting under the British flag, which would include India and everywhere else. But I think if Australian, New Zealand, and Canadian troops get a separate decoration from what we know as Imperial troops here, it will create a very nasty feeling.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Why do you not strike one medal for the Imperial and Dominion troops? Our men are perfectly satisfied and greatly honoured by wearing the Imperial medal which goes to the British soldier. That is all that we want. According to this, is Canada going to have the same medal that your troops are going to have?

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: No, not according to the proposal of the grant of an overseas decoration for overseas Forces only.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Why not?

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: The idea was to extend what I may call the Birth of a Nation, to commemorate the coming in of the Dominions to the Great War.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: All that Canada wants is the same medal as the Imperial troops.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: If we go back to the same position we were in last year, does it not put everything right? Everybody would evidently then be satisfied.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: Yes—that is, the decoration as already approved and settled for the Australian and New Zealand troops, under the conditions laid down by them. That is all right, and if that is the desire, as far as the War Office is concerned, we are perfectly happy.

General MEWBURN: Leave that aside, and allow a medal for all the troops which took part in the European war.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: There is a medal already proposed.

General MEWBURN: But it is that there is to be a distinction between the British and the Dominions. One medal with a bar for each year, if you like.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Let it be understood that, as far as our country is concerned, whatever your medal is, that is satisfactory to Canada.

General MEWBURN: Perfectly. I do not think there should be so many distinctions.

Mr. HUGHES: I think if we discuss this till the crack of Doom we shall not get through it. The war will be finished before we come to a decision. I am going to stand on what we have got.

CHAIRMAN: You adhere, Mr. Hughes, to the original proposal?

Mr. HUGHES: Yes.

CHAIRMAN: And you, Mr. Massey?

Mr. MASSEY: Yes.

Mr. LLOYD: As far as Newfoundland is concerned, yes.

CHAIRMAN: That a star and ribbon be issued, as approved by His Majesty, to be issued by those three Dominions, to the Dominion troops who took part in the Gallipoli campaign.

Mr. BURTON: This is where I come in. I do not know that the actual form of the medal is a thing which we need make a fuss about, but what I said before I repeat. If you are going to give a medal for a particular campaign, you must give it for all. If you are going to give a Gallipoli medal, you cannot refuse a medal for other campaigns.

CHAIRMAN: This is a star.

Mr. BURTON: Well, a star. Why give a star for one thing and not another?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: There is not any difference, whether the troops are fighting in Mesopotamia or Gallipoli.

Mr. BURTON: One thing may have more importance than another, but men fight and die as gallantly on one field as on another.

24 July 1918.]

MEDALS.

[15th Day.]

Mr. HUGHES: Very well. Tell us why the men who took part in the Retreat from Mons have got a star, and nobody else has.

Mr. BURTON: You must ask the British Government, not me.

Mr. MASSEY: The original proposal was that the star and ribbon should be issued by the Governments of the countries to which the troops belonged.

Mr. BURTON: Their own star?

Mr. MASSEY: Yes.

Mr. ROWELL: We said the other day that if the Governments of New Zealand and Australia desired to issue a star to their own troops, we did not mind.

Mr. BURTON: Is that correct? That they should be issued by the Dominions themselves?

CHAIRMAN: I am not familiar with these subjects, but it is very important to stick to certain words. The idea is, that this star and ribbon will be issued under the authority of the War Office, but they will be bestowed on the recipients by the Governments of the respective nations.

Mr. ROWELL: That is not the way, if I recollect, in which it was put to us the other day. The statement the other day was, that it was on the basis—

CHAIRMAN: His Majesty's Government have no objection if you prefer to pay for the medal yourself and the ribbon, by all means do so. The idea was that it should be paid for by His Majesty's Government in conjunction with the other decorations issued in the war, and that it should be left to the Governments of Australia, New Zealand, and Newfoundland to select the recipients, and the conditions on which it would be bestowed.

Mr. HUGHES: Yes, that is it.

CHAIRMAN: If you want to pay for it, by all means do.

Mr. MASSEY: There is a very great deal more in it than that. Where do Canada and South Africa come in if it is going to be paid for by the Imperial Government?

Mr. HUGHES: They are not taxpayers of His Majesty's Government here.

Mr. MASSEY: Some portion of the objection came from Canada and Australia last time, and it was to get over that that the suggestion was put forward to do it ourselves.

Mr. HUGHES: I am standing fast by what Mr. Long said. It was what we agreed on in Melbourne. We considered it over and over again there, and we arrived at a conclusion. We accepted the suggestion put forward, and I am standing on it.

Mr. MONTAGU: I should like to stand by the last three paragraphs of the Adjutant-General's Memorandum.

Mr. HUGHES: It is a medal which His Majesty has approved, and His Majesty's Government is going to pay for it, and we are going to determine who is to get it.

CHAIRMAN: Yes, that is it.

Mr. MONTAGU: These three paragraphs seem to meet everything that is required. Under the last paragraph New Zealand, Australia, and Newfoundland can recommend that the recipients of these medals shall have taken part in the Gallipoli campaign. Mr. Burton's Government can recommend that the recipients of this medal shall be those who have taken part in the African campaign, or those who have taken part in any operation. Canada can recommend that it shall be given for any campaign they choose, or none. It will probably, in effect, after what Canada and South Africa have said, be confined to Gallipoli, and I should like this recommendation very much better if India was mentioned.

Mr. BURTON: I am afraid we can go on for ever with this. We shall be sitting next month. Cannot we get on to some simple issue about the matter? Is there any objection to our having the medal or decoration issued to the British Imperial troops given to our own people too? What is there to object to in that?

15th Day.]

MEDALS.

[24 July 1918.]

CHAIRMAN: That is what you will get.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Australia wants, for her Gallipoli troops, a distinctive mark; they want a star because they happened to fight there, instead of on the fields of Flanders.

Mr. BURTON: Have I got it right at last? Is there to be a general decoration throughout for all men who took part in the war?

Sir F. PONSONBY: There will be two medals, one a British medal, the other an International medal, which latter will be given to any man who fought in any theatre of war. In addition to that, this star is wanted for the Gallipoli campaign, additional to the two medals.

Mr. COOK: And, in addition, there is the Mons medal.

CHAIRMAN: We are not discussing the medals which are to be given; we have nothing to do with the medals which are to be given for the campaign as a whole. This discussion is connected solely with the local question how you are to commemorate certain parts of the campaign. Australia and New Zealand claimed last year, for reasons which were given frequently, that the Anzac campaign, the Gallipoli campaign, has become historical, in more ways than one. And then it was suggested that if you commemorate a particular battle, or a particular incident in the great war, you would have to go beyond Gallipoli and take, for instance, the great battle in which the Canadians distinguished themselves and saved the situation on the retirement before Ypres. This discussion is in regard to decorations for particular Dominions.

Mr. BURTON: Then the position is this, if I understand it rightly. There will be these medals, the British and the International medal, for all men who have taken part in this war?

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: Yes.

Sir F. PONSONBY: And there will be clasps on the medals.

Mr. BURTON: And there will be no distinction between British troops here and Imperial troops?

Sir F. PONSONBY: None.

Mr. BURTON: And these are to be additional decorations for the troops, which you will issue and which we will ask shall be given to certain men.

CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. BURTON: Then I am satisfied.

Mr. MASSEY: Is this going all round the Dominions? Our decision will depend on that. If that is going all round the Dominions, we shall ask them to pay for ours as well as for the others.

Mr. HUGHES: No.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Is not the position we are in at the moment a little inconsistent with where we were last year? Last year it was clear, when the matter of a separate medal for New Zealand, and a clasp, cropped up, it was to get over the very difficulty which is now suggested by the inclusion of other parts of the Empire for a special medal or a special distinction. And it was understood here that the two medals referred to—a British and an International medal—were, in addition, to be issued to everybody. And, to meet the aspirations of Australians and New Zealanders who fought in Gallipoli, since known as Anzacs, it was decided that the Governments of those countries were to have the right to a separate clasp or star, indicating that those men had fought in Gallipoli. That was the position. Now we come to suggestions of a different character, and it is that which is giving rise to an extension of the condition which was applied to Australia and New Zealand. Now the suggestion is to make it an all-round one. That is what the last paragraph of this Memorandum does.

CHAIRMAN: Yes.

24 July 1918.]

MEDALS.

[15th Day.]

Sir JOSEPH WARD: If it is intended to be so, we should understand it. As far as Australia and New Zealand were concerned, we settled it, as it affected us, last year, and it was said that a British medal and an International one were to be issued to everybody. And now everybody is to be put in a position of right to have a distinctive medal or clasp or star, marking certain engagements, or certain places where they fought.

Mr. HUGHES: For Gallipoli.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: This proposal is for it to be extended all round, with which I must confess I am in full sympathy.

CHAIRMAN: I thought this Memorandum had been withdrawn. It does not meet with the general wish; therefore it is withdrawn, and we revert to the original position.

Mr. ROWELL: If the original position is what we have understood it to be, and as stated at our last meeting, the Governments of Australia and New Zealand should be entitled to give special medals to their own troops who have served in Gallipoli, a decoration to be approved by His Majesty the King. To that we said "All right." We had not the least objection. It was a matter between these Governments and their own troops, subject to the decoration being approved by His Majesty. And that is how it reads, the official statement, as read by you, Mr. Chairman.* It was that some recognition should be given by Australia and New Zealand to the men who were there in 1914, and who afterwards took part in the operations at Gallipoli, and so on. To that we have no objection. But if the suggestion now is that the Imperial Government should issue a special decoration—

Mr. HUGHES: The British Government.

Mr. ROWELL: — a special decoration for the troops who were in Gallipoli, we should have to take the position which Sir Robert Borden took a year ago, and which Mr. Meighen took up at this Conference,† when he said, "If one campaign is to be distinguished, you must distinguish it for another, carry it down the line, otherwise we shall have to go back to Canada and say, 'We supported a special decoration for soldiers in Gallipoli, but we did not think it worth while to ask for a decoration for the Canadian troops, who saved the road to Calais.'" Mr. Meighen said that would be an absurd, an impossible, and a humiliating position. All we want is, that if Australia and New Zealand wish to give their own particular decoration, there is no objection, but any decorations which are given by the War Office, by the Imperial Government, should be given to all alike, on the same basis. That is our position.

Mr. MASSEY: Nobody objects to that.

General MEWBURN: I understand they are willing to accept it.

Mr. HUGHES: We have arrived at the position now, that a matter with which this Conference has nothing to do is before it.

Mr. MASSEY: I do not know how it came up; I do not understand how it comes up now. I was away when it came up.

Mr. HUGHES: It is one of those things which nobody can understand.

CHAIRMAN: It came up on the decision, on the last discussion, that the matter should be referred to a Committee, presided over by the Adjutant-General, and represented by the different Dominions.

Mr. MASSEY: Last year?

CHAIRMAN: No, the other day.

Mr. MASSEY: How did it come up in the first instance, as far as this Conference is concerned? I did not bring it up, and I did not hear any other Dominion representatives bring it up.

CHAIRMAN: It was raised on the 15th of July. The War Office had some fresh proposals to make, but I do not think there was any Resolution.

MEDALS.

[24 July 1918.]

Mr. BALLANTYNE: May I ask what you mean by a "British medal" and an "International medal"? We understand that there is to be one great medal struck by the British authorities for this war.

Mr. MASSEY: That is understood and agreed upon.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: But it was mentioned that there was to be a British and an International medal. What do you mean by an International medal?

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: It is one which all the Allies will have in common, and each Ally will distribute it according to the conditions laid down by them. The condition it is proposed to lay down for the International medal for British troops will be, that it is only to be issued for officers and men who landed in a theatre of war. The French can say, if they like, it is for all ladies as well who work on the fields.

Mr. HUGHES: They will determine who the recipients shall be.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: The British medal is a medal to be given by the British Government to its own people; and the idea at present is that it will be issued to every officer and man who was commissioned, or who enlisted, whether he went to a theatre of war or not.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: You are talking about the Empire now?

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: It will go to every soldier fighting under the Union Jack.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Supposing, in five years after the war, a review is to be held, the medal which will be on the breast of Canadian soldiers will be identical to that on the British troops here?

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: He may get both the British and the International, or he may get only the British, if he has never been in a theatre of war.

Mr. MASSEY: It will be the same medal for the man who fought as for the man who did not.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL: Yes, you cannot differentiate, but the man who fights gets a clasp, and so you will be able to differentiate in that way.

General MEWBURN: And, in addition, Australia and New Zealand will get their own star.

CHAIRMAN: The question of medals appeared on the agenda in consequence of a telegram I received on the 4th April from the Governor-General of New Zealand; it stated that the second matter which the Prime Minister of New Zealand desired the Conference should discuss was, that there should be a special decoration for all soldiers who took part in the Gallipoli campaign. That was put on the agenda in consequence.

Mr. MASSEY: Up to that time the difficulty had not been settled, that is to say, up to April. After that it was settled and an agreement arrived at between the two Governments.

CHAIRMAN: Had not we better decide to revert to the original position and withdraw this Memorandum?

Mr. LLOYD: I understand the position, as proposed, is that Australia and New Zealand, having arranged the matter, shall issue a medal of their own.

CHAIRMAN: No.

Mr. LLOYD: A decoration of their own then.

CHAIRMAN: No. The particular star and ribbon will be issued under the authority of the British War Office, with the approval of His Majesty the King. Having been issued under the authority of the War Office in Great Britain, it will be at the disposal of the Governments of the three Dominions concerned to bestow as they think fit, according to their own conditions, on their people.

Mr. LLOYD: That is the proposal here; I am not talking of that. That is the proposal from the War Office that we dealt with yesterday.

Mr. HUGHES: That was the arrangement arrived and concluded the day before the Conference met this year. It was arrived at and concluded between the Governments of New Zealand and Australia. That is so, Mr. Long?

MEDALS.

[15th Day.]

CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. HUGHES: On that we stand.

Mr. LLOYD: On what Australia and New Zealand are standing, they will issue a medal, which has already been approved.

Mr. MASSEY: A star?

Mr. LLOYD: A decoration. It is for soldiers who fought in Gallipoli. The point I want to make is this: should the Newfoundland Government wish to issue a similar decoration—we have made no arrangements to do so—I presume we are in precisely the same position as Australia and New Zealand?

CHAIRMAN: The War Office will offer no objection.

Mr. LLOYD: Should Newfoundland wish to issue a decoration to her soldiers who fought in Gallipoli, she can do so.

Mr. MONTAGU: And India may come along, too.

CHAIRMAN: This Memorandum by the Adjutant-General is withdrawn. Now the next subject is the Imperial Court of Appeal.

Control of Raw Materials.

CHAIRMAN: The next thing on the agenda is the Control of Raw Materials, brought up in consequence of Resolutions III. and IV.* This was referred to a Committee of the Conference, and we now have their report before us.† They suggest that, if the Imperial War Conference approves generally of the report, a Resolution might be passed on these lines:—

(1) The Conference having considered the Report of the Committee on Raw Materials, requests His Majesty's Government to communicate this Report forthwith to the Governments of the Dominions and India and to ascertain their views on the appropriate action to be taken.

(2) The Conference further agrees that steps should be taken to ascertain the needs and the resources of the Allies in respect of the raw materials specified in the Report.

(3) The Conference considers that the figures given in the Report as to the raw material requirements of the Empire might with advantage be used by the British Delegates at any forthcoming Inter-Allied Conference, subject to any corrections that may be made necessary by later and fuller information.

The Pacific Question.

Mr. HUGHES: Mr. Long, might I be permitted to suggest that the Pacific Question be taken now, in order that the matter may be disposed of summarily. I propose to move, if the Conference will agree, that the Pacific Question be referred to the War Cabinet. That will dispose of that, and then leave us with nothing but the matter of Raw Materials.

CHAIRMAN: The only question is whether we ought to pass a Resolution of that kind here. It is somewhat in the form of a direction to the War Cabinet. Would not the best plan be for you simply to say you are going to raise it in the War Cabinet and not here? There seems to be some doubt as to the proper procedure. We have no rules of procedure here at all.

Mr. HUGHES: Well, we could say that we request the War Cabinet to consider the matter.

CHAIRMAN: You withdraw it with that view?

Mr. HUGHES: Very well, I withdraw it with a view to raising it at the Imperial War Cabinet.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: And in the hope that it will be considered there.

* See page xii.

† See pp. 223-257.

Mr. HUGHES: That will do very well.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Is there any objection to an expression of opinion from the Conference, that it is vital in the interests of the British Empire that the Pacific Islands be retained by Britain?

CHAIRMAN: There is no objection to that.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I think an expression of that kind from this Conference will be very valuable.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Do you not think it would be better to leave that for the consideration of the Imperial War Cabinet, as that vitally concerns the question of peace?

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Very well; I have no objection to that.

Mr. MASSEY: I should just like to say, referring to that Mr. Long, that I think we ought to remember this matter was before the Imperial War Cabinet last year, and that the Imperial War Cabinet referred the matter to a committee of which Lord Curzon was chairman, and of which I was a member. We arrived at a decision with regard to the Islands of the Pacific, which was accepted by the Imperial War Cabinet, and which stands, up to the present at all events. I am not saying that in any way as objecting to what is proposed now, but simply because Mr. Hughes was not here last time.

Mr. HUGHES: When I was in England in 1916 the matter was raised both in this Office and in the Foreign Office, so far as the attitude of Australia was concerned, and a certain line of policy was suggested.

[Mr. Hughes here made a statement which he requested should not be recorded.]

CHAIRMAN: Very well; then that motion is withdrawn.

[Agreed.]

Control of Raw Materials.

CHAIRMAN: We now come to Raw Materials. I have read the Resolution that has been suggested by the Committee, and it comes to us from Mr. Hewins, who presided over the Committee.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is something here about shipping.

CHAIRMAN: Yes, that is next after this.

Mr. HEWINS: Perhaps I should say that in accordance with the reference from the Conference we considered each material in the list seriatim and directed our minds to finding, as briefly and at the same time as accurately as possible, what the problem was in each case. The reports, which are here put together, are based upon more detailed reports. They were made chiefly by Mr. Long's Ministerial Committee appointed last year to carry out Resolution XXI.* of the last Imperial Conference, and we came, in the Committee, to the unanimous conclusion that we might take the information contained in these reports as a basis of communication with a view to immediate action. I do not know that it is necessary to say more. The Resolution which has been put forward has been considered already at the Committee, and I think everybody was agreed that the action which is now being taken should be taken.

CHAIRMAN: Does any member of the Conference desire to offer any observations before I put the Resolution?

Mr. HUGHES: The only observation I desire to offer is that, with every desire to do myself justice in the way of facility for assimilating information, I am totally unable to offer any other observation than this—that the thing has been well printed, and, so far as I see, without typographical error; and beyond that I am unable to express any opinion whatever. That being so, I shall range myself alongside those who propose to vote for it. There is no good and sufficient reason that I can offer why I should do otherwise.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Mr. Chairman, I am very much in the same position as Mr. Hughes with regard to this. I understand, however, that one of my colleagues, Mr. Rowell, has given personal consideration to it. The Resolution merely provides that the report shall be communicated to the Governments of the Dominions for the purpose of ascertaining their views on the appropriate action to be taken. When it is so communicated we shall be able to give to it that attention which we have not been able to afford up to the present time. Subject to what Mr. Rowell, from his fuller information, may have to say with regard to the matter, I am prepared to support the Resolution.

Mr. ROWELL: I have nothing to add. I was a member of the Committee and helped to frame the report, so I am naturally prepared to approve and support it.

Imperial Mineral Resources Bureau.

Mr. ROWELL: Let me just take this opportunity of mentioning a matter which, while not immediately arising out of this, is in some respects related to it. This deals with the question of raw materials, and deals with the same sphere of activity as the Bureau of Mineral Resources. I am told that that Bureau has never been called together. Our representative has been here two months, and I venture to suggest it should be convened at an early date and something done.

CHAIRMAN: I will convey what you have said to the Minister of Reconstruction.

Control of Raw Materials.

CHAIRMAN: Does any other member desire to offer any observations?

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Mr. Long, I want to take this opportunity of recording my opinion as to the value of the work that has been done, and which is contained in these Reports. I think it is so important that it ought to be recognised—at all events, from my standpoint, I feel that it ought to be recognised. These reports are dealing with close investigation into the utilisation of raw materials and other products for the benefit of the Empire, to be kept within the Empire and controlled by the Empire; and as they cover asbestos, cotton, jute, wool, hides and skins, leather, rubber, oleaginous products, lead, manganese ores, copper, nickel, spelter, zinc and its concentrates, tin and its ores, tungsten ores, mica, gold, molybdenum, and aluminium ores, I want to say that in my opinion, if the detailed work of the officials and the Committee, in addition to what is compressed into these reports, is made available for the use of the Oversea Dominions, nothing can be more valuable in helping to build up the trade of the Empire in the years to come. I was on that Committee, but I had very little to do with the detailed work; and I want to acknowledge the fine work put into it by those responsible for the different branches, and the tremendous amount of detail work which it must have involved before they could have got into a position to concentrate into those reports what they say now. I hope, and feel sure, that when the information is available for the different Oversea Governments it will be utilised and made available for the people interested in these great industries, and they will then have a clear understanding and appreciation of the efforts of the British Government, with the co-operation of the oversea countries, with a view to preventing the diversion of trade to enemy countries in the years following peace.

Just one word more. I do hope that the War Cabinet—and perhaps the Secretary of State for the Colonies might bring the matter up there—will affirm the desirability of not allowing any of the metals or any of these products which are useful to the enemy, after the oversea countries agree to concentrate them for the uses of the people in England—I do hope some resolution will be passed there to prevent the excess quantity of metals in particular going to the enemy for the use of the enemy; because if we are going to use all our powers to have them sent to Great Britain, it would be a great disappointment in the years to come to find that, through a process of filtration here, the enemy was allowed to have his requirements met, and so build up a position of strength for himself to again fight us in the future. I make these observations because, if nobody else brings it up in the War Cabinet, I will.

Imperial Meat Supplies.

Mr. MASSEY: Before you go to the next business there is a matter I want to bring before the Conference. You will recollect, sir, that I mentioned a day or two ago, earlier in the Conference, that with regard to meat supply I should have a statement to make before the Conference came to an end.* That was looking forward to some information from the Food Controller's Department. It was furnished to me yesterday. I want to read the letter I received. It is very short, and it is dated 22nd July 1918, from the Ministry of Food. "Sir, With reference to "Colonial Office letter of 18th July, No. 35163/18, I am directed by the Food "Controller to supply you with the following information:—(1) The quantity of "meat purchased by the Ministry of Food in the United States from 1st January to "30th June is 155,000 tons. (2) The net price per lb. paid for such meat has "ranged from 8½d. to 1s. 0½d. per lb."

Mr. HUGHES: Is that beef, mutton, or what?

Mr. MASSEY: I think mostly beef. "(3) The cost of such meat landed in "England has been from 11d. to 1s. 3d. per lb. approximately. The actual cost to "the Department before the meat reaches the retailer is increased by storage, "internal transport, commissions for distribution and other charges. I am, sir, your "obedient servant, (signed) E. F. Wise, Assistant Secretary." Now, sir, I want to call the attention of the Conference to the effect that this has had. As indicated in the letter, the quantity of meat purchased by the Food Ministry has been 155,000 tons. The cost landed in England approximately is from 11d. to 1s. 3d., or an average landed cost of 1s. 1d. It would be an average landed cost if an equal quantity had been purchased at 11d. to that purchased at 1s. 3d. But I have reason to believe that is not the case—that the greater part of the meat has cost the higher price—and not only that, but a considerable quantity of meat purchased in this way has been condemned on being landed here as unfit for human consumption. I make that statement advisedly.

CHAIRMAN: There is nobody here from the Food Control Department. I did not know this was coming on.

Mr. MASSEY: I am quite ready to have a representative of the Food Controller's Department present, because I would not say a word in the absence of the Department which I am not willing to say in their presence. So if you suggest that a representative of the Food Control Department should be present, I will postpone my remarks until his arrival.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Perhaps we should take other things in the meantime.

The parts in [] were omitted from p. 219 of [Cd. 9177].

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: I can only say it is the decision of the Government to limit it to that period. Now may I take Merton's? I think there is some misunderstanding about Merton's. [Merton's were not wound up because] they did not come within the Trading with the Enemy Act. We had not the power to wind them up. [We tried in various ways to wind up these firms. We were quite alive to the seriousness of the position, but we had not the power.]

Mr. HUGHES: You mean to say under Statute?

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: No.

Mr. HUGHES: But under Parliament you had.

ENEMY BANKS AND BUSINESSES WITH ENEMY ASSOCIATION.

[26 July 1918.]

Sir ALBERT STANLEY: [After trying for some little time to find a way whereby we could deal with it under existing legislation, we made up our minds that the only safe course to take, and one that would avoid litigation with the firm which would possibly result in their re-establishing themselves, was to legislate to take the necessary power, and] under the Non-Ferrous Metal Industry Act of last year we took the power to refuse a licence to engage in the non-ferrous metal trade, to any firm that had any association with the enemy prior to the war, and which in the discretion of the Board of Trade should not receive a licence; and under that Bill these firms, of which there are something like 1,000 in the United Kingdom engaged in this trade, are required to make application to the Board of Trade for a licence to continue their activities. [Among the firms is Merton's and other firms having had German associations. Merton's have made application.] Under the Act they have six months to carry on. That six months lapses on the 5th August of this year, [and before that date transpires the Board of Trade will have given their decision as to whether Merton's are to continue to operate in this country or not.] For the purpose of ascertaining the facts in connection with [Merton's operations and] the operations of [other] firms making application, we set up a Committee, and that Committee goes into all the circumstances and reports to the Board of Trade, and it lies with the Board of Trade as to whether a licence shall be given or not, [and, as I said before, when the 5th August comes round a decision with respect to Merton's will have been given.]

Imperial Meat Supplies.

CHAIRMAN: Mr. Clynes is, unfortunately, unable to come because he is attending a Conference of Food Controllers held in London to-day, and cannot get away. Mr. Wise, one of the officials of the Department, has come to represent him.

Mr. MASSEY: I am sorry Mr. Clynes has not been able to come because this is a very serious matter from our point of view, and I think it is a very important matter from his point of view. I go the length of saying it is a serious matter from the point of view of the consumers of this country. I think I had better commence again so as to make sure that the report will be consecutive. I am now going to quote a letter forwarded to me by the Ministry of Food, and dated the 22nd July—“With reference to Colonial Office letter of 18th July, I am directed by the Food Controller to supply you with the following information:—(1) The quantity of meat purchased by the Ministry of Food in the United States from 1st January to 30th June is 155,000 tons. (2) The net price per lb. paid for such meat has ranged from 8½d. to 1s. 0½d. per lb. (3) The cost of such meat landed in England has been from 11d. to 1s. 3d. per lb. approximately. The actual cost to the Department before the meat reaches the retailer is increased by storage, internal transport, commissions for distribution and other charges. I am, Sir, your obedient servant, E. F. Wise, Assistant Secretary.” I will call the attention of members of the Conference to the last paragraph: “The actual cost to the Department before the meat reaches the retailer is increased by storage, internal transport, commissions for distribution and other charges.” I am not supplied with the price which it costs the consumer. It would be very interesting to know. However, I go back now to read the quantity. “The quantity of meat purchased by the Ministry of Food in the United States from 1st January to 30th June is 155,000 tons.”

The cost of meat landed in England is 11d. to 1s. 3d. Now, supposing equal quantities of meat were paid for at 11d. and 1s. 3d., then the average landing cost would be 1s. 1d. per lb. I do not say that is the average. I believe the average to be considerably higher, because, as far as I can ascertain, a very much larger quantity was purchased at the higher than at the lower price. Now, the average landed cost of New Zealand meat is 8½d. or 9d. Both statements have been made to me—it may be something between 8½d. and 9d., but I am mentioning both for the purpose of argument. And this will apply to Australia as well as New Zealand, because the prices are similar—not exactly alike in both countries, but very nearly.

Mr. HUGHES: You might put the question here, and see if you can get the information, how much is mutton and how much beef?

26 July 1918.]

IMPERIAL MEAT SUPPLIES.

[16th Day. 293]

Mr. MASSEY: This is mostly beef—United States beef. The difference in favour of New Zealand, therefore—that is comparing the landed cost of New Zealand meat with the landed cost of this meat from the United States—is 4d. to 4½d. per lb. And here and now, to make this point. The representative of the Food Ministry will correct me if I am not right. I am informed that a very considerable proportion of this meat was found to be of such inferior quality that it was condemned on being landed here as unfit for human consumption. I am told that there were tickets on the meat—and this came to me from people connected with the meat trade—showing that some of it had been in store in the United States for over two years. I put forward the statement so that the representative of the Food Ministry may correct me if I am wrong. Very well. Now supposing my figures are approximately correct, the difference in favour of New Zealand or Australian meat, as the case may be, would be 4d. to 4½d. per lb. Take 155,000 tons at 4d. per lb., and the increased cost is 5,786,666l.

Mr. HUGHES: That is before it gets to the consumer?

Mr. MASSEY: Oh, yes; that is the difference in the cost of 155,000 tons as between the United States and New Zealand or Australia. Or if the difference is 4½d., the increased cost would be 6,510,000l. It seems to me, Mr. Long, those figures are sufficiently startling.

Now I come back to the New Zealand position, because that is where I really come in, and I am very glad to have the opportunity, before the Conference comes to an end, of putting this on record, and letting the members of the Conference understand the actual position. And I hope it will be looked into by members of His Majesty's Government. Now here is a copy of a telegram I received from Wellington not many days ago from the Acting Prime Minister in New Zealand. He says: “For your information following is summary of position regarding produce awaiting shipment at June 30th—the end of last month—“Frozen meat, 5,230,000 freight carcasses; butter, 123,097 boxes; cheese, 331,997 crates; wool, 424,573 bales; hides, 1,600 tons; frozen rabbits, 76,000 crates.” Now that is the position to-day, and by way of showing how serious it is to us, just let me quote the annual estimated output. The annual estimated output for New Zealand is: frozen meat, 6,000,000 freight carcasses; cheese, 756,000 crates; butter, 880,000 boxes; wool, 558,000 bales. So that in the case of several of these articles of produce we have almost a year's produce in store to-day in New Zealand. That is our position.

Now, sir, since the commencement of the war the Imperial Government—using the common term—has purchased the whole of our meat for the period of the war and for three months afterwards. It is now purchasing our butter and cheese for the present season, and we have been given to understand that in all probability the butter and cheese will be purchased for the period of the war. On that point I am not able to express a definite opinion. The wool is being purchased for the period of the war, and, I think, for one season afterwards. That is not definitely settled yet—the other points are all settled. Now that is our position. It has been purchased by the Imperial Government on the understanding that it will be taken away from New Zealand. The Imperial Government now controls the shipping, and mind, just let me admit this, that the war comes first every time. If it is necessary for the purposes of the war that our ships should be taken to carry troops from the United States, there is nothing more to be said. But the men experienced in the meat trade have told me that it was not necessary to purchase this huge quantity of meat from the United States, and that there was sufficient in sight in the United Kingdom itself, and that the ships could have been provided for the purpose of carrying the balance of the meat necessary from Australia and New Zealand. I make that statement not on my own authority, but as a statement made to me by people who say they know. I make it for the purpose of having it corrected, if necessary, by the representative of the Food Controller's Department.

Now, sir, it will be easily seen what a very serious position we are getting into in New Zealand. This is the winter season, and it is fortunate in this respect that it is the winter season; and according to the cable news reaching us within the last few days that country is experiencing the severest winter on record. But the winter will presently come to an end. We look upon the middle of August as the beginning of spring. With spring there will come the usual supply of meat and dairy produce, and of all the other things which spring brings along. What is going to happen to New Zealand then, with its stores full, and dependent as we are upon our output of produce for the money required to carry on our share of the war and the business of the country—to keep the country going, as a matter of fact? I want you to understand, and I want members of the Conference to understand, that we are face to face with the most serious difficulty New Zealand has ever experienced up to the present moment. And what I say about New Zealand applies almost equally to Australia.

Mr. HUGHES: It applies, I think, to an even greater extent to Australia. Do not forget that we have 6,000,000 tons of wheat besides all those things which you have.

Mr. MASSEY: Mr. Hughes, of course, can deal with that point. I want to emphasise the very serious position we are in. I have endeavoured to get satisfaction from the different departments of the State, but up to the present I have got no satisfaction—absolutely none. I cannot blame, perhaps, the Ministry of Shipping for the answers which I receive. I know the Ministry of Shipping have done everything they possibly could to supply ships to get our produce away last year, and I hope something of the same sort will be done during this season. But the outlook is very much worse this time, from a shipping point of view, than it was at the corresponding period of last year. Now there is the position, and I have to explain it when I go back to my own country. And if the representative of the Food Ministry has anything to say or any explanation to offer I shall be very glad indeed to repeat his explanation in my own Parliament, and to put it alongside anything which I may have to say. I want to be perfectly straightforward in the matter, and not to do anything which is not right. But again I say in the opinion of many people New Zealand is not being treated fairly in connection with this matter, and I think—and I say it advisedly—more should be done to get our produce away. The whole of our output has been purchased by the Imperial Government and it is impossible to do anything with it in any other direction.

I do not want to take up the time of the Conference, but I have a table here which I can put on record. This is a schedule of prices paid by the Imperial Government to meat producers for meat during the war period, and it ranges from second-class meat at 4½d. free on board New Zealand to 6½d. for prime Canterbury lamb of 42 lb. and under, also free on board New Zealand—as near as possible half the price paid to the United States for the inferior—and I use the word advisedly—meat sent from that country to Great Britain during the last six months. I do not know that it is necessary for me to take up the time of the Conference further. I have stated my case. I have simply given the particulars. I do not propose to move any Resolution, though I am quite willing to do it, Mr. Long. I know this question does not interest or affect quite a number of the countries represented at this meeting of the Conference—I know that perfectly well, and it would be perhaps unfair to ask them to express an opinion; but I express this opinion on behalf of New Zealand, and I do it publicly so that the representatives of the British Government may understand the position.

Mr. HUGHES: Before the representative of the Food Controller's Department replies—

Mr. MASSEY: Is it understood that I hand this table in, Mr. Long?

CHAIRMAN: Yes, please.

Mr. HUGHES: I am not going to set out Australia's position at length except to say that all that Mr. Massey has said of New Zealand is true of Australia, but the position is aggravated by circumstances that do not apply to New Zealand. We have, as I say, millions of tons of wheat, which we cannot ship, and I think our shipping position, considering our population in relation to that of New Zealand, is infinitely worse. I just want to say shortly this. It has come as a shock to me—an absolute shock—to learn that at the back of all these answers that I have received—that our Government has received—in reference to these matters, there is this fact—that the British Government have been buying meat from the United States of America, and paying those prices which Mr. Massey has mentioned, when there is the meat of Australia and of New Zealand—meat belonging to the countries which have poured forth their young men so lavishly in this war—left high and dry. I do not know how they are going to explain it to the British taxpayer, but I think they ought to have an opportunity of doing so. Further, I want to say this, that I think it is for the Food Controller's Department to reconcile that policy, if the facts be, of course, as Mr. Massey has said—if not, there is an end of it—to reconcile that policy with this talk about Empire. I put it very shortly, but I could not put it better if I spoke for a year.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Mr. Long, I want to endorse what Mr. Massey and Mr. Hughes have said with regard to the position in our countries, and to say how vital it is to us that that position should be changed, and without any loss of time. Now in New Zealand we have to raise 30,000,000l. sterling this year for the purpose of carrying on the war. If we are going to have our next season's products jammed up in the way in which the present season's products are being held up in that country owing to the inability of getting ships to take it away, then it is quite clear that we must come to this country and ask them to give us 30,000,000l. instead of our providing it. Now we do not want to do that. We have worked in the direction for some time in providing the money necessary to carry on our share of the war, and we are doing it, and very willingly; but if we are going to be in the position, because we happen to be 14,000 miles from the heart of the Empire, of having our ships—our refrigerated ships I refer to particularly—diverted for the purpose of carrying meat from another country, when it is understood that the quantity of meat under the rationing system available here is more than ample for the requirements of this country—then I say if we are going to allow that to continue and, with your eyes wide open, are going to allow a position of that kind to go on, it simply means not only an unsatisfactory position, but a very very difficult position created in a portion of the British Empire which has, as Mr. Hughes has said, freely given of its men, its money, and its assistance in every way in its power. Last month we had only one refrigerator steamer for the whole of New Zealand—only one steamer. It does not require any man to make representations to the British Government for them to realise that if that part of the Empire is to be kept in the position practically of half strangulation during the time of war by only one refrigerator steamer being available there in one month, what in the name of goodness is the use of our keeping on fighting to dispel the fear of strangulation in the Empire as a whole? We want to be reasonable, and we are prepared to make any sacrifices that the exigencies of the man-power situation require, but to-day we are being strangled to death. That is the position.

CHAIRMAN: The Food Controller cannot deal with the shipping question. I thought this motion dealt with the difficulties arising out of the Food Controller's treatment of imported meat, but, of course, the shipping question is different. The Food Ministry is not responsible for that and cannot answer questions about shipping.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: No, Mr. Long.

CHAIRMAN: The best way really, I think, would be for you to see the Shipping Controller yourselves.

Mr. MASSEY: We have seen the Shipping Controller over and over again. But the difficulty is, that if it had not been for the purchase of this meat in the United States, ships could have gone down to New Zealand and Australia.

Mr. BURTON: What has all this to do with the Conference? No doubt this meat question is a very important one from the New Zealand point of view and from other points of view; but if we are going to discuss detailed questions of that sort, of business between individual Dominions and the British Government here, we shall be sitting here for months. I have half a dozen points of that sort with Sir Thomas Robinson, about meat and wool in South Africa, and there is a strong controversy going on about some of them now. But we must decide these things between ourselves and the British Government; they cannot be dealt with by this Conference. I have every sympathy with Mr. Massey, but I suggest if he cannot thresh these matters out with the British Government, we cannot help him.

CHAIRMAN: I apologise for having interrupted Sir Joseph Ward. I did so only because the representatives of the Shipping Ministry were not here.

Mr. HUGHES: I think this has an Imperial aspect.

Mr. MASSEY: I have only one sentence to say. This is the only opportunity I have of ventilating the question.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I want to say, Mr. Long, that this matter of shipping has been discussed both by Mr. Massey and Mr. Hughes. If you rule that I am not—

CHAIRMAN: Oh, I am not ruling; I am only saying that there is nobody here to answer for shipping except Mr. Roper, who, I understand, is prepared to deal with certain aspects of it.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I am sorry for that, but I want to say that if this position goes on as at present we are going to be in financial difficulties, and if some members of the Conference do not consider it necessary for us to refer to matters that concern us so vitally, I am sorry. All I can say is that if their portions of the Empire were in any difficulties, I think they would find a very ready response from New Zealand, and an effort made to assist them in extricating themselves from those difficulties. Certainly, we should not try to stop them attempting to do so. Now, I want to say that, apart from the difficult position which the shipping has created, I was intensely surprised the other day when it was placed on record in this Conference that for the purpose of paying a higher price for meat from America, a profit of 3d. per lb. on our New Zealand mutton was being obtained by the Ministry of Food, and that that 3d. per pound was used for the purpose of equalising the higher cost of the meat that came from America.

26 July 1918.]

IMPERIAL MEAT SUPPLIES.

[16th Day.]

Mr. ROPER: The profit was not obtained by the Board of Trade. There was no profit on what the Board of Trade sold.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: I have not said that. I have said the Board of Trade sold at cost to the Ministry of Food and they put the 3d. per pound on to the price when they sold to the public and that profit on the New Zealand meat was made by the Food Department for the purpose of equalising the higher cost of the American meat, and so by a pooling system saved the loss, to that extent, of the higher price paid to America. I want to say that that is straining the loyalty of the settlers in New Zealand, who are producing this meat, to an extent which is, in my opinion, unjustifiable; and I do not know how it is to be answered to our producers. We entered into a contract on behalf of the sheep growers for the supply of mutton and lamb to this country at a price admittedly reasonable—it is about 6d. per pound f.o.b. New Zealand—and the growers have been doing that quite willingly from the very beginning of the war; and at this Conference we find ourselves in the position that when the Food Department obtains their meat, they put 3d. on to the price charged to the consumers in England, and use that for the purpose of paying a higher price for meat obtained from elsewhere. Now, surely, if the exigencies of the situation here require the obtaining of meat from another country, and if a higher price is required to be paid there—surely that ought to be paid upon its merits, and if there is 3d. a pound put upon meat to the consumers in England, who, after all, are the people concerned, our growers in New Zealand are entitled to such extra prices as the Food Department here obtain. Surely that is reasonable. I cannot stand up in the House of Representatives, or upon platforms in New Zealand, and tell the sheep growers that we are content with the system established here, under which the British Food Department go in for a pooling system, and the 3d. a pound extra beyond what the Board of Trade pays for meat from New Zealand is used for paying a higher price for meat from America.

All I can say, Mr. Long, is that I want the assistance of this Conference in impressing upon the authorities here the great importance—as a matter of fact the vital necessity—of our having some ships to relieve the situation in New Zealand at present, and to help us in the future to carry on. I go so far as to say—and I say it advisedly—that if the British Government could give authority to the United States to build refrigerated steamers so as to relieve the situation, that ought to be done. If our meat is to be held until the war is over, so that our refrigerating steamers may be used for the purpose of transporting troops from America, it will half ruin our country. We have enough troubles of our own, which we accept willingly—increased cost of living, increased taxation, and so on. We do not ask you to help us in that respect—we will bear our own responsibilities—but there it is—we are the most distanced country in the Southern Seas and we are dependent upon refrigerated steamers, and our refrigerated steamers are nearly all diverted for other purposes, and we have only one steamer available in one month, whereas we require a minimum number of at least twelve. How do you expect that country to live? Why, the thing is almost unbearable.

CHAIRMAN: Does any other member wish to say anything?

Mr. ROPER: The greater portion of what has been said by Mr. Massey and Sir Joseph Ward has relation to the different prices paid for meat purchased from Australasia and from America, with which the Board of Trade is not concerned, because it is not concerned with the purchase of meat in North America. As regards the meat we buy from Australasia, the facts are more or less as described, but I understand that only yesterday there was a discussion in which the Ministry of Shipping, the Board of Trade, the War Office and other Departments concerned took part—I think the Ministry of Food too. The Ministry of Shipping said it was feasible to send more ships to Australasia to fetch this meat away. That was one of the points raised. How many, or when they will go, I do not know yet—I do not know the details—but we have that promise from the Ministry of Shipping. Another point, I think raised by Sir Joseph Ward, was that owing to the fact that the meat purchased in Australasia is purchased at an f.o.b. price, a considerable sum of money was locked up in this meat in New Zealand.

Sir JOSEPH WARD: Oh no, not at present—it has been paid for this year. I said that next year we could not store the new season's output in our stores because they are already full and are not being relieved. That was the point I was making.

Mr. ROPER: What I was going to say on that point was that the Board of Trade has been in communication with the Treasury, and the Treasury are willing to modify the terms of purchase to this extent—that they will pay three months after this meat is placed in store 75 per cent. of the cost price.

Mr. MASSEY: That does not help us out of the difficulty.

Mr. HUGHES: No.

Mr. ROPER: This has now been authorized as a continuing arrangement. The Board of Trade was only informed of it by the Treasury this morning.

Mr. MASSEY: That has been in operation for some months. The point is this—perhaps I should have elaborated it a little more than I did—that our stores are full. That is the trouble.

Mr. ROPER: I know that point, of course.

Mr. MASSEY: We cannot erect additional storage accommodation, and we have 7,000,000 animals fattened or being fattened ready to come in during next season, which will open, say, on the 1st of September. There is the trouble. The whole of the business of the country is going to be stuck up.

Mr. ROPER: That is purely a question of tonnage. So far as the Board of Trade are concerned, we shall be only too glad to fetch it away, and that has always been our position. But more urgent need diverted the tonnage to the North Atlantic. The Shipping Controller is going to relieve that to some extent.

CHAIRMAN: There is some hope of getting that position relieved?

Mr. ROPER: Yes. As regards the question of the difference in price, perhaps I might explain that the Board of Trade, so far as they are concerned, are buying mainly for the armies, and they charge to the armies the price which they pay to New Zealand, plus the cost of bringing it over and other charges. But there is no profit so far as we are concerned as regards the supplies to the armies.

Mr. HUGHES: Do you buy from North America?

Mr. ROPER: No, that is done by the Food Controller.

Mr. HUGHES: You do not buy from North America?

Mr. ROPER: No. Before the Food Controller took it over, we bought negligible quantities.

Mr. HUGHES: Do you buy from the Argentine?

Mr. ROPER: Yes.

Mr. HUGHES: At what price?

Mr. ROPER: Roughly, the same as from Australasia.

Mr. HUGHES: Can you give us the precise figures?

Mr. ROPER: There are several prices, according to the quality of the meat. There are perhaps half a dozen prices. I have not got them in my head, but, roughly, I think Mr. Massey and Sir Joseph Ward will agree they are about the same.

Mr. MASSEY: Yes. As a matter of fact, I believe Australia and New Zealand, so far as prices are concerned, are a little ahead of the Argentine. But the Argentine beats us in this way: it has an understanding from the British Government that if they are able to supply more meat than is stated in the contract they can place that meat on the open market. That gives them a tremendous advantage.

Sir THOMAS ROBINSON: The price at which the meat is now being sold is under the control of the Food Ministry, so they are no longer in the enjoyment of a free market.

Mr. MASSEY: Not in the ordinary sense of the word, but still it enables them to obtain a very much higher price for part of their meat than we obtain.

Mr. HUGHES: Of course the real thing is not how it affects one department or another; the real thing is that we are up against a position which cannot be endured. It cannot continue—it simply cannot continue—unless you propose to ruin the great herds of Australia and New Zealand. You cannot do that.

Mr. MASSEY: It means ruining those countries.

Mr. HUGHES: I want to point out this. Of course this country is absolutely dependent upon Australasian wool. If you buy meat in America, and give twice as much for it as you do for ours, how can you expect us to sell you our wool? Answer that question.

Mr. WISE: The difficulty is that I cannot answer for the Ministry of Shipping. Our purchases are determined absolutely by the state of tonnage, and the countries to which the Ministry of Shipping is prepared to send ships. We would much prefer to buy in Australia and New Zealand. It is cheaper, the quality is better, and there are other obvious reasons which make it better for us to buy in the Colonies rather than in neutral countries. But from our point of view the vital thing is that we should get enough meat to supply the needs of the armies, and to supply the comparatively low civilian ration. We go to the Minister of Shipping and ask him to provide the ships. We tell him where we can get meat from, and, as I say, we prefer to get it from Australasia for a good many reasons. The Minister of Shipping has to balance up the available tonnage as against the requirements—the available refrigerated tonnage which can carry meat—and he has to consider to what other purposes that tonnage must be put, and decide to which countries he shall send ships. That is very roughly the position. We prefer to buy from Australasia. The Minister of Shipping points out that we can get four cargoes from North America in the time that we can get one from Australasia. Furthermore, it has been necessary, as you are no doubt aware, to divert all the shipping possible into the North Atlantic to bring troops over. At the beginning of this year—in the early months of 1918, just before that diversion of tonnage took place—I want to impress upon the Conference that we were, in respect of meat supplies, in a most critical and most dangerous position. It is true that during the last few weeks the imports of frozen meat into this country have been on the high side.

Mr. MASSEY: During the last few weeks?

Mr. WISE: I mean during the last few months. The big imports from North America started, I think, about April.

Mr. HUGHES: How much a month?

Mr. WISE: 165,000 tons, I think, in six months.

Mr. HUGHES: How much were they the previous six months?

Mr. MASSEY: None.

Mr. WISE: Practically nothing at all.

Sir T. ROBINSON: 10,000 tons a month.

Mr. WISE: I want to point out that despite the fact that we have these heavy shipments from America, and we can carry four times the number of cargoes that we can carry from Australasia—despite that, during 1918 the civilian consumption of meat per month in this country has never exceeded 60 per cent. of the average consumption.

Mr. MASSEY: That is the rationing.

Mr. WISE: Well, I will explain my point. It has never exceeded 60 per cent. of the average consumption. At the present time it is nearer 50 per cent. than 60 per cent.—about 54 or 55 per cent. Despite that, at the present moment the British Army has a reserve of 14,000 tons in this country, a lower reserve than there has been for a considerable time. The Italians are pressing for twice the quantity of meat that they have been having, and the French also are asking for increased quantities. And in addition I may perhaps add that we are about to slightly reduce the ration, though our own cattle will soon be coming in off the pastures in very large numbers; and it is perfectly clear that after Christmas we shall have to reduce the ration again to the comparatively low figure in force at the beginning of this year.

Mr. HUGHES: How much?

Mr. WISE: 15 ounces per head per week.

Mr. HUGHES: Oh, you mean the ration. I thought you were talking about price.

Mr. WISE: No, the ration. Consequently if ships are diverted from the North Atlantic to Australasia it means that the ration must go down to a figure somewhere in the neighbourhood of half or three-quarters of a pound at most, per head per week.

Mr. MASSEY: Is it not a fact that there is more meat in sight in the United Kingdom than at any time since the war started?

Mr. WISE: The present position is easier than it has been, but you must not measure the quantity of meat in sight by mere tonnage; you must set against it the requirements of France and the other Allies, and of course the enormously increased demand due to the fact that now the Americans have a very large number of men in France, and that by the beginning of next year they will have a still larger number of men. All these men have got to be fed through the refrigerated tonnage that previously has been available for this country. We cannot feed them—they cannot be fed—without considerable supplies from North America. That I think is the tonnage situation.

Mr. MASSEY: Are you aware that the Americans were willing to purchase meat in New Zealand, and send it over to you?

Mr. WISE: I was not aware that that was the case. If that is so, perhaps you will tell the Shipping Controller that, and no doubt he will be able to deal with the point. But that is, if I may say so, purely a shipping question. We are prepared to buy every ton of meat from New Zealand and Australia—every ton of meat that the Shipping Controller is willing to carry. But we cannot compel him to send ships, and we cannot require him to send ships to New Zealand and Australia, if it means that we shall have to reduce the ration considerably in this country, and if it means that we cannot carry the troops and stores required for the armies in France from North America.

Mr. HUGHES: What about the price? Why do you pay that price?

Mr. WISE: Well, perhaps I may now deal with the question of price. The position with regard to price in America is this. Mr. Hoover, the American Food Controller, in effect purchases all supplies of meat needed, or rather fixes the price of meat to be supplied to the American armies, to the American civilian population and to the Allied Purchasing Commission. We take—that is to say, all the Allies take—not more than about 10 per cent. of the total production of meat by the American canned firms. The price we pay for it is the price fixed by Mr. Hoover, and it is the price paid by the American army.

Mr. MASSEY: From whom is it purchased?

Mr. WISE: From the meat firms. The price is fixed.

Mr. MASSEY: Are these the people generally spoken of as the Meat Trust?

Mr. WISE: The Meat Trust and other firms. I think the Meat Trust provides the greater part. But what else can we do? We cannot pay less than the American army is paying, or we could not get the meat. We cannot pay less than the American public is paying, or we could not get the meat. We are entirely in the hands of Mr. Hoover and the American Government. They decide from whom the meat shall come, and they determine the price. You cannot govern the price. You cannot govern the price of a commodity when you are purchasing 10 per cent., and 90 per cent. is sold in another market. We cannot offer to pay less than the price at which the Americans are willing to sell to us. Mr. Hoover is doing his utmost to reduce the price which the Meat Trust firms are ready to charge, but he is bound by the necessity of stimulating the production of cattle in America—stimulating the export of meat. You must bear in mind that America has previously, until the last few years, been hardly at all an exporting country, and we have only been able to get these quantities of meat—which even so has only enabled us to provide a war ration of a little more than half the 1916 consumption—by the exercise of the most rigid economy on the other side. We are bound to pay the price in the American market—we cannot get it at less.

Then the question raised is as to whether we ought not to sell the American meat at one price and the imported Colonial meat at another price. I do not know whether you suggest that, Mr. Massey?

Mr. MASSEY: No. It is not a matter of price at all. So far as we are concerned we are not complaining of the price. We are complaining of the unfair position in which we are placed. You have actually taken our own ships and are using them for carrying meat from the United States of America to Britain and leaving our meat in the stores, and making it impossible for us to carry on the trade of the country.

Mr. WISE: Well, that is purely a shipping question. I can only answer that by saying that we prefer to buy it from Australasia if the Ministry of Shipping can carry the quantity of supplies we need for ourselves and for the Allied armies. That is a point, I suggest, which must be discussed with the Minister of Shipping. If you can persuade the Minister of Shipping that it is desirable to divert ships from the North Atlantic to Australasia, I can only say that we shall be only too glad to have your meat; but I am not sure that, to the full extent you want, that is possible—subject, of course, to our getting the quantity of supplies necessary to provide the armies and the civilian population.

Mr. MASSEY: You do not supply the army.

Mr. WISE: We do as a matter of fact.

Mr. MASSEY: We have just heard that it is the Board of Trade.

Mr. ROPER: To the extent that we are short of your meat we have to go to the Shipping Controller to get some of the meat purchased by the Ministry of Food.

Mr. MASSEY: Do you expect the soldiers to eat the meat exported from the United States?

Mr. WISE: They are eating a good deal.

Mr. MASSEY: How much of it has been condemned?

Mr. WISE: Rather under half of 1 per cent.

Mr. MASSEY: Are you prepared to supply the figures?

Mr. WISE: I do not think I can give you the figures. That is the best figure I can give you. That is the figure of Smithfield Market.

Mr. HUGHES: What is the figure of Smithfield Market?

Mr. WISE: Half of 1 per cent.

Mr. HUGHES: What is this meat retailed at?

Mr. WISE: Probably 1s. 4d. or 1s. 5d. a pound. Well, either we sell the comparatively small quantity of civilian meat imported from Australasia at one figure, home-produced meat at another figure, and South American meat at another figure, and North American meat at another figure, which I suggest would break down in two weeks, and render the carrying on of the scheme of rationing on price utterly impossible, or else we are bound to do with meat what we have had to do with all other commodities—to more or less pool all the prices, and sell all qualities of meat, the same cuts of meat, at the same price wherever they come from; and that is what we have had to do with regard to this imported food.

Mr. HUGHES: I think you are right; but I want you to consider something else which will break down if you are not careful. You have said that you are paying this money to the Meat Trust, and you have explained why, and I think the explanation is quite sound. But do not think for one moment that it will be satisfactory to the producer in New Zealand or Australia. What he says is this: That you are selling his meat and putting a price on it in order to sell at a uniform price. That is very good. But I think you must remember that New Zealand and Australian meat is selling in the market at 1s. 5d. or 1s. 4d. a pound and the producers are getting only 6½d. Is that right?

Mr. MASSEY: Our prices run from 4½d. for second-class beef to 6½d. for best class lamb.

Mr. WISE: I do not think that is the price to the consumer. I am talking of chops and steaks and so on.

Mr. HUGHES: The highest price presumably, according to Mr. Massey, is 1s. 2d.

Mr. WISE: Yes.

Mr. HUGHES: Then the difference is between 4½d. and 1s. 2d., and this is done by some levelling up or levelling down process in which the New Zealander or Australian does not share. If you were to say: "We are selling your meat, and we are paying you less than the price we pay to the Beef Trust; we have to sell it all at a uniform price; there is your share." If you said that, that would be a different thing.

Mr. MASSEY: Who pays for the condemned meat?

Mr. WISE: It comes out of the food price, but it is very small—half of 1 per cent.

Mr. MASSEY: It is all very well to tell us that it is half of 1 per cent., but it is not less than 775 tons. That is half of 1 per cent. The total quantity of meat imported is 155,000 tons. 1 per cent. of that is 1,550 tons, and half of that is 775 tons. There are 775 tons of meat which have been condemned as unfit for human consumption, according to your own statement.

Mr. WISE: Quite right; but the quantity, I suggest, in proportion to the total quantity, and considering the state of affairs on the other side of the Atlantic and in this country in regard to transport, is not higher than it could be reasonably expected to be. A great deal of that meat has been condemned owing to the fact that it had to be put on ships on the other side in a semi-soft condition, and it has gone wrong on arrival on this side owing to having been delayed on the railways. That figure I gave you—half of 1 per cent.—for meat condemned in London, is probably an exaggerated figure, because pretty well all the North American meat coming into London has had to bear the additional strain of a railway journey right across England. The great bulk of the North American meat is consumed in Lancashire, and probably the rate of condemnation, though I have no figures on the point, is appreciably less than in London. But that I think is the position. I think I might perhaps correct some of the figures given. The comparison is not between 4½d. and 1s. 2d.; the comparison is really between approximately 1s. 1d. and 1s. 5d.

Mr. HUGHES: No.

Mr. MASSEY: Oh, no.

Mr. HUGHES: The difference is between the price we receive and the price the Meat Trust gets. We receive 4½d., and the difference between that and what they get is 8½d. That is the gulf which you have to bridge.

Mr. WISE: The price we pay the Board of Trade for the Australasian meat landed here is, I think, very nearly 10d.

Mr. MASSEY: Is that what you pay?

Mr. WISE: What we pay the Board of Trade.

Mr. MASSEY: That is for Australian and New Zealand meat?

Mr. WISE: Yes.

Mr. HUGHES: If you take the price you pay in America for meat, and the price you pay in Australia and New Zealand for the same class of meat, the difference is 8½d.

Mr. WISE: Quite so. I quite follow.

Mr. COOK: Would it not be better if you could get Australian meat for consumption in America, and American meat here?

Mr. WISE: That is purely a question of tonnage.

Mr. MASSEY: We have got all the information it is possible to get, so far as I can see, Mr. Long, and it does not make the position a bit better from our point of view. That is the trouble. The Food Controller's Department and the Board of Trade say it is not their fault—that they cannot get the ships to bring the meat from Australia and New Zealand. Unfortunately for us the sting of the whole thing is this—and this is Mr. Clynes's statement to this Conference*—that 3d. a pound made on the New Zealand meat is utilised for the purpose of paying for more expensive meat from the United States. There is no possibility of explaining that or getting away from it. I do trust the Departments represented here to-day will represent to the Shipping Ministry the necessity of getting ships at the earliest possible date to relieve the very, very serious difficulties in which we find ourselves in New Zealand and Australia. What has happened has caused a very unsatisfactory feeling. I do not know what our producers are going to say when we explain the position to them, because we must make an explanation to them. I do not know what the House of Commons will say when they get particulars from the other side of the world. However, there it is, from our point of view.

* See p. 85.

CHAIRMAN: Your views will be conveyed, of course, both to the Ministry of Food and to the Ministry of Shipping.

Mr. MASSEY: Yes.

Mr. HUGHES: I hope the Food Controller will see his way to make some arrangement whereby the New Zealander and Australian will share in this increased price paid to America—paid by the consumer in England.

Mr. COOK: May I ask this question. Supposing we had the task of feeding our own Army in this war, would they be able to send the ships to Australia for the purpose of getting the meat—or is it the necessities of the Allies?

Mr. WISE: Oh, yes, that is what very largely determines the situation. Apart altogether from the transport of troops the total quantity of imported meat required for the Allied Armies is approximately 970,000 tons per annum. The total imported meat required for the British civilians is approximately 200,000 tons per annum. That is on a comparatively low ration. So that the needs of the Allied Armies, coupled with the shortage of refrigerated tonnage, and the shortage of ships for bringing troops and stores across the Atlantic, really determine the situation. It is purely a question of shipping, really.

CHAIRMAN: Mr. Boys wishes to make a statement to the Conference.

Mr. BOYS: It is only with reference to Mr. Massey's statement that 3d. a pound profit on the Australasian meat is used to equalise the loss on the American.

Mr. MASSEY: That is not my statement—that is Mr. Clynes's statement. It is a quotation.

Mr. BOYS: I quite understand that. I was here at the time. The profit on the New Zealand meat, though 3d. a pound, and the loss on American meat, though also approximately 3d. or 4d. a pound, by no means equalise one another. The quantity of meat we handle from New Zealand will bring us a profit during the last six months of perhaps 400,000l. The loss on American meat and Canadian meat, taking them at the same ratio of loss I have stated, will run into rather more millions—three or four or five millions—probably nearer 5,000,000l.

Mr. HUGHES: On 155,000 tons?

Mr. BOYS: Yes, plus 29,000 tons of Canadian meat.

Mr. HUGHES: Are you talking about Australian supplies, or New Zealand?

Mr. BOYS: I am talking about all we have released to us by the Board of Trade, which has been practically only New Zealand so far.

Mr. ROPER: What we release is mainly mutton and lamb; what we get from America is beef.

Mr. HUGHES: We could send you more beef.

Mr. ROPER: All the beef we get from Australasia goes to the Armies; the civilian population does not get any of it.

Mr. BOYS: I submit therefore that the amount of profit made on the Australian and New Zealand meat in this case cannot by any means set off the losses on the American, nor does the profit made on the New Zealand meat in any way affect the price paid to the Americans. The American price is a price, as Mr. Wise has explained, fixed quite outside our Department, and the two things have no bearing on one another.

Mr. HUGHES: Yes, but the answer to your argument is this: that the one thing which is within your control, the price of Australasian meat—that is clearly within your control—you do not propose to deal with. As to the other thing, you say: "That is outside our control, and of course we cannot interfere with it." You say you gain 400,000l. on the New Zealand meat, and you lose four or five millions on American meat, and you say one does not set off the other, and so there is no remedy. The remedy lies in action by you. It amounts to this—that if you pay 8½d. to America you must pay 8½d. to us.

Mr. WISE: Mr. Massey does not ask this.

Mr. MASSEY: No, I say the producers in my country have not complained as to price.

Mr. HUGHES: I do complain. I do not see why America should get more than we do.

Mr. MASSEY: They will naturally complain of the price paid to the Americans as compared with the price paid to them. They have every reason to complain. I say so. I complain myself. But that is not the point I am on. That is not what is causing the difficulty. The difficulty is that we are being left with all this meat on our hands.

Mr. HUGHES: Yes. Well, I do not think the Food Controller is responsible for that. That is the Shipping Controller. I will stick to my mutton. What I say is that I do not think you ought to ask us to take less for a commodity than the Meat Trust is paid. It amounts to that.

Mr. MASSEY: Of course it does.

Mr. HUGHES: And of course you say: "Well, we can get it for less from you, and so we will take it for less." Very well. The answer to that is quite obvious too.

CHAIRMAN: We cannot carry that any farther now, can we?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Of course, you have to take into consideration the cost of transportation.

Mr. HUGHES: But I am talking about the f.o.b. price.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: But you say the f.o.b. price ought to be the same.

Mr. HUGHES: It is not more than 1d. a pound—the parity—the American parity.

Publication of Proceedings.

CHAIRMAN: I have circulated a paper with regard to the publication of our proceedings.* I understand the Conference generally approve the recommendations there.

Mr. HUGHES: Well, without being able to refer to the proceedings, I do not know. Generally, of course, I approve it.

CHAIRMAN: Perhaps you will look it through and let us know in three or four hours.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Perhaps each member of the Conference will look it through and make recommendations.

Mr. HUGHES: Yes.

Mr. MASSEY: I want to say this with regard to confidential matters. We all understand that a very great deal of the business of this Conference must remain confidential for a very long time to come. Everyone knows that. But take the business we have been dealing with for the last hour, with regard to the Meat Trusts. I am quite prepared to say, if necessary, that I should not quote any personal opinion of any particular members of the Conference or even of the representatives of the Departments who have been here, but I have to explain the position on my return to New Zealand to my Parliament, and it will make it very much easier for me if this is not confidential.

CHAIRMAN: I will ascertain and let you know.

Mr. MASSEY: But the facts, of course, which have been mentioned here this morning I cannot undertake the responsibility of treating confidentially.

CHAIRMAN: Of course, some of the things we have discussed are extremely confidential, such as the question of Raw Materials and the communications I made on Imperial Preference. These are extremely confidential matters.

A.

Reports of the Committee on the Trade Relations of the United Kingdom within the Empire.

(i)

FIRST REPORT ON RAW MATERIALS.

THE Committee desire to report seriatim on those raw materials which are wholly or mainly produced within the Empire. They are of the opinion that no general scheme of control can be drafted on a priori principles. Each commodity should be separately considered with reference to two questions:

- (a) Whether any control is desirable, and, if so
- (b) What is the most expedient method of control in the particular case?

When the detailed inquiries are concluded it will be advisable to review as a whole the recommendations which have been made as to each commodity.

2. The objects of control are:—

- (a) To secure for the British Empire and the belligerent Allies a sufficiency of essential raw materials, in order to enable them to repair the effects of the War as soon as possible, and to safeguard their industrial requirements.
- (b) To exert pressure on enemy Powers, so as to induce them to conclude an early peace for fear of economic ruin after the War.
- (c) As a result of such pressure to strengthen our hands, and those of our Allies, in conducting the negotiations at the Peace Conference.

3. To accomplish these objects some measure of inter-Allied co-operation will no doubt be essential. It is probable that any proposals for direct control of raw materials by any inter-Allied body would be impracticable; but the machinery of control should be such as to be suitable for negotiation and co-operation with our Allies. This machinery should be created at the earliest possible moment in consultation with the Dominions and India.

4. Steps should next be taken to consult with our belligerent Allies, and particularly with the United States of America:—

- (a) as to their requirements of Empire raw materials;
- (b) as to the reciprocal assistance which they can give us in respect of commodities over which they exercise the main control;
- (c) as to the use which can be made of our and their control over raw materials in exerting pressure on the enemy Powers, and subsequently in negotiating with them at a Peace Conference.

5. The principle should be maintained that the Empire in all bargaining as to raw materials should act as a unit.

6. The Committee are aware that other committees are dealing with the question of raw materials under certain aspects. But they believe that the main facts as to many of the raw materials produced within the Empire are already collected; and they propose to deal first with certain raw materials concerning which the information is already accessible in the Colonial Office.

The Committee understand that the domestic problem of distributing the raw materials which His Majesty's Government may acquire for United Kingdom use is under consideration of the Ministry of Reconstruction. They do not, therefore, propose at this stage to offer any suggestions on this subject.

The Committee are not aware whether any definite and comprehensive organization has yet been created for ascertaining the resources and the needs of our Allies in respect of raw materials. They suggest that the Foreign Office should be asked for information on this point. But they consider that the provision for British Empire requirements should not be delayed while the wants of the Allies are being ascertained.

April, 1918.

(ii)

SECOND REPORT ON RAW MATERIALS.

1. We have prepared, with the help of the Departments concerned, two lists (see Appendix A), showing:—

- (a) Those raw materials, produced in the Empire, which it is prima facie desirable to control for the benefit of the United Kingdom, of other manufacturing centres in the Empire, and of the Allies.
- (b) Those which might be utilized in bargaining, with our present enemies, or with Allies, for economic or political concessions.

The two lists overlap, but they are not identical. It would be easy to add to them; but we are opposed to interfering more than is unavoidable with the normal course of Empire trade. We suggest that the lists should be telegraphed to the Dominions and India, with an explanation that they are provisional lists and are only submitted as a basis for discussion.

We have also prepared a third list, of the materials for supplies of which we may be obliged to bargain with foreign Powers (see Appendix A). This also might be communicated to the Dominions and India for their information.

The Foreign Office are making inquiries as to the exact needs of our Allies in respect of Empire raw materials.* The Board of Trade is preparing statistical estimates of the needs of the United Kingdom. This information will be available by the time of the Conference. We attach a schedule (Appendix B) of the heads under which the information is to be collected.

We look to the co-operation of the Board of Trade and the Foreign Office in investigating the uses which may be made of the "bargaining counters" enumerated in the second list.

2. We suggest that the Imperial War Conference should be asked to approve, in general terms, the principle of reserving specific supplies of certain raw materials for the United Kingdom and the Allies; and also to agree to a list of the raw materials which it is desirable to control for this purpose.

3. But we recognize that each Dominion (and India) must be mistress in her own house, and must be left to decide, in respect of each of the raw materials which she produces, whether she will control it, how she will control it, and for whose benefit she will exercise her control.

4. We therefore deprecate the idea of pressing the Dominions (or India) to adopt a cut-and-dried system of control devised in this country without regard to their local interests and circumstances. We hope that His Majesty's Government, after stating the needs of the United Kingdom and the Allies, will merely ask the Dominions (and India) how far each of them can give assistance. We do not anticipate that the Governments of the Empire will be at a loss for methods of control. We are struck by the variety and the efficiency of the methods which some of them have devised during the War. We understand that all of them have some machinery which could be utilized for post bellum control. There is no good reason for insisting upon mechanical uniformity of administration, as long as the object in view is achieved. That object is to ensure definite quotas of specified raw materials for the United Kingdom and for certain of the Allies, and (it may be) for bargains with our present enemies.

5. After the Conference has approved the principle of control, the objects of control (as defined in our First Report), and the list of materials to be controlled, there will be need for detailed negotiations in respect of each of the listed materials, particularly as to the amounts to be reserved for the United Kingdom and the Allies, and as to the terms of purchase. There will be negotiations on the part of the Dominions and India:—

- (a) with the United Kingdom;
- (b) with certain of the Allies.

These negotiations cannot well be conducted in the main Conference. We hope that the Dominions and India will appoint special delegates (who should be of ministerial status) to negotiate on their behalf. Seeing that at least half a dozen Departments in this country will be interested in the negotiations, we suggest that a committee of ministerial heads of these Departments should be set up, with the Secretary of State for the Colonies as its chairman, and should be empowered:—

- (a) to make binding arrangements, on behalf of the United Kingdom, with the representatives of the Dominions and India, in respect of raw materials;
- (b) to call for all the expert assistance (from Departments and specialist committees) which it may require for the adequate performance of its duties.

Such a committee would no doubt be well qualified to facilitate discussions and arrangements regarding raw materials between our Allies and the Dominions and India.

April, 1918.

APPENDIX A.

List (1).—Raw Materials of Empire origin required by the United Kingdom and the Allies.

Asbestos (Canada, Rhodesia).
Cotton (Egypt, India, East and West Africa, West Indies).
Jute (India).
Wool (Australia, New Zealand, South Africa).
Hides and skins (South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, Canada, India, Straits).
Leather (India, Australia, Canada, New Zealand).
Rubber (Straits, Malay States, Ceylon).
Oleaginous produce (India, Ceylon, West Africa).
Copper (South Africa, Australia).
Lead and its ores (Australia, India).
Manganese ores (India).
Nickel, refined and matte (Canada).
Spelter and zinc concentrates (Australia, India).
Tin and its ores (Australia, South Africa, Nigeria, Straits).
Tungsten ores (Australia, India).
Mica (India, Canada).

List (2).—Raw Materials of Empire origin which might be the subject of special bargains with Allies or Enemies.

Asbestos, fine (Canada, Rhodesia).
Cotton (Egypt, India).
Jute (India).
Wool (Australia, New Zealand, South Africa).
Nickel (Canada).
Tin (Straits, Australia, United Kingdom).
Steam coal (United Kingdom).
Rubber (Straits, Malay States, Ceylon).
Zinc concentrates (Australia, India).
Mica (India, Canada).
Oleaginous seeds and nuts (West Africa, Ceylon, India).

List (3).—Raw Materials for which the Empire may be obliged to bargain.

Cotton, American (United States).
Copper (United States).
Flax and hemp (Russia).
Iron ores and pyrites (Spain, France).
Dyes and chemicals (Germany).
Potash (Germany).
Timber (Russia, Sweden, Spain).
Phosphate rock (United States, France).

APPENDIX B.

Raw Materials.—Headings for the arrangement of information.

I.—Domestic Production.

A.—Amount:

1. Before the War.
2. During the War.
3. Estimate of, after the War, stating practical limit of annual production, potential supply, and possible development.

B.—Present, and estimated future, quality according to world standard.

C.—Control of sources and production—companies, financial, etc.

II.—Domestic Consumption or Requirements.

A.—Before the War:

1. Amount.
2. Uses.

B.—After the War:

1. Amount, estimate stating any qualifying condition.
2. Uses.

III.—Import (if domestic production insufficient).

A.—Sources of supply before the War.

B.—Amounts:

1. Before the War.
2. Estimated necessary amount after the War.

C.—Conditions of supply—enemy control, financial, etc.

THIRD REPORT ON RAW MATERIALS.

1. SOME of the raw materials to which the attention of the Conference will be invited are not controlled by the Self-governing Dominions; but it seems advisable to explain to the Dominions the whole scope of the policy and the share which other parts of the Empire are invited to take in it.

Moreover, it seems essential to the success of the policy that three general measures of control should be adopted, in respect of these materials, by every part of the Empire which either produces them or imports them:—

- (a) To prohibit their export and re-export (except under licence).
- (b) To reserve the right of requisitioning them when they are stored for foreign account, or otherwise unreasonably withheld from the market.
- (c) So far as the non-ferrous metals are concerned to adopt the policy which is embodied in the Non-Ferrous Metals Act of the United Kingdom, and in the similar war legislation of the Australian Commonwealth.

2. With regard to the further measures of control which may be necessary on the part of the Dominions which own the raw materials in question, we can only suggest for their consideration, if they desire to study precedents and models, the following examples:—

(a) Purchasing Schemes.—The scheme followed by the Central Wool Committee of the Commonwealth; the various purchase schemes for wool, scheelite, hides and sheepskins of the Imperial Government Supplies Department of New Zealand; the scheme of the Board of Trade for the purchase of the Egyptian cotton crop.

(b) Licensing Schemes.—The scheme of jute control proposed by the India Office; the methods of rationing exports of rubber and tin from various Colonies and Protectorates.

3. The present Report deals seriatim with certain raw materials which have been already indicated as calling for control in the reconstruction period.* They may conveniently be classified under three heads: (a) Textile Raw Materials; (b) Minerals and Metals; (c) Miscellaneous.

A.—Textiles.

Cotton.

The British Empire produces the greater part of the world's supply of fine cotton. The areas of production for fine cotton within the Empire are the West Indies, Egypt, the Sudan, Nyasaland, Uganda, East and South Africa. Of these Egypt is the most important, not only in the Empire, but in the whole world. India produces considerably more than half of the world's supply of low-grade cotton. The United States have a practical monopoly of the medium grades.

The world's production of cotton has decreased since the season of 1914-15. Before the War, when the world's supplies were steadily increasing, they were often inferior to the demand; and a serious shortage after the War is now considered inevitable.

For the cotton industry of the United Kingdom the question of fine cotton is of paramount importance. In the year ending 31st August, 1913, Great Britain took forty-one per cent. of the total quantity of Egyptian cotton consumed by the whole world; while France took nine per cent., the United States sixteen per cent., Russia eight per cent., Germany eleven per cent., and Austria-Hungary four per cent. The Board of Trade have arranged to purchase the whole Egyptian cotton crop for 1918-19, together with the available balance of the 1917-18 crop. Our Allies are being invited to make a statement of the quantities which their spinners desire to purchase from the Cotton Control Commission.

No decision has yet been taken respecting the fine cotton from other parts of the Empire—the quantities involved being comparatively small.

The question of Indian cotton is not so important to the United Kingdom. It is, however, extremely important to the Indian cotton spinners, whose consumption of Indian-grown cotton amounted in 1913 to 1,298,000 bales; to Japan, which in the same year took 790,000 bales, and in a less degree to Italy, France, and Belgium. In 1913 the total consumption, outside India, of Indian cotton was 1,408,000 bales; of which total 1,062,000 bales were taken by our Allies. Germany and Austria took 263,000 bales, the greater part of the balance. If the Indian cotton supplies are normal or below normal at the time when peace is concluded, the demands of the Central Empires may be a disturbing factor in the Indian cotton market. It would not be surprising if our enemies desired to import two years' supplies from India. Some control of the exports from India may be advisable, both in the interest of the Indian spinners and in that of the Allies.

If the United States were willing to combine with us to regulate exports of raw cotton to the Central Powers, the cotton industries of the latter would be entirely at our mercy. But, in any case, these industries will be hard hit unless they can obtain supplies both of Egyptian and of Indian cotton. Egyptian cotton is already under complete control, owing to the Board of Trade's purchase scheme. If Indian cotton were only allowed to leave India under licence it would be possible to make bargains respecting it with the Central Empires.

* Special memoranda on Mica, Asbestos, and Steam Coal are still in preparation.

Jute.

The question of jute has been carefully considered in this country by committees of the Board of Trade and the Ministry of Reconstruction, by the War Contracts Department, and by the India Office. All these authorities agree that the supplies at present available are barely sufficient to keep the jute mills of the British Empire and the Allied and neutral countries running at their full capacity. The supplies cannot be greatly increased until the restrictions which have been imposed during the War upon the cultivation of jute in India are removed. But immediately after the War the jute spinners of Germany and Austria-Hungary will be in the market for jute. Before the War these two countries were capable of handling about thirteen per cent. of the whole Indian output of raw jute—1,222,000 bales out of an average crop of 10,000,000 bales. In spite of the extensive use which is now made of jute substitutes in enemy countries, the German and Austrian demand for raw jute will be a cause of serious shortage in the market after the War, unless measures of control are taken in good time. The India Office consider that such a control should be introduced, and that its primary object should be to reserve adequate supplies for the jute spinners of India, the United Kingdom, and other parts of the Empire, and the Allied countries. The proposal of the India Office, which is now under consideration in India, is that the export of raw jute from India should be prohibited, and that the Indian spinners should only be allowed to purchase under licence. The Government of India would fix the rations of the Indian spinners, and would come to an arrangement with the Governments of the Empire and of Allied countries as to the rations which should be reserved for their spinners. Licences to export would then be issued by the Government of India to each of the other Governments concerned, up to the limits of the agreed ration in each case. Each Government receiving a ration would undertake to distribute that ration among its own spinners and to prohibit the re-export of raw jute.

Although it rests with the Government of India to make the final decision respecting a product which is an Indian monopoly, we think that the Self-governing Dominions will be interested to know what proposals are being considered in the case of jute. The control scheme of the India Office has been most carefully considered in consultation with the trade interests concerned, and may be of service as a model to other Governments dealing with other commodities.

Wool.

The main problem to be considered is that of clothing wools—merino and cross-bred. The United States and most European countries consume practically the whole of their domestic clips, and the countries which produce an exportable surplus are few in number. Roughly speaking, the British Empire (Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa) produces sixty-eight per cent. of the supplies placed on the world's market; the remaining thirty-two per cent. comes from the Argentine and Uruguay. Of merino wool the British Empire almost holds a monopoly, producing eighty-five per cent. of the world's free supplies. But fifty-four per cent. of the supplies of cross-bred wool comes from the Argentine and Uruguay; we and the Allies, even if we have at our disposal the whole of the Empire supplies of cross-bred wool, will be obliged also to make considerable purchases of this wool in South America.

There is every indication of a shortage of clothing wools after the War. Germany and Austria-Hungary will require enormous quantities. The French demand may for a time be less than it was before the War; but the capacity of the spinning mills, both in the United Kingdom and in the United States of America, has been doubled during the War. All over the world there are large arrears of civilian orders to be executed. But the world's production of clothing wool has diminished during the War. There will not be enough wool to go round, and the case for a control over the Empire supplies, for the benefit of Empire and Allied manufacturers, is a strong one. The ideal arrangement would be for Great Britain and her Allies to obtain a complete control over the whole of the world's clips. There may, however, be difficulties as to joint action in purchasing the Argentine and Uruguay clips, or in securing a first option over them. Consequently it is probable that we shall have to be content with asking the Dominions concerned to arrange for a control over their own supplies of clothing wool. There should be no doubt as to the capacity of the Empire and Allied woollen industries to handle the whole of the cross-bred wool, and most, if not all, of the merino wool produced in Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa. Any surplus of merino wool that may remain, when the reasonable needs of ourselves and of our Allies have been satisfied, would be extremely useful for the purpose of bargaining with enemy countries. Germany and Austria-Hungary were, before the War, entirely dependent on the British Empire for the finer grades of merino wool.

The position of British and Allied manufacturers is to some extent safeguarded so long as the existing arrangements for the purchase of the Australasian clips remain in force. But it would be impossible to supply these manufacturers from Australia and New Zealand with all the merino wool which they require. The co-operation of South Africa in any scheme of wool control is most desirable.

There should be no difficulty in arranging for the transport of any wool which is reserved by the Dominions for the United Kingdom and the European Allies, since it can be carried back to Europe by troopships on their return journey from the Dominions.

Definite proposals regarding wool will be submitted to the Conference by the Board of Trade.

B.—Metals and Minerals.

Nickel.

Although the principal deposits of nickel ore in the world belong to Canada, and the only other considerable deposits are those of New Caledonia, there are so many minor sources of supply, which can and would be developed further in the event of any considerable rise in price, that it would be a hazardous experiment to preclude Germany from buying ores of Allied origin. Germany's needs, in respect of nickel and nickel ore, were not very great before the War, and were partly met from German and Austrian mines.

The requirements of the United Kingdom in 1917 were between 14,000 and 15,000 tons. Unless the post-War demand is likely to be much greater, and we regard this contingency as improbable, supplies are well secured. Two companies in the United Kingdom—the Société Le Nickel and the Mond Nickel Company—are expected to be capable of producing 13,800 tons of refined nickel per annum, as soon as tonnage is available for importing the necessary ores. They own the mines from which their ore is derived; the Mond Nickel Company, which is the larger of the two, uses Canadian ore. Any further supplies of refined nickel which may be required appear to be assured by the agreement into which His Majesty's Government has entered (1917) with the British America Nickel Corporation. In this corporation His Majesty's Government has a controlling interest.

When the Canadian plant of the British America Nickel Corporation is in full working order the Canadian nickel industry will be released from its present dependence on the plant of the International Nickel Company, which at present refines the greater part of the Canadian matte. But the British America Nickel Corporation will not be in a position to handle large quantities of ore and matte before 1920. Therefore, the co-operation of the International Nickel Company would be necessary if it were proposed to deprive Germany of Canadian nickel in the reconstruction period.

Tin.

About two-thirds of the world's production of tin is smelted in the British Empire. The Straits Settlements produce 60,000 tons; the United Kingdom, 31,000 tons; Australia about 2,500 tons. The estimated consumption of tin within the British Empire is under thirty-eight per cent of the Empire's production:—

United Kingdom	30,000 tons
Canada	2,400 "
New Zealand	250 "
Egypt	250 "
India	2,300 "
Total	35,250 tons

There is, however, every prospect that the present world-shortage of tin will continue after the War. The present demand from the War industries of the United Kingdom and the United States is compensated by restrictions on the tin-plate industry in the two countries. The United States at present require 80,000 tons of tin per annum; so that we and the United States are able to absorb nearly the whole of the world's output, which is roughly 125,000 tons. After the War Germany and Austria will be in the market for large quantities both of tin and of tin ore (about 24,000 tons per annum in terms of tin metal).

There is a strong case for controlling export of tin from the Empire (as at present) by means of a licensing system. Australia and South Africa should be consulted on this point, though the output of refined tin is relatively small in Australia and quite insignificant in South Africa.

As to ores—the United Kingdom smelters depend largely upon Bolivian supplies, and about fourteen per cent. of the ores used by the Straits smelters are derived from non-Empire sources (China, Siam, Dutch East Indies). Efforts should be made to extend the production of tin ores within the Empire. There appears to be an adequate control over the ores produced in Nigeria, which at present come entirely to the United Kingdom; and over those of the Federated Malay States, which go entirely to the Straits smelters. It is recommended that these ores should be controlled after the War as at present. But the supplies which the Straits smelters derive from South Africa and Australia are not protected. Germany used to obtain her tin ores from Bolivia; but, in view of American competition for these supplies and the superior quality of British Empire ores, it seems advisable that the latter should be safeguarded by prohibiting their export except to Empire and Allied destinations.

Germany and Austria-Hungary can obtain from the Dutch East Indies all the metallic tin that they require. For this reason, and owing to the great demand from the United States, it is improbable that we can use tin to any great extent as a bargaining counter in negotiations with these Powers.

Zinc.

Enemy control over Australian zinc ores and concentrates has been destroyed by special legislation of the Commonwealth Parliament. The Commonwealth Government have also established, with financial assistance from His Majesty's Government, a Zinc Producers' Association, which is preparing to smelt, in Australian works, a large part of the normal output of Australian zinc concentrates. Meanwhile, His Majesty's Government have contracted to buy (a) the greater part of the existing stocks of concentrates and slimes in Australia, (b) the whole production from 1st January, 1918, until twelve months after the War, up to 250,000 tons per annum, (c) and for nine years thereafter the whole production up to 300,000 tons per annum. We understand, however, that the necessary works for handling the concentrates are in course of construction here and in Australia. Until this work has been done it may be necessary to have the concentrates treated in Belgium. But this step can only be taken with safety when the Belgian smelters have emancipated themselves from the Zinkhüttenverband.

The production of spelter is one of those essential industries in regard to which it is considered that the British Empire should be self-sufficient. But it seems clear that neither here nor in the Commonwealth can a powerful smelting industry be established without some special assistance. The British industry will be exposed to intense competition, both from Germany and from the United States. We understand that some steps are being taken by the Board of Trade to ascertain what form of encouragement is needed to induce the United Kingdom smelters to lay down plant for the purpose of handling Australian concentrates. Should this encouragement take the form of protective duties, we recommend that a preference should be given to spelter produced in other parts of the Empire. We consider that no duties should be imposed on zinc ores and concentrates imported into the United Kingdom from any source.

If, as seems probable, we have on our hands, in the period immediately following the War, a surplus of Australian concentrates, it might be utilized for bargaining purposes.

Tungsten.

The British Empire produces about one-third of the world's output of tungsten ore; about the same quantity is produced in the United States of America. The remainder is produced in Portugal, Spain, Siam, Japan, Bolivia, and the Argentine. Both Great Britain and the United States consume more tungsten ores than they produce. After the War there will be a diminution in the demand; but this will certainly be followed by a diminution in the output, as some of the mines are only remunerative when the price of tungsten is high. It is improbable that there will be either a famine or a glut in the market. We cannot hope to prevent Germany from obtaining ores in neutral countries; but we can easily save ourselves from becoming dependent (as we were before the War) upon either Germany or the United States for our supplies of tungsten and ferro-tungsten. The tungsten makers of the United Kingdom are able to treat all the ores produced within the Empire, and it is very desirable that they should do. One way of securing this result would be to impose a heavy export duty on all tungsten ores exported to markets outside the Empire. Another way would be for His Majesty's Government to purchase at agreed rates all tungsten ores of Empire origin. We do not recommend either measure. The first would be unpopular with the producers; the second, if arranged on a basis satisfactory to the producer, would involve the risk of considerable loss to His Majesty's Government. We recommend that the makers in the United Kingdom, the more important of whom already own mines in Purnah, should be encouraged to form closer relations with the owners of other Empire mines from which tungsten ores are derived. Such relations cannot come to maturity under present conditions, since during the War the tungsten ores of the Empire are purchased exclusively by the Ministry of Munitions. But the contracts of the Ministry of Munitions will run for six months after the War, and in that period the United Kingdom makers will have the opportunity of arranging their own contracts for the future. This, we understand, they are anxious to do.

The question whether State encouragement will be required by the tungsten makers calls for careful inquiry. Their industry is essential to the self-sufficiency of the British steel trade; and it will be exposed to severe competition from Germany and the United States.

Aluminium.

The consumption of aluminium in the United Kingdom during 1917 was about 24,000 tons. Of this quantity 10,000 tons were produced in the United Kingdom (mainly from French ores), 3,000 tons by British-owned works in Norway (from French ores), and 11,000 tons in Canada (from United States ores). It is anticipated that in a few years' time the Northern Aluminium Company of Canada will be the largest producer in the world.

The weak point in the position of the aluminium industry, both here and in Canada, is its dependence upon foreign ores. No immediate anxiety is felt as to the supplies of bauxite from France and the United States. But both these countries have large refining plants, and may be eventually obliged to conserve their bauxite for the use of their own refiners. It is therefore desirable that the large deposits available in British Guiana and in India should be developed. The Northern Aluminium Company of Canada has already taken up concessions in British Guiana, and has engaged itself to establish a plant within the Empire capable of extracting from these ores 4,000 tons of aluminium per annum. Two concessionaires (one British, the other Indian) have obtained rights in the Indian bauxite fields, but have not yet proceeded to exploit them. We recommend that steps should be taken to make these Empire ores available for use in the United Kingdom. As some time will probably elapse before this policy takes effect, we recommend that, in any negotiations with the French on the subject of raw materials, care should be taken to ensure the continuance for some years to come of the supplies of French bauxite which are necessary to the United Kingdom refiners.

Manganese.

There is no danger of a serious shortage, although Germany now controls the Caucasian mines, hitherto the largest source of supply. Germany's imports in 1913 were about 664,000 tons, and the Russian output in the same year was 100,000 tons, so that a part of the Russian supply will probably be available for the Allies if they require it. At present the requirements of the United States are covered from Brazil, and, if these prove insufficient, the American steel works can fall back on the Mexican and Cuban deposits. British India in 1913 produced 800,000 tons of manganese ores; and, although production has declined by fifty per cent. during the War, it can easily be restored to the old level. Smaller supplies of high-grade ores are coming forward from the Gold Coast, and the Ministry of Munitions hope to increase the output to 120,000 tons per annum as soon as transport facilities are available. Large supplies of low-grade ores are obtainable from mines already working in the Sinai Peninsula. As the imports of the United Kingdom in 1913 were only 600,000 tons from all sources, there should be no difficulty in covering all British requirements from Empire sources. France and Belgium will eventually require (according to the 1913 figures) about 400,000 tons. Assuming that France and Belgium obtain some supplies from Russia, we ought to be able to provide them with the balance. But it will be desirable to control the export of manganese ores from the Gold Coast and British India by means of an export prohibition.

Lead.

The position of the lead-smelting industry within the Empire has materially improved during the War. In 1913 the total requirements of the Empire were estimated at 233,000 tons (including 200,000 tons consumed in the United Kingdom). The production of the Empire in the same year was only 164,000 tons (of which 114,000 tons were produced in Australia). The ores produced within the Empire were sufficient to cover the whole of the Empire's requirements of metallic lead; but large quantities of Australian lead concentrates went to Germany and Belgium. In 1916 the output of the United Kingdom smelters was about 80,000 tons. The Australian smelters have a capacity of 200,000 tons per annum. But comparatively small quantities of Australian ores have been reaching this country, and about half our total imports of metallic lead for private account in 1916 were derived from foreign sources, chiefly from Spain.

It is anticipated that the Burmah mines, which at present produce 24,000 tons of lead per annum, will increase their production to 60,000 tons.

We are, however, impressed by the evidence that a shortage of lead may be expected in the world's markets after the War, owing to the fact that the civilian industries which require this metal have been partly, or wholly, in abeyance since August, 1914. This shortage will be felt with peculiar severity in the United Kingdom.

We therefore recommend: (a) that special measures should be taken to place the smelting and refining industries of the United Kingdom in a position to maintain and expand their production. The result of the Australian Commonwealth's new policy in regard to lead is that no considerable supplies of Australian silver-lead, lead ores, and lead concentrates will be available for treatment in the United Kingdom. Under these circumstances every effort should be made to develop alternative sources of these raw materials within the British Empire. The lead mines of the United Kingdom should also be utilized to better advantage. The great distance between Australia and the United Kingdom, and the possibility of labour troubles in the Australian industry—these have occurred even during the War—make it desirable that the United Kingdom should not be wholly dependent on Australian supplies; (b) that steps should be taken, by means of a purchase scheme, to secure for the use of the British Empire and its Allies the whole output of lead in Australia and Burmah.

Copper.

In 1913 the consumption of refined copper within the British Empire was 147,000 tons (of which the United Kingdom took 140,000 tons). The quantity smelted within the Empire was about 112,000 tons, of which total 81,000 tons were produced from Empire ores. The three principal smelting centres within the Empire were the United Kingdom, Australia, and Canada. Their relative importance is shown by the figures of production for 1913:—United Kingdom, 52,000 tons; Australia, 42,000 tons; Canada, 14,000 tons.

During the War our policy has been to buy for war requirements from the United States, which we have been able to do on very favourable terms. This policy has not, however, conduced to the development of our smelting industry. The only notable extension has been in Canada, where the local smelters produced 50,000 tons in 1916. We shall still require considerable supplies from the United States of America after the War. Their exportable surplus in 1916 was 322,000 tons, and we shall not require more than a fourth of that quantity if we maintain connexions with our other existing sources of supply. But the annual imports of refined copper by the Central Empires were about 275,000 tons before the War, and their post-War demands (especially for their electro-technical industries) will probably be much in excess of the normal figure. We therefore recommend that His Majesty's Government should negotiate in good time with the United States copper ring, or with the United States Government, for sufficient supplies during the reconstruction period.

But to safeguard our position in the future it is desirable that Australia and Canada should be asked what can be done to extend their copper-smelting industries. It should also be ascertained how the Canadian exports of refined copper can be diverted to the United Kingdom. Australia and South Africa should further be asked to inquire as to possibility of developing their latent resources of copper ores. Steps should be taken to establish the copper-refining industry in the United Kingdom on a larger scale.

C.—Miscellaneous.

Rubber.

In 1916 the world's production was upwards of 200,000 tons, and of this total about 108,000 tons were produced in the British Empire—chiefly in the Federated Malay States, Straits Settlements, and Ceylon. Outside the Empire the chief sources of supply were Brazil (31,000 to 36,000 tons) and the Dutch East Indies (33,000 tons); Brazilian production is almost stationary, but rubber planting has advanced by leaps and bounds, since 1910, in the Dutch East Indies and the British Empire. The world's output for 1917 was estimated at 265,000 tons; and at the end of the year the Rubber Growers' Association decided that the output of the estates controlled by its members should be limited to eighty per cent. of the 1917 output; the Dutch East Indian planters were approached with a view to inducing them to adopt a similar policy. It is estimated that, even if the Dutch planters do not fall into line, there will be a reduction of output amounting to 30,000 tons.

While the rubber trade in general appears to be afraid of over-production, there are two factors in the situation which point to the opposite conclusion. (a) In Europe there will be a considerable demand, after the War, from civilian industries which have been at a standstill during the War. The demand of Germany and Austria-Hungary will be particularly acute, since these countries have imported very little rubber since August, 1914. Their net imports in 1913 amounted to 19,500 tons; and, in the year after peace, they may well require two years' normal supply. (b) In the case of the United States we have to reckon with a civilian demand which advanced very rapidly in the years 1913-16, and in 1916 already amounted to 118,000 tons.

For these reasons it seems inadvisable that His Majesty's Government should give up the control afforded by the present prohibition of the export of rubber, except under licence, until it is clear that the needs of the British Empire and of the Allies have been adequately covered. In 1916 these requirements were:—

United Kingdom	26,000 tons.
Canada	4,000 "
Australasia (estimate)	4,000 "
United States	118,000 "
France	14,000 "
Italy	8,000 "

It is improbable that the whole of these requirements will have to be met from the British Empire. The United States, for example, take at present the greater part of the Brazilian exports. But the demands of the Allies and of the consumers in the Empire will leave only a small proportion of the Empire output for export to neutrals or present enemies. Concerning this exportable surplus it should be possible to make bargains with our present enemies.

Vegetable and Animal Oils and Fats, and Oil Seeds and Nuts.

As the raw materials from which margarine and other edible fats, soap and candles, cattle cake, paint and varnish, and various lubricants are made, oleaginous produce is of great importance to the United Kingdom and France. In 1913 the net imports of oil seeds and nuts into the United Kingdom amounted to nearly 1,400,000 tons. In addition, about 375,000 tons of oils and fats (not including lard) were imported, and about 222,000 tons were exported.

Before the War the German imports of oil seeds and nuts were from 1,400,000 to 1,700,000 tons, and the French about 950,000 tons. Of the German imports, between forty and fifty per cent. came from the British Empire. In particular, Germany depended mainly upon Egypt for cotton seed, on British West Africa for palm kernels, and on India for rape seed.

During the War the production in the United Kingdom of margarine, and the demand for it, have greatly increased in consequence of the large falling off in the production and importation of butter. When the War is over there will probably be an even greater demand for butter fats; and, as supplies of butter will for some time be limited, it is expected that it will be necessary to manufacture in the United Kingdom about 400,000 tons of margarine a year, as compared with about 75,000 tons before the War.

After the War there is certain to be an abnormal demand from Germany for oleaginous produce. She will, doubtless, be able to obtain considerable quantities from non-British countries—e.g., linseed from Russia and the Argentine, soya beans from China, and copra from the Dutch East Indies. But these will not suffice to supply all her requirements, and German importers are understood to be seriously alarmed at the prospect of being cut off from the sources of supply within the British Empire.

The principal oleaginous produce of which it will probably be desirable to control the export from the British Empire for a certain period after the War appears to be:

(1) Palm Kernels, Copra, and Coco-nut Oil.—These provide the vegetable "hard oils" required for margarine making; and for some time after the War the available world's supply of these will probably be appreciably less than the demand. British West Africa produces about 240,000 tons, or four-fifths of the total world's exports of palm kernels; and French West Africa about 50,000 tons. The United Kingdom and France could, therefore, almost completely control the supply of palm kernels, which, before the War, were nearly all crushed in Germany. With copra and coco-nut oil, which is, of course, expressed from it, the position is different, as a large proportion of the exports of copra come from the Dutch East Indies and the Philippines (200,000-300,000 tons). The chief British sources are Ceylon, India, the Malay Peninsula, the British Pacific Islands, and Zanzibar.

(2) Cotton Seed and Ground-nuts and their Oils.—These oils are the "soft oils" normally used in the United Kingdom for margarine. They are also largely used for other edible purposes, and in many industries. The main sources of cotton-seed oil are:—

- (i) Decorticated cotton-seed oil from the United States of America.
- (ii) Oil expressed from cotton seed imported from Egypt and India, which are the only countries within the Empire which produce cotton seed on a large scale.

Ground-nuts come mainly from the Gambia, Nigeria, and India. If the export of the Gambia and Nigerian ground-nuts is controlled, the United Kingdom will probably not require any considerable quantity of Indian ground-nuts, which, shipped in the decorticated form, are inferior on arrival in the United Kingdom to West African ground-nuts. But Indian ground-nuts are of great importance to France, whose supplies may be imperilled if Germany is allowed to buy without restriction in the Indian market. Unless the crop of cotton after the War is a very large one, the British and German demand for cotton seed will probably exceed the supply available, especially if the local consumption of the oil continues to increase in Egypt; and control of the exports from Egypt and India will be desirable.

As regards linseed, it may be assumed that after the War the Canadian surplus, unless a very large one, will continue to be absorbed by the United States of America, which will also require some portion of the Argentine crop. Germany will no doubt obtain its linseed mainly from Russia and the Argentine. If the crops in those countries are large it may not be necessary to control the exports of linseed from India; but otherwise it will probably be desirable to do so.

In view of the position as we have described it above, we recommend that the export of certain kinds of oleaginous produce to other than Empire destinations should be controlled during the period of reconstruction after the War, and that the Governments of the Dominions and India and other parts of the Empire concerned should be consulted with reference to the products which we have specifically mentioned above.

The increase in the manufacture of margarine in the United Kingdom will necessitate the importation of larger quantities of premier jus and neutral lard. Provided that freight can be made available, Australia and New Zealand should be able to supply larger quantities of premier jus than hitherto, though our main supplies will presumably have to come from the Argentine and the United States of America.

(NOTE.—Premier jus is the fresh fat obtained from the heart, caul, and kidneys of cattle and sheep, expressed at a temperature of 100° to 120° Fahr. Neutral lard is a high quality lard obtained from the belly of the pig.)

Hides and Skins.

The export trade in hides and skins is of some importance to the Dominions of Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa; also to India, which is the largest exporter in the Empire; also to the Straits Settlements, British East Africa, and British West Africa.

At present the United Kingdom depends largely on foreign sources for rough tanned hides (though India is a considerable source of supply) and for raw hides and skins. This is the more regrettable because India and Australia exported hides on a considerable scale to enemy countries and territories in enemy occupation. For India the consequences of this trend in the hides trade were particularly unfortunate; the export of hides fell into the hands of a German ring, and special measures have been found necessary, during the War, to bring this trade into safe hands. The War has compelled the United Kingdom to rely very largely upon hides of Imperial origin; it is desirable from every point of view that there should be no return to the old situation. The difficulties which in the past militated against the use of Empire hides in United Kingdom tanneries were (a) that British tanners had been accustomed to handle the high-grade hides produced in the Argentine; (b) that the exporters in Australia, South Africa, and India did not take pains to improve the quality of their exports. Unless these difficulties can be overcome it is doubtful whether the United Kingdom market can absorb the considerable quantity of Empire hides which were formerly sold to enemy countries.

Germany was dependent, before the War, upon the British Empire for sixty per cent. of her gross imports of dry cow hides. But the other sources of supply upon which she drew were very numerous, and it is doubtful whether her tanning and leather industries would be seriously embarrassed by the stoppage of Empire supplies.

(Paraphrase.)

12TH APRIL, Confidential. The Committee referred to in my despatch of 15th October, Dominions No. 665,* has drawn up two reports on the subject of the post-War Control of Raw Materials which His Majesty's Government propose to bring up at forthcoming Imperial War Conference for discussion. Copies of reports are being sent by mail, but His Majesty's Government think it advisable to telegraph following summary, so that [To (2) and (3) only: [Australian] [New Zealand] representatives at Conference may have time before leaving for London to discuss proposals with their colleagues.] [To (1), (4), and (5): [Canadian] [Union] [Newfoundland] Government may have time to consider proposals beforehand.]

[To all:] Summary begins: First report states that no general scheme of control can be drafted on a priori principles, but each commodity must be treated separately. The objects of control are (a) to secure for British Empire and belligerent Allies sufficiency of essential raw materials, (b) to exert pressure on enemy Powers so as to induce them to conclude early peace for fear of post-War economic ruin, (c) as result of such pressure to strengthen hands of Empire and Allies in conducting negotiations at Peace Conference.

Report further points out that some measure of inter-Allied control of raw materials will no doubt be essential, but that provision for British Empire requirements should not be delayed while wants of Allies are being ascertained. It therefore recommends that machinery should first be created in consultation with Dominions and India, and that steps should then be taken to consult with belligerent Allies, particularly United States of America, as to measures of co-operation. Report emphasizes that principle should be maintained that Empire should act as a unit in all bargaining as to raw materials.

Second report of Committee sets out provisional lists intended as basis of discussion:—

(a) of those raw materials produced in Empire which it is desirable prima facie to control in interests of Empire and Allies, viz., asbestos, hides and skins, cotton, jute, wool, leather, rubber, oleaginous produce, copper, manganese ores, lead and its ores, nickel refined and matte, spelter and zinc concentrates, mica, tungsten ores.

(b) of those raw materials which might be used in bargaining with Allies or enemies for political or economic concessions, viz., fine asbestos, cotton, jute, wool, steam coal, rubber, zinc concentrates, nickel, tin, mica, nuts, and oleaginous seeds.

(c) of those raw materials for supplies of which Empire may be obliged to bargain with Allies and enemies, viz., American cotton, copper, flax and hemp, dyes and chemicals, potash, timber, iron ores and pyrites, phosphate rock.

Report goes on to suggest that Imperial War Conference should be asked to approve in general terms principle of reserving specific supplies of certain raw materials for United Kingdom and Allies, and also agree to list of raw materials desirable to control for this purpose, leaving detailed methods of control for subsequent examination. After Conference has approved principle of control report anticipates that detailed negotiations will be necessary in respect of each raw material, particularly as regards amounts to be reserved and terms of purchase, which could not well be conducted in main Conference. It suggests that it may be necessary for Dominions and India to appoint special delegates to negotiate on their behalf, and also outlines machinery which may be needed in United Kingdom for same purpose. Summary ends.

His Majesty's Government hope that [Canadian representatives] [Australian representatives] [New Zealand representatives] [South African representative] [Newfoundland representative] will be ready at forthcoming Conference to go into questions raised in these reports in as much detail as possible, and will be ready to discuss not only general principle of control, but also individual materials to which, if principle approved, scheme should be applied. It would, of course, be of assistance if your Government could indicate what scheme of control they would favour with regard to separate materials with which second report deals, and also their probable post-War requirements in regard to each article. Your Government will remember that information with regard to post-War requirements has already been asked for and supplied as regards tin.

[To Australia and New Zealand only: I am sending copies of both the reports to the Governor-General of Canada to be handed to [Commonwealth of Australia] [New Zealand] representatives when they arrive.]—LONG.

INTRODUCTION.

WE were appointed under Resolution IV. of the Imperial War Conference, passed on 28th June, 1918, to consider the possible methods in each part of the Empire of obtaining command of each of the essential raw materials specified in Resolution III. (3).

These raw materials were as follows:—

Asbestos.
Cotton.
Jute.
Wool.
Hides and skins.
Leather.
Rubber.
Oleaginous products.
Petroleum.
Copper.
Lead and its ores.
Manganese ores.
Nickel, refined and matte.
Spelter and zinc concentrates.
Tin and its ores.
Tungsten ores.
Mica.
Molybdenum.
Steam coal.

We have had the advantage of considering a memorandum supplied to us by the Board of Trade, setting out alternative methods of control. This memorandum we print as an appendix to this report. We think that it will be of service to the Governments concerned in considering the problems arising with regard to raw materials. We are also indebted to the Ministry of Reconstruction for a variety of suggestions bearing on the questions involved.

We do not feel in a position to recommend ourselves the precise measures to be taken by any of the Governments of the Empire in regard to any particular raw material, as such measures can only be determined by the Governments in the light of local conditions. In the present report, therefore, we have confined ourselves to setting out the nature of the problems which arise in respect of each of the raw materials already referred to. To these raw materials we have, however, added aluminium ores, as we feel that the question of securing command of these is, as stated at the Imperial War Conference, a matter of much importance to the industries of the Empire.

We proceed to deal very briefly with the various raw materials in question. We have used for the purposes of this report the very valuable detailed particulars collected by the "Committee on the Trade Relations of the United Kingdom within the Empire," under the Chairmanship of the Secretary of State for the Colonies. We suggest that it would be of advantage to the Governments of the Dominions and India if these detailed particulars were communicated to them by His Majesty's Government, so that each of the Governments concerned may have the fullest particulars available.

ASBESTOS.

1. Uses.

The industrial application of asbestos is practically unlimited. True asbestos (chrysotile asbestos) is woven into acid-proof and fireproof tissues, etc., whilst short fibre asbestos is used for various insulating materials, roofing, tiling, and other building materials.

2. Sources of Supply.

The main supplies (about eighty per cent.) of the world come from Canada. The remaining countries producing asbestos in considerable quantities are the Union of South Africa, Rhodesia, Russia, Italy, and the United States of America.

3. Output.

The Canadian output averaged nearly 88,000 long tons per annum over the period 1909 to 1913. Asbestic, an inferior variety of asbestos, was produced in Canada to the average amount of 22,000 tons per annum. The Russian output averaged 14,000 tons per annum for the period 1909 to 1913. The production of the other countries named was smaller. The Union of South Africa is the main source of what is known as blue asbestos, which is an acid-resisting substance, but highly abrasive.

4. Present Position.

Before the War the bulk of the Canadian asbestos was exported to the United States, smaller quantities going to the United Kingdom and other markets. Under an arrangement made since the War purchases for the United Kingdom in Canada have been effected through the Imperial Munitions Board for the account of a body in the United Kingdom known as the Asbestos Pool Board. Supplies from the Union of South Africa and Rhodesia for the United Kingdom have been obtained by means of the control of the Imperial Government over tonnage.

5. Requirements of the British Empire.

The requirements of the British Empire after the War may be estimated roughly at 14,000 tons to 15,000 tons per annum, mainly for the United Kingdom.

6. The Problem.

The problem before the British Empire mainly concerns Canada, but to a less extent the Union of South Africa and Rhodesia. It may be stated thus:—

- (1) What action is necessary to secure that the United Kingdom and the Allies shall secure the necessary supplies of asbestos? In particular, is it desirable to continue after the War purchases on account of the United Kingdom by the Asbestos Pool Board, and to extend this system to any of the European Allies which may desire it, especially France and Italy?

- (2) What steps are necessary to secure supplies from the Union of South Africa and Rhodesia? In particular, is it possible to control the destination of the supplies without a system of licensing exports from both countries?

COTTON.

1. Uses.

The uses of cotton are legion, but they may be roughly classified as follows: (1) sewing cotton; (2) yarns for all kinds of fabrics, both clothing and furnishing, and for other purposes, including hosiery and lace; (3) miscellaneous uses of all kinds, from typewriter ribbons to aeroplane fabric and motor-car tyre webbing; (4) "linters," or the short fuzz taken from the seed by a subsequent process after the bulk of the lint has been removed, form the foundation of many explosives, such as gun-cotton; linters, and the waste of other cotton, and even some of the lower-grade cottons themselves, also enter into many other uses, e.g., medical "cotton wool," blotting paper, padding of garments, upholstering, etc.

2 and 3. Sources of Supply and Output.

From this point of view cotton must be roughly graded as below. The grading is according to the length of staple (2½ inches to ¾-inch), which controls the fineness or "count" of the yarn that can be spun from it.

- (a) Fine cotton, including the Sea Island (United States and West Indian) and Egyptian.
- (b) Medium, or "bread and butter" cotton, the great bulk of the world's supply, mostly obtained from the United States.
- (c) Indian short staple cotton, only usable for heavy counts of yarn and fabrics of a lower grade.

The following summary of a larger table of statistics given in the Interim Report of the Empire Cotton Growing Committee indicates the proportions of these different grades and their sources: distinguishing the British Empire's share in the world's supply:—

Grade and Quality.	Where Grown.	World's Crop.	Empire's Share.
			Bales.	Percentage
Fine ...	South Carolina, West Indies, Florida and Georgia, Egypt and the Sudan ...	Bales of 500 lb. 1,854,000	1,276,000	94
Medium ...	United States of America and Mexico, Nyasaland, Uganda, West and South Africa, Brazil, Peru, etc., Levant, Russia, China ...	17,080,000	455,000	2.5
Short ...	India, Russia, Persia, China ...	7,200,000	4,500,000	62
	Totals ...	25,684,000	6,231,000	24.6

Of the United States crop of, say, 15,000,000 bales, which is sixty per cent. of the whole world's supply of all kinds of cotton, the United States themselves are now using fully half, while England uses the bulk of the remainder. Germany was the only other country whose consumption exceeded a million bales before the War. Smaller quantities went to almost every other country in the world, from Japan to Canada.

The Egyptian crop, which now runs about 1,250,000 bales of 500 lb., is very largely used in England, though the United States and Germany also used a good deal before the War.

The Indian crop of about 5,000,000 bales is mainly used in India and Japan. Before the War Germany, Austria, and Italy were the only other countries that used much.

The following table gives a brief summary of pre-War consumption of the different varieties (all the figures represent thousands throughout) :—

Totals	143,453	14,507	3,897	1,004	3,524	22,932

4. Present Position.

The world's crops have been seriously reduced by the War, mainly owing to the very high prices of competing crops, e.g., cereals. The demand for cotton goods has shown little diminution, with the result that prices have beaten all records. The difficulty of shipping has made it necessary to control the trade in many ways. The British and Egyptian Governments control the Egyptian crop, while the Cotton Control Board controls the consumption in Lancashire. The Indian Government have recently started a measure of control over speculation in India.

Even before the War the world's consumption had only been limited by the available supply, and there is every reason to expect grave shortage after the War when the Central Powers come into the market again. During the War their supplies have been practically cut off except for small quantities from the Levant. They may be able to get more now from Russia (Caucasus and Turkestan), but the crops there have diminished very seriously since 1916.

5. Requirements of the British Empire.

These are shown in the table of statistics already given. They are very easily met, so long as the United States crop is free to us; in the highest grade and in the lowest we are in a position not merely of independence but of almost complete control. In the former our control of the West Indian Sea Island crop and the Egyptian long staple supply gives us substantial control of the world's supplies in that grade. In the lowest grade, again, the Indian crop provides over sixty per cent. of the total. But in the great medium grade of the United States cotton we have only two-and-a-half per cent. of the total. In view of this preponderance of the United States crop in the world's supply and the possibility of United States consumption increasing faster than the crop, as it has very markedly done during the War, it is felt to be extremely desirable that the British Empire should be rendered more nearly independent of any outside source of supply.

6. The Problem.

The problems are :—

- (1) At the close of the War, to prevent a disastrous scramble for cotton when the Central Powers again come into competition with the rest of the world for the United States crop. Could arrangements be made with the United States to give preference to the Allies in United States cotton? The United States Government may, before the War ends, and almost certainly will when peace comes, find it necessary to take over control of the crop and to ration it out to the Allies, as has been done with the Egyptian crop, and, once begun, it would require to be continued for some time after the War. There is every reason to believe that the control of the Egyptian crop, and the Cotton Control Board's supervision of the consumption in Lancashire, will require to be continued for a time after the War.
- (2) Without waiting till after the War, what steps are possible now to secure the earliest development of the resources of the Empire in increased cotton-growing? In the Sudan, in West Africa, in various parts of East and South Africa, and in Queensland, as well as in the already established countries such as Egypt and the West Indies, there are great possibilities of extension, which may reasonably be expected some day to make us more nearly independent of foreign supplies. A great deal of preliminary work must be done so that no time may be lost after the War in pushing on with the large engineering works—railways, irrigation works, etc.—which will be required in many parts of the Empire to provide the necessary conditions of extended cotton-growing.
- (3) Whether it is desirable, in the interests of the Indian cotton industry and of the Allies, that steps should be taken by the Government of India to regulate the exportation of raw cotton from India?

JUTE.

1. Uses.

JUTE is used as a textile raw material: especially for the manufacture of packing cloth and gunny bags, floorcloth and linoleum, twine, and tying cords.

2 and 3. Sources of Supply and Output.

The fibre is produced in India only, its cultivation being practically confined to the provinces of Bengal, Eastern Bengal and Assam, Cooch Behar, and Nepal.

In 1914 the crop amounted to 10,444,000 bales of 400 lb. A normal crop on the basis of pre-War cultivation is 10,000,000 bales. The crop for 1917 was slightly under 9,000,000 bales. That for 1918 may be rather smaller.

4. Present Position.

The maximum capacity of the jute mills in the consuming countries was, in 1913 :—

(In bales of 400 lb.)
India ...	5,250,000	Brought forward	8,736,000
Great Britain ...	1,470,000	Spain ...	208,000
United States of America	650,000	Holland ...	40,000
France ...	593,000	Norway ...	10,000
Russia ...	274,000	Sweden ...	32,000
Italy ...	255,000	Greece ...	5,000
Belgium ...	152,000	Germany ...	880,000
South America ...	92,000	Austria ...	366,000
Carried forward		8,736,000	10,277,000

The jute mills usually carry six months' stocks. At present the mills of all countries outside India, with the exception of the United States, are practically denuded of stocks; consequently, at the conclusion of peace a number of consuming countries will desire to buy supplies equal to eighteen months' consumption. On this basis the India Office state the present position thus:—

Stocks in hand in India	1,500,000 bales
Crop of 1918	8,500,000 ..
Total supplies available	10,000,000 ..
Indian requirements for twelve months	5,500,000 ..
Requirements of United Kingdom, United States of America, Italy, France, Belgium, Brazil, and Greece for twelve months' consumption and stocks	4,442,000 ..
Total requirements, Empire and Allies	9,942,000 ..

It is evident that very little would be left for neutrals and enemy countries if the Allies were provided with jute on this scale. Though it may turn out that the Allies, or some of them, may have to be content with less than eighteen months' supplies, for reasons of finance and tonnage, it is clear that, if Germany and Austria, to say nothing of the neutrals, were allowed free access to the Indian jute market there would be a demand greatly in excess of the supply, and prices would be much inflated.

5. Requirements of the British Empire.

The two centres of the jute-spinning and weaving industries within the Empire are India and the United Kingdom. The annual requirements of Indian industry are about 5,500,000 bales. The United Kingdom will require at the conclusion of peace about 2,205,000 bales (allowing 1,470,000 bales for twelve months' consumption, and half this amount for replenishment of stocks). The requirements of the Empire, after allowing for those of the Dominions, in the first twelve months after peace may therefore be put at, say, 8,000,000 bales.

6. The Problem.

It is clear, from the figures given above, that the jute industries of the Empire and the Allied countries will be in danger of failing to obtain their necessary supplies of raw material, unless the assistance of the Government of India is forthcoming. The problems which call for consideration are:—

- (1) Whether such assistance could be given consistently with the interests of the Indian producer and manufacturer, and what measures would be necessary to safeguard those interests?
- (2) Supposing assistance to be given, what machinery would be required to assess the rations of the several countries which would participate in the exportable surplus of Indian jute?
- (3) By what method could these rations most conveniently be distributed?

WOOL.

1. Uses.

Wool is mainly used in the clothing industries, including those connected with the supply of hosiery and knitting wool. To a less extent it is required for furnishing fabrics and for carpets. It should be stated that of the two leading types of wool crossbred has, during the War, mainly been utilized for military purposes, and merino for civilian purposes.

2 and 3. Sources of Supply and Output.

The sources of supply and output can best be indicated by the following summary of a table drawn up for the Conference on Wool Supplies after the War, which was laid before the Imperial War Conference.

	Total Production.		Production in 1915 by kinds of Wool.
	1913.	1915.	Merino.	Crossbred.	Carpet Wool, etc.

	852.0	794.0	99.0	357.0	338.0
Enemy States.
Germany and Austria-Hungary	70.0	67.0	13.0	54.0	—
Total	2,891.6	2,794.0	1,074.5	1,022.5	702.0

4. Present Position.

The outstanding features of the position are:

- (a) That the British Empire is self-supporting as regards each leading type of wool. As to merino wool, the production of Australia and South Africa (about 680,000,000 lb.) is nearly four times the pre-War consumption within the Empire, and much more than sufficient to supply all the present Allies and neutral countries on the 1913-15 basis. The production of crossbred wool in the United Kingdom, New Zealand, and Australia (about 400,000,000 lb.) is amply sufficient to provide for the maximum requirements within the Empire, leaving a surplus available for, but not adequate to meet the full requirements of, our Allies. These cannot be met without obtaining large supplies from the Argentine and Uruguay, and this feature materially affects the wool problem in all its aspects, and especially with regard to price. India produces enough low wool to supply the United Kingdom, with some surplus for the Allies.
- (b) That arrangements have been made between His Majesty's Government on the one hand, and the Governments of Australia and New Zealand on the other, by which the former has purchased the whole of the wool clips of Australia up to the end of one full wool year, beginning 1st July, after the end of the War, and the New Zealand clips up to 30th June, 1918. Negotiations are understood to be proceeding for an extension of the arrangements for the purchase of New Zealand wool by the Imperial Government to the same period as in the case of Australia. A portion of the 1917-18 South African clip has been similarly acquired.

5. Requirements of the British Empire.

Taking 1913 as a standard year, and assuming that the consumption of imported wool in the United Kingdom in the first year after peace will be on similar lines, the figures of the United Kingdom consumption may be estimated as follows

	In millions of lb.
Merino	189.0
Crossbred	314.3

It should be noted, however, that this estimate is necessarily of the most approximate character, since the United Kingdom has very largely increased its consumption (especially of crossbred wool) owing to war conditions, and such increased consumption may continue, to some extent at least, after the War.

Of the other parts of the Empire, Australia, New Zealand, and the Union of South Africa are more than self-supporting. Canada will require a certain amount of imported supplies in addition to her home production, probably in excess of 21,000,000 lb. (the recorded imports in 1916). British India, whilst exporting a large amount of low wool, imports other varieties (38,000,000 lb. in 1916).

6. The Problem.

As regards wool generally, the British Empire occupies a very strong position, and the problem before it is largely connected with the allocation of its available supplies amongst the constituent parts of the Empire and amongst the Allies.

Apart from questions of allocation, the main points to be considered appear to be these:

- (1) So far as Australia and New Zealand are concerned, is the position adequately secured by the arrangements for purchase already made, or in contemplation, as stated above? In this connexion, the possibility of the existence of a considerable accumulation of supplies after the termination of the War, owing to lack of tonnage for export, should be borne in mind.
- (2) Is it desirable, and possible, to make similar purchasing arrangements in the case of the Union of South Africa? The question of accumulation referred to under (1) may be of importance in considering this.
- (3) Is it desirable to enter into negotiations with the Government of India with a view to securing the exportable surplus of East India wool for the Empire and the Allies?
- (4) In the event of purchasing arrangements or extensions of such within the Empire not being practicable, what other means of control are possible to secure that the exportable surplus is available for the needs of the Empire and the Allies?
- (5) In view of the fact, already stated, that the supplies of crossbred wool are not likely to be adequate to meet the full requirements of the Allies after the War, would it be desirable to invite the Governments of the Allies, particularly the United States and France, to consider the problem of securing the necessary additional supplies from the Argentine and Uruguay?

HIDES, SKINS, AND LEATHER.

1. Uses.

Hides and skins are used as the raw material of leather. A considerable quantity of undressed leather is imported into the United Kingdom for further treatment.

2 and 3. Sources of Supply and Output.

Hides and skins are exported from a large number of countries, but the principal supplies of the world market appear to be as follows:—

Country	Exports of 1912 (tons).
Russia	56,500
Germany	89,250
France	76,000
Italy	21,000
Argentina	140,000
Uruguay	30,000 (estimated)
India	67,000
British South Africa	26,000
Australia	(Weight not stated. Value, £3,700,000.

The principal leather manufacturing countries of the world in 1912 were the United States, Germany, and the United Kingdom. The values of their respective exports of leather and leather goods in 1912 were:—

United States	£3,230,000
Germany	11,500,000
United Kingdom	5,248,000

The German industry derived important quantities of hides from the British Empire—in 1913 about 20,000 tons out of a total import of 140,000. Within the British Empire India was the chief German source of supply (14,000 tons in 1913), and before the War the Indian hide market was dominated by German firms.

The British industry relied upon foreign and Empire hides and undressed leather in the following proportions:—

	Imports of 1912 (by value).
	From the Empire.	From other countries.
Dry hides	£1,400,000	£1,000,000
Wet hides	700,000	2,400,000
Leather undressed	2,100,000	2,600,000
	£4,200,000	£6,000,000

4. Present Position.

In 1916 the imports into the United Kingdom of raw hides and undressed leather from Empire sources amounted to £6,100,000; from foreign sources to £7,200,000. The position, therefore, as regards the balance between foreign and Empire raw materials, had not changed very materially. The most satisfactory development during the War has been the increased use of East India hides in the United Kingdom for purposes for which they were formerly supposed to be unsuitable. The Government of India has taken steps to eliminate German interests from the Indian hide trade.

5. Requirements of the British Empire.

The imports of hides, skins, and undressed leather into the United Kingdom in 1912 were as follows:—

Calf-skins, dry	25,238 cwts.
Other dry hides	651,482 "
Calf-skins, wet	67,226 "
Other wet hides	872,663 "
Leather, undressed, hides	969,178 "
Leather, undressed, skins	181,459 "
Total	2,767,246 "

The Dominions and India are importers of leather and leather goods on a considerable scale. Canada imported before the War about 32,000 short tons of hides and skins per annum.

6. The Problem.

One main obstacle to the more extensive use of Empire hides and skins in the British leather industry has been that the United Kingdom tanneries specialized in producing grades of leather for which Argentine hides were the most suitable. Another has been that the marketing of Empire hides had fallen very largely into German hands before the War.

The main problems for consideration appear to be:—

- (1) How to prevent German control from being re-established in the hide and skin trade within the Empire, and
- (2) What steps can be taken in the producing countries of the Empire to increase the supply of hides adapted to the special requirements of the United Kingdom manufacturer.

RUBBER.

1. Uses.

RUBBER is principally used for motor and cycle tyres and as a waterproofing and insulating material.

2 and 3. Sources of Supply and Output.

Rubber is chiefly produced in the following countries:— 1916 figures.

Ceylon	26,000 tons
Federated Malay States	63,000 "
Straits	15,000 "
Dutch East Indies	33,000 "
Brazil	36,000 "
Bolivia	6,000 "
India	3,000 "

The world's output for 1916 was 202,000 tons; of which 108,000 were produced within the Empire. The world's output for 1917 was estimated at 265,000 tons. The difference between the figures for the two years is due to the rapidly increasing productivity of the plantations in the Straits Settlements and Federated Malay States and Dutch East Indies.

4. Present Position.

The world's consumption in 1916 was estimated at 190,000 tons. The principal consumers were the United States (116,000 tons), United Kingdom (27,000), France (14,000), Russia (8,500), Italy (8,000), Scandinavia (4,500). The combined consumption of Canada, Australia, and New Zealand is believed to have been rather less than 8,000 tons.

In 1913 the consumption of Germany was 16,500 tons, and of Austria-Hungary 3,000 tons. The demand for rubber in enemy countries after the War will hardly fall below the 1913 figures, and an increased demand may be expected from the United States. But the Rubber Growers' Association incline to the opinion that there will be a glut of rubber after the War, and a majority of the estates represented in the Association lately decided that it would be advantageous to reduce output in 1918 by twenty per cent. of the 1917 figures. How far the members will act on this resolution remains to be seen; in any case it would not have the effect of reducing the world's output by more than 30,000 tons.

5. Requirements of the British Empire.

The requirements of the British Empire in 1916 were only 35,000 tons; even if this figure is considerably exceeded in the transition period there should be no difficulty in meeting all British requirements out of the Empire crop.

6. The Problem.

It is, however, worth considering:—

- Whether the present system of controlling exports from British possessions by way of licence should be continued for a period after the War, to ensure that priority is given to the needs of the Empire and the Allies;
- Whether it is desirable to take any steps to preserve for the United Kingdom the position of the principal rubber market in the world;
- Although the Allies control a very large proportion of the world's output, it does not seem practicable to threaten Germany and Austria-Hungary with a rubber boycott. These Powers will always be able to buy considerable quantities in the Dutch East Indies, in Mexico, and in South America. But it is worth considering whether our present enemies should be allowed to obtain rubber from markets controlled by the Empire and the Allies without any compensation. Germany before the War obtained seventy per cent. of her gross imports from the British Empire and from Brazil. It may, therefore, be presumed that the German trade preferred rubber obtained from these sources.

OLEAGINOUS PRODUCTS.

1. Uses.

OLEAGINOUS produce includes vegetable and animal oils and fats and oil seeds and nuts, and forms the raw material from which margarine and other edible fats, frying and salad oils, soap and candles, cattle cake, paint and varnish, and various lubricants are made; certain oils are also used in the manufacture of linoleum, tin-plates, and woollens. The following table shows the main uses of the various oils and fats:—

	Margarine.	Other edible purposes.	Soap and Glycerine.	Other technical purposes.
Castor oil	—	—	Yes	Yes—as a lubricant, especially for aircraft engines and for dyeing and medicinal purposes.
Coco-nut oil	Yes	Yes	Yes	Yes—as a lubricant.

2. Sources of Supply.

(1) Seeds, Nuts, and Kernels.

Castor-seed: mainly from India.

Copra: from Ceylon, India, Straits Settlements, Dutch East Indies, Zanzibar, Philippines, and Pacific Islands.

Cotton-seed: from Egypt and India.

Ground-nuts: shelled, from India, Nigeria, and China; unshelled, from the Gambia and Senegal.

Linseed: from the Argentine, India, Russia, and Canada.

Palm kernels: from West Africa—chiefly Nigeria and Sierra Leone.

Rape-seed: from India, Russia, China, and Roumania.

Sesame: from India and China, and, to a small extent, from the Sudan, East Africa Protectorate, and Nigeria.

Soya beans: from China and Japan.

(2) Vegetable Oils.

Castor oil: mainly expressed in United Kingdom from imported seed.

Coco-nut oil: from Ceylon, Straits, India, and Philippines.

Cotton-seed oil: from United States of America, and expressed in United Kingdom from Egyptian and Indian cotton-seed

Ground-nut oil: expressed in the United Kingdom usually from mixed shelled (Nigeria) and unshelled (Gambia) ground-nuts.

Linseed oil: expressed in United Kingdom from imported linseed.

Palm oil: from West Africa—chiefly Nigeria and Sierra Leone.

Palm-kernel oil: expressed in United Kingdom.

Rape oil: expressed in United Kingdom.

Sesame oil: expressed in United Kingdom.

Soya oil: expressed in United Kingdom.

Olive oil: from Italy, Spain, and France.

(3) Animal and Fish Oils.

Neutral lard, oleo oil, premier jus, stearine: mainly from United States of America and Argentine.

Tallow: from Australia, New Zealand, Argentine, and, to smaller extent, from China, United States of America, Uruguay, etc.

Whale oil, fish oil: from Falkland Islands and Southern Ocean whale fisheries, from Norway, Japan, Cape, and Newfoundland.

3. Output.

The crops of many of the principal oil seeds vary greatly from year to year. A rough estimate of the amounts likely to be available for export from the chief producing countries after the War is given below:—

Article.	Supplies likely to be available.	Remarks.
Castor seed ...	India has usually about 100,000 tons of seed available for export. In 1913-1914 135,000 tons were exported, which was considerably above the normal. It is not, however, improbable that recent developments may lead to permanent increase in the exportable surplus.	Germany was only a comparatively small consumer (6,000-10,000 tons), the chief Continental users before the War being Italy, France, and Belgium, which took together about 45,000-48,000 tons. The United States of America took about 20,000 tons.

Copra and coco-nut oil:—
Ceylon ...	50-70,000	45,000	77-90,000	The Governor recently estimated that if the existing mills were worked to their full capacity Ceylon could export 50,000 tons of oil a year, of which 10,000 tons would be native-made oil, which is inferior to factory-made oil. A very large amount of copra is crushed in India by rough native methods, and is consumed locally. It is possible that the supply of copra and oil available for export could be increased.
India ...	35,000	6,000	28,000

Zanzibar ...	10,000	—	6,000
British Pacific Islands (Fiji, Solomon Islands, Gilbert and Ellice Islands) and Tonga ...	34,000	—	22,000	The Straits Settlements can normally export about 10,000 tons of oil and 100,000 tons of copra. But of this only about 32,000 tons of copra is produced in British Malaya. The rest is imported into the Straits Settlements mainly from the Dutch East Indies, and is included in their exports.
Philippines ...	80-140,000	15,000	66-105,000
Dutch East Indies	120-160,000	—	77-102,000	During the War the copra-crushing industry has been extended considerably in the Philippines, the oil going largely to the United States of America.

Tallow ...	Australia and New Zealand, 80,000-90,000 tons United Kingdom, ? The Argentine, 35,000-50,000 tons	These are normal pre-War exports. Exports have fallen off during the War owing partly to drought in Australia in 1915, but since then mainly to the shipping shortage. There is a considerable home melt of tallow and greases. Before the War much of this was exported, as United Kingdom manufacturers preferred the imported article, which is superior in quality. It is difficult to form any estimate of the amount of this home melt after the War.

South African exports during 1911-1915 were from 5,000-10,000 tons, but less than 1,000 tons in 1917. A considerable proportion of production is used in South Africa. Newfoundland normally exported 1,000-2,000 tons, but in 1916-1917 only about 800 tons. Fish Oil. Newfoundland exports of cod oil are normally from 4,000-5,000 tons, and of seal oil from 3,000-4,000 tons.

4. Present Position.

The question of securing command of adequate supplies of oleaginous produce for the requirements of the British Empire and of the Allies is a very complex one, owing to:—

- The number of oil seeds and oils involved;
- The number of countries in which they are produced;
- The fact that many oils are interchangeable and that of these some are interchangeable for several or all purposes, while others are interchangeable for only one purpose;
- The differences in the relative amounts of the oil and oil cake produced from the oil seeds, and different values of the oil cakes as food for animals.

The following table gives the percentages of crude oil usually obtained in the United Kingdom from the principal oil seeds:—

	Percentage of crude oil.
Castor seed	43
Copra	64
Cotton-seed (undecorticated)	18
Ground-nuts (shelled)	40
" (unshelled)	30
Linseed	33½
Palm kernels	44
Rape-seed	33½
Sesame	50
Soya beans	12

- The fact that, as the amounts of oil seeds, oils, and oil cake required by the British Empire and the Allies are, in the aggregate, very considerable, a large amount of shipping tonnage will be required to transport them from the countries in which they are produced to the countries in which they are used, and that, therefore, for a certain time after the War shipping considerations may render impracticable the realization of what would otherwise be the best programme for supplying the requirements of the British Empire and of the Allies.

In 1913 the net imports of oil seeds and nuts into the United Kingdom amounted to nearly 1,400,000 tons. In addition, about 375,000 tons of oils and fats (not including lard) were imported, and about 222,000 tons were exported. The net imports of oil cakes were 353,000 tons.

Before the War the German imports of oil seeds and nuts were from 1,400,000 to 1,700,000 tons, and the French about 950,000 tons. Of the German imports, between forty and fifty per cent. came from the British Empire. In particular, Germany depended mainly upon Egypt for cotton-seed, on British West Africa for palm kernels, and on India for rape-seed.

After the War there is certain to be an abnormal demand from Germany for oleaginous produce. She will, no doubt, be able to obtain considerable quantities from non-British countries—e.g., linseed from Russia and the Argentine, soya beans from China, and copra from the Dutch East Indies. But these will not suffice to supply all her requirements.

The principal articles of oleaginous produce of which it may be desirable to control the export from the the British Empire for a certain period after the War appear to be:—

- (1) Palm kernels, copra, and coco-nut oil. These provide the vegetable "hard oils" required for margarine making; and for some time after the War the available world's supply of these will probably be appreciably less than the demand. British West Africa produces about 240,000 tons, or four-fifths of the total world's exports, of palm kernels; and French West Africa about 50,000 tons. The United Kingdom and France could, therefore, almost completely control the supply of palm kernels, which, before the War, were nearly all crushed in Germany. With copra and coco-nut oil the position is different, as a large proportion of the exports of copra come from the Dutch East Indies and the Philippines (200-300,000 tons). Most of the copra and coco-nut oil which are exported from the Straits Settlements were first imported in the form of copra from the Dutch East Indies.

The average imports of copra and coco-nut oil by Holland and Denmark before the War were about:—

	Copra in tons.	Oil in tons.	Total oil- value in tons.
Holland	95,000	16,000	77,000
Denmark	28,000	5,000	23,000

Germany imported about 190,000 tons of copra a year, as well as about 250,000 tons of palm kernels. If she is unable to obtain British West African palm kernels she will be driven to rely more on copra. The same applies, to some extent, to Holland, whose margarine manufacturers used palm-kernel oil made in Germany. In 1915 France imported 146,000 tons of copra.

Japan has been taking considerable quantities of copra recently and re-exporting the copra—or making and exporting the oil—to the United States of America.

The world's demand for imported copra and coco-nut oil in terms of oil may be put—very roughly—at:—

Supply	322-399,000 tons
Demand:—
United Kingdom	144,000 tons
Holland (say)	80,000 "
France (say)	90,000 "
Denmark	23,000 "
United States of America (say)	70,000 "
Germany (say)	150,000 "
Other countries (say)	30,000 "
Total (say)	587,000 tons

The shortage of coco-nut oil will no doubt to a large extent be met at first by the margarine manufacturer using more hydrogenized oils and animal fats, and by other consumers using other oils as substitutes for coco-nut and palm-kernel oil. Later on it will probably be met by increased exports of copra and coco-nut oil from the main producing countries—especially India.

- (2) Cotton-seed, and ground-nuts and their oils. These are the "soft oils" normally used in the United Kingdom for margarine. They are also largely used for other edible purposes and in many industries. The main sources of cotton-seed oil are:

- Decorticated cotton-seed oil from the United States of America;
- Oil expressed from cotton-seed imported from Egypt and India, which are the only countries within the Empire which export cotton-seed on a large scale.

The only large importers of cotton-seed before the War were the United Kingdom and Germany.

Ground-nuts come to the United Kingdom mainly from the Gambia and Nigeria. If the export of the Gambia and Nigerian ground-nuts were controlled the United Kingdom would probably not require any considerable quantity of Indian ground-nuts, which, shipped in the shelled form, are inferior on arrival in the United Kingdom to West African ground-nuts. But Indian ground-nuts are of great importance to France, whose supplies may be imperilled if Germany is allowed to buy without restriction in the Indian market.

Unless the crop of cotton after the War is a very large one the British and German demand for cotton-seed may exceed the supply available, especially if the local consumption of the oil continues to increase in Egypt.

(3) As regards linseed, it may be assumed that after the War the Canadian surplus, unless a very large one, will continue to be absorbed by the United States of America, which will also require some portion of the Argentine crop. Germany will no doubt obtain its linseed mainly from Russia and the Argentine. Unless the crops in the exporting countries are large there may be a shortage in linseed as compared with the world's requirements.

The increase in the manufacture of margarine in the United Kingdom will necessitate the importation of larger quantities of premier jus and neutral lard. Provided that freight can be made available Australia and New Zealand may be able to supply larger quantities of premier jus than hitherto, though the main supplies will presumably have to be obtained by the United Kingdom from the Argentine and the United States of America.

5. Requirements of the British Empire.

An estimate of the requirements of the United Kingdom after the War is as follows:—

	Margarine.	Other edible purposes.	Soap and Candle-making.	Other technical purposes.	Total.
	Tons.	Tons.	Tons.	Tons.	Tons.
Vegetable oils.

	400,000	150,000	*178,000	166,000	889,000

* Plus at least 32,000 tons of soap stock.

It will be seen that about 889,000 tons of oils and fats will be needed for the United Kingdom alone. This is based on the following assumptions:—

(a) That after the War, at any rate until supplies of butter increase substantially, the United Kingdom will require about 400,000 tons of margarine a year, as against about 150,000 tons a year before the War; and that it will be necessary to manufacture the 400,000 tons in the United Kingdom, as the margarine factories in Holland will probably send nearly all their surplus margarine to Germany.

(b) That the requirements of the soap and candle industries of the United Kingdom will be met by about 173,000 tons of oils and such soap stock as is produced by the oil refineries.

The consumption of these industries was:—

In 1915 ...	207,000 tons of oil.
In 1916 ...	255,000 "
In 1917 ...	264,000 "

In 1918 it is expected to be 164,000 tons of oil. The increase in consumption in 1916 and 1917 was mainly due to the great demand for glycerine for munitions. This special demand will cease with the War, and glycerine will return to its position as a by-product.

(c) That the amount of linseed oil required by the United Kingdom manufacturers for paint, varnish, and linoleum will be about 70,000 tons a year.

(d) That the soap and candle makers of the United Kingdom who have had to use considerably more palm oil than before the War will continue to do so to a large extent.

As regards the requirements of the rest of the British Empire and of the Allies, it has not been possible for us to arrive at any satisfactory estimate, and it is desirable that the Government of each part of the Empire should proceed to examine the question for that country and inform His Majesty's Government of the result.

The probable requirements of the Allied countries also need to be ascertained as far as they can be in present circumstances. The War has caused changes in the quantities and kinds of oils used in various countries. Some of these changes will probably be maintained to a considerable extent after the War. Accordingly, neither imports before the War nor imports during the War form altogether a safe guide for estimating post-War requirements.

6. The Problem.

The principal problems to be solved may be summed up as follows:—

- (1) How to secure for the British Empire and the Allies the required amounts of those oils of which there will probably be a world shortage for a time. These will probably be coco-nut and palm-kernel oil, and may to a lesser extent include cotton-seed and ground-nut oils and linseed oil.
- (2) How far a world shortage of the above-mentioned oils, and the consequent demand of other countries for other oils as substitutes, will render it necessary to extend the control of Empire supplies to other oils and oil seeds.
- (3) What form of control should be adopted in the case of those oil seeds or oils which it is ultimately found to be necessary to control, and how a fair price can be secured to the producers within the Empire who in many cases have suffered considerably during the War, since, in consequence of war restrictions on exportation and on the use of shipping, the prices paid in the country of production have been a good deal below pre-War prices in spite of the high prices paid by consumers for that produce in the countries to which it was possible to export it.

PETROLEUM.

1. Uses.

PETROLEUM is used for fuel and as an illuminant; also it is the source of lubricants and motor spirit.

2 and 3. Sources of Supply and Output.

The following are the main figures of production (in metric tons) for the year 1911:—

	Production.	Per cent. of total.
United States ...	29,393,252	63.80
Russia ...	9,066,259	19.16
Galicia ...	1,458,275	3.04
Eastern Archipelago ...	1,670,668	3.52
Roumania ...	1,544,072	3.21
British India ...	897,184	1.87
Mexico ...	1,875,522	4.07
Japan ...	221,187	0.48
Peru ...	186,405	0.40
Germany ...	140,000	0.29
Canada ...	38,813	0.08
Italy ...	10,000	0.02
Hungary ...	—	—
Other countries ...	26,667	0.06

4. Present Position.

Since 1911 the output of the United States has increased both absolutely and relatively. The United States output for 1915 was about sixty-six per cent. of the world's production. The output of Mexico has enormously increased; in 1916 it was 5,300,000 metric tons, or 8.6 per cent. of the world's production.

New sources have been opened under British control in Egypt and in Persia. The Egyptian output for 1916 was, however, only 55,000 metric tons. Production in Trinidad rose to 133,000 metric tons. But these and other developments have not materially altered the petroleum position within the Empire. The total production from Empire sources in 1917 was under three per cent. of the world's production. The greater part of the Empire supplies was produced in India.

Potential sources of supply exist in western Canada, New Brunswick, Newfoundland, New Zealand, and New Guinea.

5. Requirements of the British Empire.

The following are the chief figures of domestic requirements (additional to any supplies locally produced) in the principal consuming countries of the Empire:—

Canada: 27,000,000 gallons (imports of all petroleum products in 1913).

Australia: 19,000,000 gallons (of kerosene, 1913 figures).

South Africa: 18,000,000 gallons (of lubricating oil, paraffin, and motor spirit, figures of 1913).

New Zealand: not distinguished from other oils in the trade returns.

India: 66,000,000 gallons (of kerosene, figures of 1913).

United Kingdom: 390,000,000 gallons (of all petroleum products, figures of 1913).

6. The Problem.

So far as the period of reconstruction is concerned, there is nothing which can be done to alter the main facts of our position. With regard to eventual developments, the problems appear to be:—

- (1) What measures can be taken to promote the exploitation of the proved but undeveloped petroleum fields within the Empire?
- (2) Whether it is desirable and possible to secure for Government purposes (as has already been done in Trinidad and New Zealand) an option over the supplies produced from British sources, or to reserve specified oil-bearing areas to be developed for naval and military requirements?
- (3) Whether it is advisable that, as in the Colonies and Protectorates, all prospecting for, boring, and getting of oil on Crown lands should be made subject to Government licence?
- (4) What steps can be taken to provide that the petroleum output of the Empire shall be refined within the Empire?

COPPER.

1. Uses.

ABOUT two-thirds of the world's copper production is absorbed in the electrical industry (viz., in production of dynamos, cables, etc.). Another great use of it is in the marine locomotive and general engineering industries; a large number of copper alloys, particularly brass, bronze, and German or nickel silver, are of great importance in industry and art.

2. Sources of Supply.

Prior to the War the United States of America produced nearly fifty-five per cent. of the world's output of copper ore (measured by smelted contents), which was in the neighbourhood of 1,000,000 tons per annum. Smaller sources of supply were Japan, Spain, Australia, Russia, Canada, Mexico, Germany, Chile, Peru, Bolivia, and the Belgian Congo.

Since the War production has increased largely, and the world's output was estimated at 1,400,000 tons in 1916, of which the United States produced sixty-two per cent. The output of Japan has also increased; another source of supply which is developing rapidly is the Katanga Mines (Belgian Congo).

3. Output.

In smelter production of copper the United States produced nearly sixty per cent. of the world's output in 1913, as will be seen from the table below:—

	Copper ore production (smelted contents). Tons.	Smelter production of copper. Tons.
United States	548,000	580,000
Japan	72,000	75,000
Mexico, Chile, Peru, and Bolivia ...	120,000	88,500*
Spain	50,000	23,000
Russia	42,000	34,000
Germany	25,000	40,000
Australia	46,500	41,000
Canada	34,000	14,000
United Kingdom	400	51,000
Estimated world total	990,000	985,000

This table indicates:—

- (a) That the three principal smelting centres within the Empire were the United Kingdom, Canada, and Australia.
- (b) That the United Kingdom was mainly dependent on outside sources for the content of its smelted copper. In fact both the copper ores and the regulus, precipitate, etc., which it imported came largely from foreign sources.
- (c) That Canadian copper ore went largely outside Canada for refining.

Since the War copper refining has been developed in Canada, but not in the United Kingdom.

4. Present Position.

The salient feature of the copper position, so far as the British Empire is concerned, is the small proportion of its copper supplies obtained from within its limits. The smelting capacity of the United States is now estimated at some 1,000,000 tons per annum, with possibilities of further increase. Its exports of copper of all kinds have averaged nearly 400,000 tons per annum for the period 1913-17. So far as the United Kingdom is concerned its smelting capacity, as has been shown, is limited. Its pre-War consumption of refined copper was about 120,000 tons per annum, of which only some 33,500 tons originated within the Empire.

Since the War its consumption has increased largely, but, owing to the favourable purchasing arrangements made for United States copper, its smelting capacity has not similarly increased.

His Majesty's Government has now taken over all the copper supply of Great Britain, and, amongst other things, has, during the last two years, purchased the whole of the exportable surplus of refined copper from Australia.

5. Requirements of the British Empire.

The requirements of the various parts of the British Empire for refined copper after the War may be estimated at about 180,000 tons in all per annum, of which the United Kingdom will need, say, 150,000 tons.

6. The Problem.

There is no cause to expect an acute shortage of supplies after the War, even after allowing for arrears of civilian consumption, provided that tonnage is available for the prompt shipment of supplies from the producing to the consuming industries. But, since more than one-half of the world's output is refined in the United States, there is a danger that the United Kingdom may become unduly dependent on one source of supply. The problem before the British Empire may be said to concern all the Governments, in so far as it depends on securing within the Empire adequate supplies of copper, so as to ensure that it shall not be unduly dependent on other sources. In particular the following points suggest themselves:—

* The 1912 figure was 104,000, made up of: Mexico 44,000, Chile 25,000, and other South America 35,000.

- (1) How can the United Kingdom secure sufficient raw material from within the British Empire to justify the erection of a refinery large enough to compete economically with the large existing plants in foreign countries? This might, of course, involve the provision of special shipping facilities.
- (2) What steps can be taken to promote copper production in other parts of the Empire (particularly in Canada, Australia, and the Union of South Africa) where there exist possibilities of development?
- (3) In the case of Canada, are steps possible to secure a larger proportion of her exports of copper, copper regulus, etc., within the British Empire; also, are further means available of expanding her smelting and refining industry?
- (4) In the case of Australia, is it possible to find full employment for her copper refineries, which are said to have a capacity of 20,000 tons in excess of her actual output?

LEAD AND ITS ORES.

1. Uses.

The main uses of lead are for cable and accumulator making, ammunition, roofing, chemical plant, paints, alloys, and for pipes, sheets, etc., for the building trade.

2. Sources of Supply.

Prior to the War—

- (1) Well over four-fifths of the world's annual output of lead ore was mined in five countries, viz., the United States, Australia, Spain, Mexico, and Germany.
- (2) Nearly nine-tenths of the world's output of smelted or refined lead was produced in the same five countries, with the addition of Belgium.

3. Output.

The output of (1) lead ore, (2) smelted or refined lead (in terms of metallic lead contents), may be seen from the following table:—

	Lead ore produced (metallic lead contents).		Output of metallic (smelted or refined) lead.
	1912. Tons.		1912. Tons.	1913. Tons.
United States ...	371,000		381,000*	401,000*
Australia ...	214,000		112,000	114,000
Spain ...	167,000		229,000	200,000
Mexico ...	198,000		108,000	61,000
			(exports)
Germany ...	76,000		189,000	178,000
Belgium ...	Insignificant		54,000	50,000
Estimated world total	1,120,000		1,200,000	1,170,000

It should be noted that the Commonwealth smelted only about half its lead concentrates, the other half going to Germany, Belgium, the Netherlands, and Austria-Hungary.

The following were the rough pre-War (1912) proportions of lead in ore and smelted or refined lead produced respectively by Empire, Allies, neutrals, and enemy territories:—

	Lead in ore. per cent.	Smelted or refined lead. per cent.
Empire ...	23	13
Allies, etc. ...	41½	41
Neutrals ...	25	28
Enemy territories ...	10½	18
	100	100

* Excluding lead refined from Mexican silver-lead bullion.

4. Present Position.

The United States, since the War, has increased its output, which is now in the neighbourhood of 550,000 tons per annum of smelted or refined lead. As regards the Empire, its consumption of metallic lead averaged about 232,000 tons per annum before the War, made up as follows:—

United Kingdom ...	179,000 tons.
Canada ...	22,000 "
Australia ...	9,500 "
Other Empire ...	1,000 "

The lead smelted and refined within the Empire from Empire ores represented some seventy-three per cent. of its requirements. The ore produced within the Empire was, however, sufficient to cover all its requirements in the way of metallic lead.

Since the War, owing to the Australian policy of encouraging local smelting of its silver-lead concentrates and refining of the resulting bullion, and as a consequence of developments in Canada and Burmah, the production of smelted or refined lead within the Empire should be more than sufficient to cover its requirements. The Australian smelters alone are estimated to have a capacity of 200,000 tons of metallic lead per annum. The Board of Trade is understood to be negotiating with the Australian producing companies for the purchase of their exportable surplus for a period of years.

5. Requirements of the British Empire.

The requirements of the United Kingdom after the War may be estimated at well over 200,000 tons of metallic lead per annum. To this should be added those of Canada, Australia, and the rest of the Empire, which will amount, perhaps, to 40,000 tons.

6. The Problem.

It is believed that the United Kingdom and those of the Allies whose supplies are not fully assured (especially Italy and Japan, which need about 16,000 tons apiece) will easily absorb the whole Australian output. The needs of the United States are covered by domestic production. Those of France are covered owing to her control of the Penarroya mines in Spain. Further measures, however, appear to be called for if the Empire is to be self-sufficient and also capable of assisting the Allies in respect of lead. The main problems seem to be as follows:—

- (1) In the United Kingdom the smelting industry has hitherto depended upon ores imported from Australia and various foreign countries, to the extent of thirty to fifty per cent. of its total production of metallic lead. Australian supplies will be cut off as a consequence of the new Australian policy, and it is desirable that alternative Empire sources of supply should be found and conserved. Similarly, the lead refining industry of the United Kingdom will require any silver-lead that can be obtained from Empire sources. What steps can be taken to develop the necessary alternative Empire supplies? (It is understood that a suggestion has been made by the Ministry of Reconstruction that a minimum price of £18 per ton should be guaranteed for ten years for all pig lead produced in the United Kingdom from British ores.)
- (2) In British Burmah the Burmah Corporation is beginning to produce on an important scale (present output of metallic lead estimated at 16,000 tons per annum). Is it desirable that whatever terms are offered by the Board of Trade to the Australian producers should also be offered to the Burmah Corporation? This course has, we understand, been recommended by the Ministry of Reconstruction.
- (3) In Canada lead is produced at the rate of about 17,000 tons per annum, but the actual consumption is estimated at 23,000 tons. Lately Canada has exported some ores to the United States and has imported metallic lead from the States. Is it possible for Canada to become self-sufficing as regards lead supplies?

MANGANESE.1. Uses.

The chief uses of manganese ore are in connexion with the steel industries, in the form of the alloys known as ferro-manganese and spiegeleisen.

2. Sources of Supply.

The main sources of production were, in 1913:—

India	683,000 tons.
Russia	1,000,000 "
Brazil	120,000 "

3. Output.

Since the beginning of the War the Russian output has been negligible, the Indian output has been reduced by thirty-four per cent.; but the Brazilian output has enormously increased (495,000 tons in 1916). The Gold Coast is at present producing about 36,000 tons a year, but the output is to be considerably increased in the near future. Australia produces a small amount of high-grade ore, which is utilized locally for the most part. Small quantities have been obtained from South Africa.

4. Present Position and Prospects.

The following table shows the quantities imported in 1913 by each of the four great consumers from the three chief centres of production.

	(In tons.)
	From India.	From Russia.	From Brazil.
United Kingdom	309,000	242,000	19,000
United States of America	142,000	124,000	70,000
France	86,000	134,000	7,000
Germany	178,000	447,000	22,000

These quantities were above the average, owing to the low freights of 1913. The average pre-War imports of the United Kingdom, for example, were 450,000 tons as against 600,000 tons in 1913.

During the War the United Kingdom has come to rely almost entirely upon Indian ores, and the United States upon Brazilian ores. In 1916 the United Kingdom imported (for private account) 421,000 tons of Indian ores, which was little less than the whole Indian output for that year; while the United States took 472,000 tons of Brazilian ores out of a total output of 495,000 tons.

The situation to be expected after the War is that:—

- Germany* will take the main output of the Chiaturi (Russian) mines, which is about 900,000 tons per annum. It is reasonable to suppose that the German iron and steel masters will set to work to build up their depleted stocks of these ores, and that their annual consumption will be abnormal for some time after the War.
- The United States will rely mainly on Brazil; they may also undertake the development of the Mexican deposits, which are reputed to be the richest in the world. But this development will take time; and, till the Mexican or other supplies are developed, the United States will absorb the main Brazilian output.
- The United Kingdom, France, and Belgium (which was a small consumer) will rely mainly upon India. The united demands of the three countries for Indian ores in the first year after peace will be from 350,000 to 400,000 tons, and may eventually rise to 900,000 tons.

5. Requirements of the British Empire.

Canada is likely to require after the War 23,000 tons of spiegeleisen and ferro-manganese (of which 10,000 tons are locally produced).

United Kingdom requirements are uncertain, but probably 450,000 tons.

6. The Problem.

There is no urgent problem which affects the Dominions in connexion with manganese. Though the Indian production has fallen to a little over 400,000 tons, India should have no difficulty in meeting the demands of the United Kingdom, France, and Belgium in the twelve months after peace.

The United Kingdom and the European Allies may find it convenient to derive a part of their supplies from sources nearer at hand than India, if there is a shortage of shipping after the War. High-grade ores are obtainable from the Gold Coast (up to 100,000 tons per annum) and low-grade ores from the Sinai Peninsula. These sources are likely to be valuable in the future if India decides to use her own manganese in developing her own iron and steel industries.

Australia appears to be self-sufficient in respect of manganese; and the small quantity of ores which Canada requires to import can probably be obtained most economically through the United States.

The main problems affecting the British Empire appear therefore to be:—

- (1) In what manner could the Governments of India and the Gold Coast regulate exports after the War, so as to render secure the requirements of other parts of the British Empire and the Allies?
- (2) In what way can Canada best secure the amount which she is likely to require?

NICKEL (Refined and Matte).1. Uses.

NICKEL is used in a large number of non-ferrous alloys and as a protecting and hardening cover for articles made of other metals. Nickel steel is largely used for armour plating and structural work. It is also used for coinage.

2. Sources of Supply.

Of the total supply of nickel ore in the world Canada produces about seventy per cent.; New Caledonia contributes the greater part of the remainder. Minor sources of supply are Norway, Madagascar, the United States, Australia, and South Africa.

3. Output.

The output of metallic nickel (refined from nickel ore and matte) for the period 1909-13 averaged 24,000 tons a year and was steadily increasing. Of this the United States produced about 12,000 tons, England and Germany about 5,000 tons each, and France and others smaller quantities.

4. Present Position.

The Canadian nickel deposits have been, hitherto, mainly in the hands of two companies, viz., the Mond Nickel Company and the Canadian Copper Company, the latter being a subsidiary of the International Nickel Company of New York. These companies owned the mines and roasted and smelted the ore locally into matte, usually containing about eighty per cent. of nickel and copper (the actual contents vary, but roughly average two of nickel to one of copper).

Before the War nickel was not extracted from the matte in Canada. The Mond Nickel Company sent the matte to its works in South Wales for refining and separation. The Canadian Copper Company, which dealt with larger quantities than the Mond Company, sent its matte to New Jersey for refining.

Since the War the Canadian Copper Company has started a refinery of its own at Port Colborne, Ontario. Also another company, called the British America Nickel Corporation, has started operations in Ontario, and, when its plant is complete, will carry out refining there.

Part of the present supplies of nickel ore for the United Kingdom come from New Caledonia to a company called the Société le Nickel.

It should be remembered that Germany and Austria-Hungary consume eight to ten thousand tons of nickel per annum and produce practically none.

5. Requirements of the British Empire.

Setting aside the amount required locally in Canada, the main demand for nickel within the Empire is likely to come from the United Kingdom and to be in the neighbourhood of 14,000 to 15,000 tons of refined nickel per annum.

Two of the companies operating in the British Empire, namely, the Mond Nickel Company and the Société le Nickel, are expected to be capable of producing 13,800 tons of refined nickel per annum after the War as soon as tonnage is available for importing the necessary ores. To this has to be added the amount produced by the refining of the Canadian Copper Company at Port Colborne, of which particulars are not yet available.

Further supplies for the Empire are assured by an agreement with the British America Nickel Corporation under which His Majesty's Government has a controlling interest in the Corporation.

6. The Problem.

The problem before the Empire of securing command of adequate supplies of nickel for itself and the Allies appears to be a comparatively simple one and mainly to affect Canada. It may be described under the following heads:—

- (1) How to ensure that adequate supplies of Canadian nickel ore shall always be available to meet the Empire's requirements.
- (2) How to assist the Allies who are in need of Canadian nickel. Their requirements are not at present known, but it may be assumed that the largest demand will come from the United States.
- (3) Whether it is desirable to enter into an agreement between His Majesty's Government, Canada, the United States, and France to pursue a common policy respecting the sale of nickel and its ores.
- (4) Whether, if this policy is carried out, it is desirable for Canada to restrict the exportation to oversea destinations of nickel and its ores by means of export licences.

SPELTER AND ZINC CONCENTRATES.

1. Uses.

THE galvanizing industry accounts for the largest proportion of the world's production of metallic zinc (known commercially as spelter). A good deal is used in the composition of brass, whilst other minor uses of the metal are for rolled zinc sheets, plates, and rods, zinc dust (used in gold extraction and in the dyeing and textile industries), and zinc oxide and lithopone, used largely as pigments.

2 and 3. Sources of Supply and Output.

Before the War three-quarters of the annual zinc ore production of the world (measured by spelter content) were produced in three countries (the United States, Germany, and Australia), and four-fifths of the metallic zinc was also produced in three countries, viz., the United States, Germany, and Belgium.

The following table shows the position:—

	Zinc ore production.		Spelter production.
	(Spelter contents.)		1912.	1913.
	Tons.		Tons.	Tons.
United States	289,000	310,000	315,000
Germany	237,000	267,000	279,000
Australia	197,000	2,300	3,500
French possessions	63,000	—	—
Belgium	insignificant	197,000	195,000
France	14,000	62,000	67,000
Spain	60,000	8,000	8,000
Italy	56,000	—	4,000
United Kingdom	6,000	56,000	58,000
Estimated world total	1,000,000	960,000	985,000

Austria-Hungary smelted 19,000 tons of metal, and produced ores containing 7,000 tons of metal in 1913.

The principal points deserving notice in connexion with the industry before the War are:—

- (a) That practically the whole of the Australian output of zinc concentrates went to Germany and Belgium for treatment.
- (b) That a very large proportion of the spelter produced in the United Kingdom was smelted from imported foreign ores. In addition the United Kingdom imported a large amount of spelter from Germany and Belgium.
- (c) That the output of spelter in Europe was controlled by the Spelter Convention under German domination.

4. Present Position.

Since the War the dominant features of the position have been:—

- (a) The development of the United States' plant for spelter production. The present production is at the rate of 540,000 tons per annum; and the pre-War consumption in the United States of America was 315,000 tons per annum.
- (b) The action taken by the Commonwealth Government to free the Australian industry from German control.
- (c) The arrangements by which His Majesty's Government have contracted to buy from the Commonwealth Government (1) the greater part of the existing stocks of concentrates and slimes in Australia; (2) the whole exportable surplus from 1st January, 1918, until twelve months after the War up to 250,000 tons per annum; (3) and for nine years thereafter the whole exportable surplus up to 300,000 tons per annum.
- (d) The development of the zinc-refining industry in Canada (British Columbia) and in Japan, which has now an output of about 40,000 tons per annum.

5. Requirements of the British Empire.

The post-War spelter requirements of the British Empire may be estimated at 200,000 tons.

6. The Problem.

Owing to the enormous increase of spelter production in the United States since the War there is a possibility that, after the War, there may be a period of satiety in the international market, in other words, over-production. But the future of the United States' industry is extremely problematical. Production will continue to decline sharply if the present downward movement of prices continues.

The problem before the British Empire appears likely to take the following forms:—

- (1) How to encourage the production of spelter within its own limits. The supplies of zinc ore and concentrates appear to be sufficient, assuming they can be refined within the Empire.
In view of the purchases by His Majesty's Government of Australian zinc concentrates, it will clearly be necessary to arrange for the erection of refining works in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, and it is understood that steps to that end are being taken, as well as to encourage local refining in Australia.
- (2) How to protect the spelter industry from foreign competition. It is understood that the view prevalent amongst a considerable section of the trade is that expenditure of money on the erection of refining plant is hazardous unless there is some protection against dumping.
- (3) Assuming there is an accumulation of zinc concentrates in Australia after the War on account of His Majesty's Government through lack of tonnage to export them, how can these concentrates best be utilized? It has been suggested that they might be temporarily treated in Belgium or Holland or Sweden or Norway, conditionally upon the metal being shipped to the United Kingdom. Of the four countries suggested Holland alone is likely to be equipped for the immediate handling of Australian concentrates after the War.
- (4) Whether it is desirable to take early steps to secure that adequate supplies of spelter (140,000 to 160,000 tons per annum) will be available from Canada (where special steps have been taken by the Government to encourage the development of the industry), the United States, and Japan for the use of Empire industries in the reconstruction period.

TIN AND ITS ORES.

1. Uses.

TIN is very largely used for the manufacture of tin-plate for industrial purposes. It is also used for bearing metal for railways, for solder making, metal mixing, tin oxide, white metal, etc.

2 and 3. Sources of Supply and Output.

Prior to the War ninety-nine per cent. of the world's tin ore was produced in nine countries.

The output of these countries was as follows (in terms of metallic tin contents):—

	1912	1913.	War period.
	Tons.	Tons.	1915.	1916.
			Tons.	Tons.
Empire—
Federated Malay States	48,000	50,000	47,000	44,000
			(exports)	(exports)
Australia	7,800	8,000	—	—
United Kingdom	5,300	5,000	5,000	4,700
Nigeria	4,000	4,000	4,800	—
South Africa	1,800	2,200	2,100	2,000
Foreign—
Bolivia	23,000	26,000	25,000	—
Dutch East Indies	20,000	—	13,000*	—
China	9,000	8,000	—	—
Siam	7,000	—	—	—

In 1913 the world's production of smelted tin was 127,000 tons. The production of smelted tin in the Empire from Empire ores was about 81,500 tons, or sixty-five per cent. of the world's output, and from all ores about 93,000 tons, or seventy-three per cent. of the world's output.

The chief smelting centres in the British Empire are the Straits Settlements, the United Kingdom, and Australia. A considerable proportion of the tin ore smelted in the United Kingdom comes from Bolivia, and some of that smelted in the Straits Settlements from the Dutch East Indies and China.

4. Present Position.

The estimated consumption of metallic tin within the British Empire is under thirty-eight per cent. of its production, viz.:—

United Kingdom	30,000 tons.
Canada	2,400 "
New Zealand	250 "
Egypt	250 "
India	2,300 "
Total	35,200 "

The demand for metallic tin in the United States is, however, enormous, and is likely to absorb some 80,000 tons per annum. In view of post-War demands from other sources, and particularly those from Germany and Austria, there is likely to be a tin shortage after the War.

Smelting within the Empire appears to be adequately secured by the differential export duties on ore sent from the Federated Malay States and Nigeria for smelting elsewhere than within the Empire.

During the War there has been close control over Empire tin. This control centres in the United Kingdom in the Rubber and Tin Exports Committee, working in close consultation with the Ministry of Munitions, on the advice of which licences to export tin from the United Kingdom and the Crown Colonies are granted.

5. Requirements of the British Empire.

The maximum requirements of the British Empire after the War may be taken as 40,000 tons of metallic tin per annum.

6. The Problem.

The supplies of tin available within the Empire are more than sufficient to provide for its requirements after the War, if measures are taken to conserve them for this purpose, but they are not sufficient to meet the requirements both of the Empire and the Allies, owing mainly to the enormous demand for tin in the United States.

* From Government mines only.

The main problems for the Empire appear to be:—

- (1) How to reserve sufficient supplies for the requirements of the Empire from
 - (a) the United Kingdom output (24,000-31,000 tons);
 - (b) the Straits output (60,000 tons);
 - (c) the Australian output (2,500 tons).
- (2) Whether it is desirable, with this object in view, and also that of providing as far as possible for the Allies' requirements, to make licences necessary for the export of tin ore and metallic tin from the various parts of the Empire. Such licensing would affect mainly the United Kingdom, Australia, South Africa, the Straits Settlements and Federated Malay States, and Nigeria.
- (3) Whether it is feasible to devise a system of allocating the available Empire supplies amongst the Allies. If so, on what terms?

TUNGSTEN ORES.

1. Uses.

TUNGSTEN is used for the filaments of electric lamps, and, as a component of ferro-tungsten, in the manufacture of high-speed steel.

2 and 3. Sources of Supply and Output.

The principal sources of tungsten ores are the United States, Federated Malay States, Burmah, Portugal, Japan, Australia, and New Zealand. The figures of production in 1913 and 1916 were (in long tons):—

	1913.	1916.
Burmah	1,704	4,057
Straits	—	1,036 (1917)
Queensland	532	787
New South Wales	206	144
New Zealand	266	295
United Kingdom	179	344

The world's output of tungsten ores, which was only 7,500 tons in 1913, rose to 18,500 tons in 1916, and is to-day about 20,500 tons. This great increase is largely due to the high prices created by war demands. It is anticipated that the production of ores will materially diminish after the War.

4. Present Position

The United Kingdom tungsten industry is at present handling all the ores produced within the Empire, and also foreign ores to the extent of 1,000 or 1,500 tons per annum. It has a capacity of 10,000 tons of ores. The United States' industry requires, during the War, about 8,000 tons of ores, the French industry 3,400 tons.

These requirements will almost certainly be reduced after the War. It is expected, for example, that the United Kingdom industry will not require, for its home and export trade, more than 3,500 tons of ores. Germany will be in the market for ores; but the United Kingdom was the best customer of the German tungsten maker before the War; and it is estimated that, of the 3,600 tons of imported ores which Germany annually consumed before the War, two-thirds were used for the purposes of the export trade to the United Kingdom. On this estimate the requirements of Germany after the War should not exceed 1,200 tons of ores. The Ministry of Munitions is committed to the purchase of all Empire ores until six months after the War. Therefore, up to that time, the effect of German competition will not be felt in the tungsten ore markets of the Empire.

5. Requirements of the British Empire.

The United Kingdom tungsten industry is expected to require from 3,000 to 3,500 tons of tungsten ores per annum. The requirements of the Dominions and India for tungsten and its alloys have not been ascertained.

6. The Problem.

The main question is how to maintain the tungsten industry of the United Kingdom on such a scale that it can supply Empire industries with their full requirements of tungsten and tungsten alloys. In connexion with this question the following questions arise as to the raw materials of the industry:—

- (1) Whether, in view of the military importance of the industry, it is not essential that the industry should be independent of ores of non-Empire origin?
- (2) Whether the estimated post-War requirements of the industry (from 3,000 to 3,500 tons of ores per annum) are adequately secured by long contracts with Empire producers, by the possession on the part of the manufacturers of controlling interests in Empire mines, or by any other kind of private arrangement?
- (3) If the answer to (2) be in the negative, is it desirable that His Majesty's Government should offer to prolong the existing system of purchase (which will expire six months after the end of the War)? Or, failing such an arrangement, is it advisable that the Governments of the tungsten-producing parts of the Empire should themselves take steps to give the tungsten manufacturers of the Empire a first option at current market prices?
- (4) Is it, in any case, desirable that exports of tungsten ore, and the destinations of export, should be registered by the Empire Governments concerned?
- (5) Should efforts be made to give those of our Allies who manufacture tungsten and its alloys a first call on any surplus of Empire tungsten ores which is available for export from the Empire?

MICA.

1. Uses.

Mica is used as a dielectric and insulating material in the electro-technical industries; as a lubricant; also as a substitute for glass where heat-resisting power is imperative.

2. Sources of Supply.

Actual.—British India, Canada, United States of America, Guatemala, Mexico, Brazil.

Potential.—Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Central Africa, Ceylon

3. Output.

The pre-War average exports from the chief producing countries were:—

India, 49,000 cwts. (chiefly muscovite, or white mica).
Canada, 7,000 cwts. (chiefly phlogopite, or amber mica).
United States of America, 2,920 cwts.

4. Present Position.

There is a shortage, although Germany, formerly the second in importance of the consuming nations, is out of the market. Consumption has increased enormously in the United States of America, and France is taking about 14,000 cwts per annum, whereas, before the War, she was not a large consumer. Before the War the main available supplies were distributed as follows:—

Net Imports, 1913.

United States of America ...	29,000 cwts.
Germany ...	23,600 cwts.
United Kingdom ...	19,700 cwts.

Practically the whole of the United States imports, and over ninety per cent. of the German imports, were derived from the British Empire. Nevertheless, Hamburg was beginning to supplant London as the chief market for this material. During the War the market has returned to London.

5. Requirements of the British Empire.

The United Kingdom will require not less than the net imports of 1913, 19,700 cwts. The requirements of the rest of the Empire have not yet been ascertained.

6. The Problem.

The future of mica depends mainly on that of the electro-technical and allied industries. It is thought that the demand, which was growing before the War, will continue to grow after the War, and that the owners of mica deposits will be inclined to hold up supplies in the expectation of a rise. In view of the demand which is to be expected from German manufacturers immediately after the War, a temporary shortage is extremely probable. It is very desirable that the interests of the electro-technical industries within the Empire should be protected. From this point of view the problems to be considered are:—

- (1) Whether India can do anything to conserve an adequate proportion of her output for the use of Empire industries.
- (2) Whether the present policy of the Ministry of Munitions in financing new producers in India can advantageously be extended.
- (3) What steps, if any, can be taken to increase the present sources of supply within the Empire and to develop commercially new sources in other parts of the Empire, particularly in Australia and New Zealand, where deposits of exceptional quality are said to exist.

MOLYBDENITE.

1. Uses.

MOLYBDENITE is required for the manufacture of ferro-molybdenum, an alloy used in the manufacture of armour plate, of gun and rifle barrels, and (to a limited extent) of high-speed steel. Molybdic acid, and other salts of molybdenum, which are all prepared from molybdenite, are used in various chemical and industrial processes.

2 and 3. Sources of Supply and Output.

Molybdenite has been extracted in Australia (New South Wales and Queensland) on a commercial scale since 1902-3. The Australian output has diminished during the War. In 1916 it was only 113 tons of concentrates, as against 148 tons in 1913. In Canada (Quebec, Ontario, British Columbia) the mining of molybdenite on any considerable scale dates from 1915. The Canadian exports in 1916 amounted to 71 tons of concentrates. In Natal there are promising deposits which have not yet been exploited. Molybdenite occurs in New Zealand, but our information does not show whether these occurrences are of commercial value. Occurrences are also reported in Newfoundland, Hong Kong, and the Straits Settlements.

Outside the Empire the only country which has hitherto produced molybdenite on a considerable scale is Norway. The Norwegian output in 1913 was 12 tons; in 1916 it had risen to 100 tons. The United States at one time produced considerable quantities of molybdenum ores (795 short tons of wulfenite and molybdenite concentrates in 1903), but from that date till 1915 production was spasmodic. Since 1916 important deposits have been exploited in Colorado, but the amount of the annual output is not yet reported.

4 and 5. Present Position and Requirements of the British Empire.

Germany's imports of molybdenite were not separately recorded before the War. The use of molybdenite by German steel works has developed during the War owing to the scarcity of tungsten in Germany. The United States imported no molybdenite in 1915, and a negligible quantity in 1916; the amount of home production is uncertain. The United Kingdom at present is estimated to require from 60 to 70 tons of concentrates; the pre-War consumption is not recorded.

6. The Problem.

The annual output appears to be equal to present requirements, and the main problem appears to be how best to dispose of the Australian supplies.

If the demand for molybdenum under peace conditions remains constant (which is doubtful) it will become advisable to investigate closely all the recorded occurrences within the Empire, as the present sources of supply appear to be precarious.

COAL, WITH SPECIAL REFERENCE TO STEAM COAL.

1. Uses.

COAL is used as a fuel and source of power (steam and electric); it is the raw material from which coal gas, coal tar, and many valuable by-products are derived. British steam coal is particularly valuable as a fuel for marine and railway locomotive engines.

2 and 3. Sources of Supply and Output.

The following table shows, in millions of tons, the output of coal in the principal countries of the world in 1912:—

Country.	Millions of tons.	Country.	Millions of tons.
United Kingdom ...	118	Russia ...	26 (1911)
India ...	3.3	Germany ...	172
Canada ...	7.4	Belgium ...	22.6
Australia ...	4.4	France ...	39.7
New Zealand ...	2	Spain ...	3.6
South Africa ...	7.2	Austria ...	15.5
		Hungary ...	1.2 (1911)
		Japan ...	17.3 (1911)
		United States of America ...	447.2

As regards the coal fields of the British Empire, it may be noted that Canada imports more than she produces, that New Zealand and India are practically self-sufficient, and that Australia and South Africa are exporting countries.

Before the War the United Kingdom was the largest exporter of coal in the world, Germany coming second, and the United States third. In 1912 the gross exports of these countries were:—

Country	Tons.
United Kingdom:
Ordinary exports ...	67,000,000 (of which 35,000,000 were steam coal).
Bunkers supplied at British ports ...	18,250,000 (all steam coal).
Germany:
Ordinary exports and bunkers for German ships ...	31,000,000
Bunkers to foreign vessels at German ports, about ...	300,000
United States:
Ordinary exports ...	18,000,000
Bunkers supplied at United States ports ...	7,250,000

It should be noted that in 1912 Germany imported 10,000,000 tons, mainly from the United Kingdom.

Of the countries which were not self-sufficient in respect of coal, the following were the chief importers before the War:—

Country.	Millions of tons.	Country.	Millions of tons.
France ...	19	Sweden ...	5
Austria-Hungary ...	12	Denmark ...	3
Canada ...	12	Spain ...	2.5
Italy ...	10	Norway ...	2
Holland ...	7	Switzerland ...	2
Russia ...	6

4. Present Position.

During the War Germany has kept alive her export trade in coal to Austria-Hungary, Denmark, Sweden, Holland, and Switzerland. But the quantity of her exports is believed to have diminished by more than fifty per cent. Exports of coal from the United States increased gradually from 1912 up to the end of 1916; in 1916 they amounted to 23,000,000 tons. Exports of coal and coke from the United Kingdom in 1916 fell to 40,000,000 tons, as compared with 75,000,000 tons in 1913. But, owing to the increased prices due to the War, the value of the exports in 1916 was nearly equal to that of the 1913 exports. The reduction in the United Kingdom exports of large steam coal has been progressive during the War. Exports of this grade amounted to 37,000,000 tons in 1913, but fell as low as 17,000,000 tons in 1916.

5. Requirements of the British Empire.

As already shown, the United Kingdom, most of the Dominions, and India are either self-sufficient as regards coal supplies or do a large export trade. Canada is an exception, as she imports largely, though she has a small export trade as well. Her net requirements at present may be estimated at 12,000,000 tons per annum.

6. The Problem.

As regards the United Kingdom export trade the following problems will arise in the period of reconstruction after the War:—

- (1) How to restore the output to the pre-War level as quickly as possible? A Board of Trade Committee, reporting in 1917, estimated that if the War came to an end in August of that year twelve months would probably be required to make good the arrears of repairs and development in the coal pits; while if the War continued into 1918 the period of recovery would be considerably longer. To shorten the period of recovery is a matter of vital consequence to the export trade of the United Kingdom.
- (2) Until the coal fields of the United Kingdom are in a position to produce on the pre-War scale it may be necessary to consider the question of controlling coal exports, and particularly exports of steam coal, in order to ensure adequate supplies for other parts of the British Empire (in particular, for British coaling stations abroad), and for certain of our Allies. Exports of coal in 1913 from the United Kingdom to Belgium, France, Portugal, Italy, and the Colonial possessions of these Powers amounted to 27½ million tons; exports to Empire destinations (including Egypt) in the same year were 5½ million tons. If it is expected that our Allies should be supplied after the War on the same scale as in 1913 the quantities of coal which will be available for export from the United Kingdom to neutral countries in the reconstruction period will be very small, probably not much more than 5,000,000 tons, which is about the quantity that the United Kingdom supplied in 1913 to Brazil and the Argentine. Under these circumstances it may be necessary to consider the question of rationing exports to the Allies and the more important neutral markets.
- (3) Some time will probably elapse before the stocks of coal at the main British coaling stations overseas will be restored to their normal level. In 1913 the United Kingdom exported the following quantities of steam coal to the principal stations:—

Egyptian ports ...	1,000,000 tons (estimated)
Malta ...	562,000 ..
Gibraltar ...	279,000 ..
Aden ...	181,000 ..
Ceylon ...	238,000 ..
India ...	172,000 ..

The question may well arise whether, until exports can be resumed to these stations on the old scale, their bunker facilities ought not to be reserved for vessels engaged in trades useful to the Empire and the Allies.

As regards the Dominions the questions which arise appear to be:—

- (4) Whether their coal resources have yet been adequately explored, and whether further developments would be desirable in the near future. This problem is receiving the careful consideration of the Government.
- (5) Whether those Dominions which possess important coaling stations may find it necessary to reserve their supplies of bunker coal for vessels engaged in trade on account of the Empire or the Allies.

ALUMINIUM ORES.

1. Uses.

ALUMINIUM is a light metal of considerable strength, and is used largely for army equipment (machine-guns, shell fuses, and shell steel), as well as for submarines and aircraft. It has also many industrial uses, e.g., in the gold and silver mining industries, milking machinery, cooking utensils, and many other articles in daily domestic use. It is also necessary for the production of certain alloys of great commercial importance.

2 and 3. Sources of Supply and Output.

There are four aluminium ores: bauxite, cryolite, corundum, and china clay. Roughly speaking, however, the only ore used is bauxite. The quantity of bauxite necessary to produce one ton of aluminium is about four tons.

Before the War practically the whole supply of bauxite was mined in France and in the United States, Ireland, Italy, and India making very small contributions to the total output.

The following is a table of the world's production of bauxite.

World's Production, 1912-1916, in long tons.

India ...	950	0.2	1,184	0.2	514	876	*
Total ...	427,961	—	530,862	—	—	—	—

* Statistics not available.

Since the War new sources of supply have been developed. The German-Swiss factories obtain adequate supplies (though of an inferior grade of ore) from Silesia, Hungary, and Dalmatia. Large concessions have been taken up in British Guiana and India. But France and the United States still remain the chief sources of bauxite. Practically all the output of the United States is consumed locally, except a small export to Canada for refining. France does a large export trade. All the United Kingdom output is consumed locally, and there is considerable importation as well.

4. Present Position.

The aluminium industry of the world is concentrated in the hands of a small number of companies, the chief being:—

(a) The American-Canadian group, with an annual output of 75,000 tons of aluminium.

This is controlled by the Aluminium Company of America, which works in Canada through a subsidiary company, the Northern Aluminium Company of Canada, with works at the Shawinigan Falls (P.Q.).

The latter company has taken up bauxite concessions in British Guiana, and is bound by its contract to erect, within seven years, on British territory, works capable of extracting 4,000 tons of aluminium per annum from these ores.

The output of this group is considered capable of great expansion.

(b) The French group, having works in France with a capacity of 20,000 tons, and in Norway with a capacity of 10,000 tons, per annum.

(c) The German group, having works in Switzerland and Austria, with an estimated capacity of 20,000 tons per annum.

(d) The British group, consisting of the British Aluminium Company and the Aluminium Corporation, having works in the United Kingdom which produced 7,000 tons of aluminium in 1916 and 10,000 tons in 1917. The former company also controls two Norwegian factories, with an output of 4,600 tons per annum.

5. Requirements of the British Empire.

The present requirements of the United Kingdom are now estimated at 72,000 tons of imported bauxite per annum: before the War they were 40,000 tons per annum. The United Kingdom is at present much the largest consumer of aluminium within the Empire.

6. The Problem.

The output of aluminium metal in the United Kingdom and Canada is much more than sufficient to cover all Empire requirements. Though the United Kingdom at present imports about 11,000 tons of aluminium per annum from Canada, in normal times the production of the United Kingdom refiners (10,000 tons), and of the works which they control in Norway (4,600 tons), is considerably more than the pre-War consumption of the British Empire (12,000 tons*), and affords opportunities for a profitable export trade.

The position as to ores is not so satisfactory, and the following problems arise:—

- (1) The aluminium works of the United Kingdom depend almost entirely on French ores,† and the French Government is expected to impose an export duty after the War. It is for consideration whether, in negotiating with France about raw materials, some assurances should be obtained from France on this subject.
- (2) Whether it is possible to encourage the exploitation of bauxite in British Guiana, the Gold Coast Colony, and India. It is understood that, in order to compete with French bauxite, the ore must contain not less than fifty-eight per cent. alumina or more than three per cent. silica.
- (3) Whether it is desirable that the Northern Aluminium Company of Canada should be encouraged to make a larger use of bauxite of Imperial origin than at present. The Company is already under contract to produce 4,000 tons of aluminium per annum from British Guiana ores; but at least four-fifths of the Company's present output is derived from United States ores.

CONCLUSION.

In the foregoing account we have tried to set out the main facts of the situation relating to each raw material and the problems arising in each case.

It remains for us to sum up the position.

- (1) It is clear from the particulars given that it will be difficult for the Governments of the Empire to settle their post-War policy with regard to the various materials dealt with in Resolution III. (to which, as already indicated, we suggest that aluminium should be added) until they have some idea of the post-War requirements of the Allies. Only an inter-Allied Conference can provide the necessary estimates of such requirements. We understand that such a Conference will be held shortly.
- (2) The figures set out in this report as to the probable post-War requirements of the British Empire are, in our opinion, sufficiently accurate to serve as a basis for the British delegates, and we recommend that the latter should be empowered to use them at such a Conference.
- (3) Any decision as to the action to be taken must necessarily be left over until the Governments of the Empire have had the opportunity of considering this report in the light of their local conditions. But it seems desirable that these Governments should immediately begin consultation with the producers of, and traders in, the raw materials specified, as contemplated in Resolution IV. of the Conference.
- (4) It is clearly desirable that the Governments of the Dominions and India should inform His Majesty's Government of their views on the problems raised in this report, and in turn should be informed of the views of His Majesty's Government, at the earliest possible date. Matters will then be ripe for the determination of a general Imperial policy, and for any subsequent arrangements with the Allies which may be necessary in their interests and in the interests of the Empire.
- (5) It can be stated with some confidence that, assuming that the Governments of the Empire can obtain the necessary command over the raw materials with which we have dealt, so far as they are produced within the Empire, the Empire is in a strong position as regards the following:

Asbestos.
Cotton (fine)
Jute.
Wool.

* The United Kingdom consumed on an average 6,000 tons per annum. Canada, India, and other parts of the Empire consumed 6,000 tons.

† Irish bauxite is said to be of too low a grade to be utilized under competitive conditions.

Hides and skins.
Rubber.
Oleaginous products.
Manganese.
Nickel.
Zinc ores.
Tin.
Tungsten.
Mica.
Molybdenum.
Steam coal.

The Empire is not in a strong position as regards—

Copper.
Cotton (medium grades).
Petroleum
Spelter.
Aluminium ores.

As all these commodities are of first-class importance, and the first three are produced most largely in the United States of America, it will clearly be essential to obtain the co-operation of the latter in framing any definite policy.

Signed, on behalf of the Committee.

APPENDIX.

MEMORANDUM BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE.

I.

In order to secure, so far as practicable, a systematic policy and common action for the purpose of giving effect to the resolution of the Conference on the conservation of essential raw materials produced within the Empire, there should be established:—

- (a) A Central Raw Materials Board, meeting in the United Kingdom, charged with the duty of examining the position of each commodity of which it may be thought expedient to take command, with making recommendations as to the action which can most suitably be taken in each case, and with negotiating practical arrangements for the purpose to be submitted for ratification to the Governments concerned.
- (b) One or more Boards in each Dominion to co-operate with the Central Board and to advise their Governments.

II.

Action to secure control of adequate supplies for the purposes of the British Empire and the Allies might take any one of the following forms (though further examination by the Boards established under Section I. above might reveal other methods):—

- (1) Purchase of the whole exportable surplus of a given commodity by the United Kingdom Government alone, or in partnership with the Governments of the producing Dominions, or by a purchasing authority set up on their behalf.

To secure this it would be necessary for any Dominion Government concerned to have power to (1) requisition or (2) to prohibit export except under licence.

If it appeared impracticable for any particular Dominion Government to take such powers generally it might seek power to take such action only in cases where (a) the Government of the United Kingdom, either alone or in partnership with one or more of the other Governments of the Empire, had offered to purchase the whole exportable surplus of a material produced within the Dominion, and (b) the Government of the Dominion had agreed to the transaction and approved the proposed terms as reasonable.

An alternative course that might be suggested to the prohibition of export might be that, where the United Kingdom Government and the Dominion Government concerned were in agreement as to the terms of purchase, and the producers of the larger part of the output of the commodity in question were prepared to accept these terms, the Government of the Dominion should fix maximum prices (being the agreed price). The object of this would be to prevent those producers who had not accepted the proposed terms from selling abroad at higher prices, since the possibility of their doing so would naturally discourage the others from adhering to the agreement; but, on the other hand, it would be clearly understood that all producers, whether they had originally agreed or not, would be entitled to have their production purchased at the agreed price. (It appears doubtful, however, whether such a prohibition of sale abroad above the maximum price could be really made effective without some further measure of control of export.)

- (2) Simple contracts for the purchase of quantities less than the total exportable surplus, such contracts being entered into by (a) the United Kingdom Government, either alone or in partnership with a Dominion Government or Governments; or (b) some purchasing organization acting with Government sanction and under some form of Government control.

Such contracts, if they could be made on reasonable terms, would, pro tanto, secure the command of materials up to the amounts covered by the contracts without necessarily involving control of export or requisition. But the difficulty of making satisfactory contracts of this kind without the power of control in the background is obviously very formidable; and in any case command is secured of only a portion of the materials.

- (3) Prohibition of export except under licence, combined with a rationing scheme, without any scheme of purchase. This course may be found applicable to certain commodities, but as a general rule it is not likely to command assent.

Correspondence with Allied Governments.

(i)

Le Gouvernement Français vient d'inviter M. Paul Cambon à proposer au Gouvernement Britannique la réunion d'une Conférence Interalliée qui étudierait, en vue de la période de transition et de reconstitution économique qui suivra la guerre, l'établissement d'un programme de coopération relatif à la répartition des matières premières essentielles à l'Alimentation et à l'Industrie.

Cette réunion se proposerait de coordonner les travaux déjà entrepris à ce sujet dans les divers pays alliés et d'assurer ultérieurement entre ces nations la persistance de l'esprit de collaboration et d'entraide économique qui prévaut dans leurs rapports actuels.

Le Gouvernement Français estime que cette Conférence devrait se réunir aussitôt que possible. Il serait heureux de la voir siéger à Paris.

Le Haut Commissaire Français aux Etats-Unis a été chargé d'obtenir l'adhésion du Gouvernement Américain à cette proposition. M. Pichon espère que le Gouvernement Britannique approuvera, pour sa part, la manière de voir du Gouvernement Français et consentira à appuyer la démarche de M. Tardieu à Washington.

YOUR EXCELLENCY,

Foreign Office, S.W.1, 16th May, 1918.

I HAVE the honour to refer to Your Excellency's note of the 17th ultimo informing me of the proposal of the French Government for an inter-Allied conference to examine the possibility of drawing up a scheme of co-operation in regard to the distribution of raw materials during the period of transition and economic reconstruction immediately following the cessation of hostilities.

2. I have the honour to inform Your Excellency that this question has for some time been engaging the attention of His Majesty's Government, who are now on the point of inviting all the Allied Governments to give an estimate of their probable requirements during the transition period, in the matter of certain raw materials produced in the British Empire, and subsequently to attend an Allied conference, to be held after the Imperial Conference has met in June, for a discussion of the whole question of the control and distribution of raw materials derived from Allied sources.

3. Your Excellency will therefore see that His Majesty's Government share the desire of the French Government to undertake without delay a study of this question with a view to arriving at an agreement amongst the Allied Governments before the end of the War, but I trust that the French Government will agree that it would be premature to summon a conference at the present moment, and that more definite results are likely to be obtained if the conference is postponed for two or three months in order to give each Allied Government an opportunity of considering the question and forming an estimate of their several requirements.

4. I am informing His Majesty's High Commissioner in Washington of Your Excellency's proposal, and the opinion of His Majesty's Government as outlined above, in order that he may be able to lend such support as may be possible to Monsieur Tardieu.

I have, &c.,

for the Secretary of State.

His Excellency
Monsieur Cambon,

(No. Commercial.)

SIR,

Foreign Office, 23rd May, 1918.

1. His Majesty's Government are impressed with the urgency of making adequate and timely provision to supply British and Allied industries with the more essential raw materials in the period of reconstruction. It appears certain that there will be, immediately after the peace, an abnormal demand for raw materials on the part of all the industrial countries of the world. In regard to many of the chief raw materials the British Empire and its Allies are in a naturally strong position; but, unless such war measures as prohibitions of export are maintained for a certain period after the end of the War, it may well happen that raw materials, which His Majesty's Government and the Allied Governments have it in their power to control, will be drained away to enemy countries before British and Allied requirements have been covered. His Majesty's Government have already drafted an Imports and Exports Bill, which has, as one of its objects, the conservation of stocks of raw materials in the United Kingdom for a period after the War. They propose shortly to consult with the other Governments of the British Empire as to the possibility of taking similar measures, and in some cases even more stringent measures, to control the chief raw materials produced within the several jurisdictions of these Governments. They would be glad to learn as soon as possible whether any similar measures have been taken or are in contemplation by the Government.

2. While the maintenance of the established industries of the British Empire is one of the principal objects to be secured by such a policy, His Majesty's Government earnestly desire and intend that any control over the raw materials of the British Empire which may be established by agreement with the Self-governing Dominions shall be administered in a manner advantageous to the Allies, and particularly to those Allies whose territories have experienced the full effects of the War, and who are faced with the problem of restoring industries ruined by the War. In according special facilities of a commercial nature to the Allies, His Majesty's Government will give full recognition to the principle that the more fortunately situated members of the Alliance should do their utmost to aid in repairing the sufferings and losses which the less fortunate have incurred in the common cause, and that the form and degree of the assistance rendered should correspond in each case to the special requirements of that case. It is on the ground of the sufferings and losses experienced by the Allies that His Majesty's Government propose to justify their general policy of giving Allies, as compared with neutrals, some special facilities in commercial matters, and it appears reasonable that certain of the Allies should receive more extensive facilities than the rest, according to the relative urgency of each case.

3. The precise extent of the special facilities which His Majesty's Government desire to give, in respect of raw materials, cannot be stated until it is known how far the other Governments of the British Empire are willing to co-operate with His Majesty's Government in the policy of control. But His Majesty's Government have prepared a list, for submission to the other Governments of the Empire, enumerating certain raw materials which it seems expedient to control in the interests of the British Empire and the Allies. A copy of this list is subjoined, and His Majesty's Government would welcome any observations from the Government of the following points in connexion with the list:—

- (a) In which of these raw materials the established manufacturing interests of the are particularly interested, and what amount of each article they would desire to obtain from the British Empire in the first twelve months after the War.
- (b) What additional raw materials, if any, might, in the opinion of the Government, be considered by His Majesty's Government for inclusion in the list.

4. His Majesty's Government desire to emphasize the fact that they do not themselves control the raw materials which belong to the Self-governing Dominions of the British Empire, the Governments of which have problems of their own to consider in relation to the control of their more important products. But His Majesty's Government have every reason to believe that the goodwill which the Dominions have shown towards our Allies in the course of the War will continue to influence the policy of the Dominion Governments after the restoration of peace.

5. While His Majesty's Government would deprecate the idea of reducing the mutual economic assistance of the Allies to the form of precise treaties or bargains, they feel that the contemplated discussions between His Majesty's Government and the other Governments of the Empire can hardly pass beyond generalities unless His Majesty's Government are in a position to state the approximate needs of the Allies, and the nature of the reciprocal assistance, in the shape of raw materials, which the Allies can offer to the British Empire. It would materially assist these discussions if the Government could supply particulars in regard to (a) the raw materials which it requires from the British Empire, and (b) those with which it could supply the British Empire, under the headings which are specified in the enclosure to this despatch. A similar questionnaire is being distributed by His Majesty's Government to the other Governments of the Empire.

6. I request that you will address a communication confidentially to the Minister for Foreign Affairs accordingly, and will request him to return a reply at his earliest convenience. The statistical details asked for in the preceding paragraph are required for the Imperial War Conference which takes place at the beginning of June.

In the event of replies being received from the Allied Governments favourable to the proposed policy of co-operation. His Majesty's Government contemplate inviting their participation in a conference for the purpose of concerting measures in detail, and I should be glad if you will sound the Government as to their readiness to accept such an invitation if they agree to our proposals in principle.

DESPATCH FROM HIS MAJESTY'S AMBASSADOR AT PARIS, WITH PRELIMINARY REPLY OF FRENCH GOVERNMENT TO FOREIGN OFFICE DESPATCH OF 23RD MAY.

(No. 789, Commercial.)

SIR,

Paris, 8th June, 1918.

I HAVE the honour to transmit to you, herewith, copy of the reply of the Minister for Foreign Affairs to the note which I addressed to him, in accordance with the instructions contained in your despatch, No. 1174 Commercial, of the 23rd ultimo (52449/C/150), inquiring whether the French Government would be prepared to supply His Majesty's Government with information respecting French requirements of certain raw materials for examination by His Majesty's Government, in consultation with the other Governments of the British Empire, during the forthcoming Imperial War Conference.

Monsieur Pichon expresses the appreciation of the French Government of the step taken by His Majesty's Government, and promises to supply the information desired for use at this Conference. He desires, however, that the warning should be conveyed that the figures and statistics supplied will obviously be only of an approximate character. The Commercial Adviser has been informed by the competent official at the Ministry for Foreign Affairs that it is hoped to begin furnishing these data in about fifteen days.

With regard to the inquiry made by Monsieur Pichon respecting the United States Government, His Excellency would appear not to have observed that it is clear from my note, based on your despatch under reply, that a similar inquiry is being addressed to, and a similar co-operation is being requested from, the other Allied Governments, under which term the United States Government must presumably be held to be included.

Finally, the French Government accept the proposal of His Majesty's Government to attend an inter-Allied Conference, for the purpose of concerting measures in detail, should the replies received from the other Allied Governments be favourable to the proposed policy of co-operation.

I have, &c.,

The Right Honourable
A. J. Balfour, O.M., M.P.,

Politique interalliée des matières premières après la guerre.

MONSIEUR L'AMBASSADEUR,

J'ai l'honneur de faire connaître à Votre Excellence, en réponse à sa lettre du 28 Mai dernier, que le Gouvernement de la République apprécie hautement la proposition formulée par le Gouvernement Britannique, de soumettre à la Conférence de l'Empire l'importante question du contrôle des matières premières, et de lui fournir, pour la discussion, une évaluation, aussi approchée que possible, des besoins et des ressources des divers Alliés.

Le Gouvernement de la République est particulièrement sensible aux considérations d'équité dont le Gouvernement Anglais a accompagné sa proposition.

Ayant subi, du fait de l'invasion, des pertes et des préjudices auxquels viennent s'ajouter les sacrifices qu'il a dû consentir à l'action militaire, le Gouvernement Français est heureux de constater que les pertes subies et les sacrifices consentis entreront en ligne de compte pour la répartition que l'Angleterre et l'Empire Britannique comptent faire de leurs ressources.

Se conformant au schéma proposé pour la notation des éléments statistiques à fournir, le Gouvernement français compte ajouter, pour chacune des rubriques prévues, les réserves de principe ou d'espèce qui sont destinées à marquer le caractère approximatif de ces évaluations.

En effet, les chiffres qu'il pourra fournir sont susceptibles de variations et de corrections importantes.

Ils peuvent varier suivant les résultats territoriaux de cette guerre, et l'influence de ceux-ci sur la production nationale et sur l'état de l'outillage; ils peuvent varier suivant les disponibilités en force motrice, qui dépendront, après la guerre, de la production du charbon et de la faculté d'organiser la houille blanche; ils devront être adaptés à nos possibilités de transports, qui dépendront non seulement des constructions navales françaises, mais des accords à intervenir avec les Alliés; ils devront être amendés également suivant les disponibilités financières dont dépendra, en une certaine mesure, l'établissement définitif du programme national.

Pour favoriser la discussion que le Gouvernement Britannique compte instituer, lors de la prochaine Conférence de l'Empire, le Gouvernement Français tiendra à coeur de fournir au Gouvernement Britannique les éléments qu'il demande, mais il le prie, dès à présent, d'en souligner, en les transmettant à la Conférence, le caractère provisoire et incertain.

Le Gouvernement de la République serait heureux, par ailleurs, d'apprendre si, à l'occasion de la Conférence de l'Empire, le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté a renouvelé auprès du Président Wilson ses instances pour la préparation du contrôle des matières premières, et si le Gouvernement américain y a répondu en fournissant, au même titre que les autres Alliés, l'évaluation de ses ressources comme de ses besoins.

Il est en effet évident que le but que nous nous proposons ne saurait être pleinement atteint que si tous les Alliés, ou tout au moins les principaux d'entre eux du point de vue qui nous occupe, participent effectivement au plan général qu'il s'agit d'arrêter. C'est pourquoi il me plaît de constater que l'intention exprimée par le Gouvernement britannique de provoquer la réunion, après la Conférence de Londres, d'une Conférence interalliée chargée de l'élaboration d'un programme commun, rencontre heureusement la proposition qu'au nom du Gouvernement de la République, je chargeai, dès le 15 Avril dernier, l'Ambassadeur de France à Londres de lui présenter.

Veuillez agréer, etc.,
S. PICHON.

Son Excellence le Comte de Derby,
Ambassadeur de Sa Majesté Britannique,

NOTE FROM THE FRENCH AMBASSADOR, GIVING TEXT OF A TELEGRAM FROM THE FRENCH MINISTER FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS TO THE FRENCH HIGH COMMISSIONER IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Le Ministre des Affaires Etrangères a fait parvenir à M. Tardieu, Haut Commissaire de la République Française aux Etats-Unis le télégramme suivant:—

Le Gouvernement de la République a été saisi par le Gouvernement Britannique d'une demande tendant à obtenir le programme concernant les besoins en matières premières de la France, pour la période de restauration économique qui suivra la guerre, afin que la Conférence Impériale qui se tient en ce moment à Londres puisse en être saisie. Les autres Gouvernements alliés ont dû recevoir une pareille demande.

En effet, il y aura lieu pour la Conférence Impériale de Londres de se prononcer sur le principe d'une entente de la Grande Bretagne avec ses Dominions en vue de l'établissement d'un contrôle sur les matières premières produites par les différentes parties de l'Empire. L'objet primordial d'un tel contrôle serait d'ajuster les ressources de ces produits aux besoins des pays alliés après la guerre, à charge de réciprocité bien entendu. Le Gouvernement Britannique a l'intention de reconnaître dans cette répartition un droit de priorité à ceux de ces pays qui auront le plus souffert de la guerre.

C'est avec empressement que le Gouvernement Français a accueilli cette proposition, qui correspond chez lui à des idées déjà anciennes. Il se prépare donc à fournir au Gouvernement Britannique les indications demandées, avec les réserves indispensables que comportent toutefois en ce moment les incertitudes inhérentes à des estimations de ce genre dans le cas particulier de la France.

En outre, Lord Derby m'a fait connaître l'intention de son Gouvernement, si les Gouvernements alliés s'y montrent favorables, d'inviter ces derniers à une Conférence qui suivrait la Conférence Impériale et où les mesures requises, suivant application d'un plan d'ensemble, seraient discutées et indiquées.

J'ai pris acte de ce projet en faisant remarquer qu'il s'accorde très heureusement avec la proposition dont, dès le 15 Avril dernier, j'avais chargé M. Paul Cambon, au nom du Gouvernement de la République, de saisir le Cabinet de Londres, en même temps que je vous priais de la présenter au Gouvernement Américain.

Il apparaît clairement que le but que l'on poursuit dans cette politique de contrôle ne saurait être pleinement atteint que si tous les Alliés participent effectivement à l'organisation qu'il s'agit de créer. Les événements se précipitent et ils rendent de plus en plus nécessaire et urgente cette entente générale dans un domaine où les Alliés sont les maîtres. L'association complète que les pays neutres, d'une part, et les ennemis, de l'autre, s'apprêtent à fonder entre eux, nous obligerait, si même nous n'y étions déjà poussés par les soucis de nos besoins et de notre entraide après la guerre, à préparer sans plus tarder une organisation qui apparaîtra, une fois appliquée, sous sa forme solide et pratique, comme un des signes les plus certains de la force réelle de notre alliance. Elle agira contre la résistance prolongée et contre les projets inacceptables de nos ennemis comme une arme particulièrement efficace et souveraine.

Memorandum on Recent German Pronouncements on Economic Policy.

EVER since the first year of the War economic questions have been in the forefront of German war aims. We now know, for certain, from the Muhlton revelations that the group of men who provoked the War in 1914 consisted not only of soldiers but of industrial magnates, such as Herr Krupp von Bohlen. On the other hand, it may be taken as equally certain that the larger section of the German business community which depended for its livelihood on overseas trade was opposed to the war policy of the military chiefs, and hoped to the last that a conflict with Britain, at any rate, might be avoided. They realized that Germany was more dependent than any other country in the world on foreign raw materials and markets for her prosperity, and that, in a war against the dominant sea-Power, that prosperity would be a hostage in the hands of her enemy.

One of the greatest and most successful of German business magnates, Dr. Walter Rathenau, Chairman of the Allgemeine Elektrizitätsgesellschaft, has described in a recent book* the misgivings that were stirred in his mind by the cheering crowds in the streets of Berlin in July, 1914. On the whole, however, the German business community accepted the War in the same spirit of military enthusiasm as the rest of the country. They expected a short war, which would leave their overseas connexions unimpaired, and, as we now know, the representatives of the Associated Chambers of Commerce, who attended a conference at the Ministry of the Interior at Berlin in May, 1914, to concert economic measures in the event of war, came back with the report that plans were being laid for a war of a year's duration at the outside.†

After the battle of the Marne it began to be generally recognized that the War would be a long one, and that it could not fail to inflict untold damage on Germany's oversea trade and connexions. The German Government realized that, in transferring its contest with Great Britain from the commercial to the military sphere, it had jeopardized the future prosperity of the country. Efforts were therefore made to prove that the War was provoked by British jealousy, and Dr. Bethmann-Hollweg laid constant stress in his speeches on "the safeguarding of Germany's economic future" as one of the most essential war aims.

As the War has gone on, the necessity of "safeguarding Germany's economic future" has become more and more apparent, and the means proposed for doing so have taken different shapes. This must be briefly reviewed if the present situation is to be understood.

There have throughout been two schools of thought on the subject of economic war aims. These are sometimes described as "Eastern" and "Western," but they would be more correctly called "Continental" and "Oceanic." The Continental school, consisting of the agrarians and certain industrial interests, aim at acquisitions of territory and wealth in the Old World. The Oceanic school, which draws its main strength from the commercial and general manufacturing community, aims at strengthening the influence and trading connexions of Germany in the world as a whole. The first school marches under the banner of "Mitteleuropa," which has been stretched to cover far more territory than the name implies; the second has adopted as its watchword "Weltwirtschaft," or "World Economy."

These two sets of aims are not incompatible. There is no party in Germany except the diminishing group of Minority Socialists, which, in the event of victory, would not be ready to exploit both sets of aims to the full. The difference between their exponents is as to their relative importance: as to which, in the event of a negotiated peace, should be regarded as pawns for bargaining, and which should be insisted upon as indispensable. In this great and sustained debate, which has occupied the mind of Germany for close on four years, the exponents of the Oceanic point of view, with the blockade to drive home their arguments, have completely succeeded in proving their case.

The extent and significance of this victory may be judged by a comparison between the state of opinion in 1915 and at the present time. During the summer and autumn of 1915, when Warsaw, Vilna, and Kovno were occupied and the connexion established with Bulgaria and Asia Minor, when Naumann's attractive exposition of "Mitteleuropa" ran into 100,000 copies in a few months, the vast new territories opened up seemed full of boundless possibilities. But before long the professors, who had been set on to make the inventory, began to produce their results, which proved unexpectedly meagre. Disappointment set in, and, by the spring of 1916, when the blockade was beginning to be very severely felt, the Oceanic school was again in the ascendant. Its ascendancy has never been so marked as during the last three months, when, by the treaties with Russia and the Ukraine, a new door has been opened into the depths of Asia, and possibilities of expansion have been presented excelling the utmost dreams of 1915. Never has the gospel of "World Economy" been so loudly proclaimed, or attention been drawn so frankly to the dependence of Germany on her overseas connexions, and to the control exercised over her future prosperity and her very means of existence by the dominant sea-

* "Von kommenden Dingen," written in the summer of 1916.

† Statement by a speaker at a Conference on the 7th August, 1916, in defence of the Government against the charge of industrial unpreparedness.

Power. Amidst the multitude of witnesses a few authoritative pronouncements only can be cited.

On the 9th April, five weeks after the Russian treaties had been signed, Dr. Helfferich, who is generally believed in Germany to be the controlling mind behind the Government's economic policy and plans, made a speech at Stuttgart, in the presence of the whole body of Württemberg Ministers. It contained not a word about the Eastern situation, but consisted of one long harangue against "England" as the instigator of the War and the evil genius of European history. Rejecting the idea of "peace by understanding," he declared that the sword alone could secure to Germany the economic peace-terms indispensable to her continued existence. He defined the economic position and needs of Germany with almost brutal frankness in the following words:—

"Before the War the labour and livelihood of more than a quarter of our 70,000,000 inhabitants arose directly or indirectly out of our foreign connexions. . . . Only the restoration and safeguarding of our place in the world's economy, the restoration and safeguarding of our foreign connexions and foreign establishments can save us from a long continued shortage of raw materials and foodstuffs, from unemployment, low wages, and misery. It is not to protect our frontiers that we are fighting; it is to protect the foundations of our existence. . . . We may maintain and safeguard our frontiers, but if the peace does not restore to us what the British economic war has destroyed, if it does not recover for us free play for our work and enterprise in the outer world—and that not by means of paper agreements, but through the compelling power of facts which we ourselves have set in motion—if we do not insist upon this as a result of our military successes, then—this cannot be said too often—we have lost the war and with it our future. Then we have played for our stakes and lost them; we shall be suffocated; with our population diminished and our standard of life reduced, we shall be thrust back into the misery and weakness of bygone days."

The same moral recurs in the address delivered by Herr von Kühlmann before the Berlin Chamber of Commerce on the 22nd May. It was announced as a lecture on "The Economic Aspect of the Roumanian Peace," and the greater part of the address was devoted to that subject. But in a concluding passage the speaker took pains to make it clear that his experiences in the East have left him a convinced adherent of the Oceanic school.

"It would be a grave mistake," he said, "were we to direct our gaze only to the East and the South-East. These developments are necessary in order to broaden the basis of our economic structure on the European continent, to furnish us with population and resources for the peaceful competition of the future against great territories like North America. But they are not the goal or the end of our evolution. All our efforts to unify our resources and consolidate our basis on our own mother earth—the European continent—must only be allowed to serve, in the last analysis, as a stimulus to German enterprise to put forth yet stronger efforts towards that which is the native element of all great and genuinely free trade—the free sea."

Here the contemplated relationship between continental and oceanic policy is quite frankly revealed. "Mitteleuropa" is regarded as an accomplished fact. Europe can be described, without fear of contradiction from Germany's satellites, as the mother earth ("Mutterboden") of the German business man. But these vast annexations of land, labour, and resources are but a preliminary to the main and indispensable economic war aim—the resumption and safeguarding of Germany's oversea connexions.

Side by side with these pronouncements by the two men most intimately concerned with the drawing up of Germany's economic war aims may be set demands put forward in responsible quarters, giving precision to the necessarily vague statements of the Governmental speakers.

The first to be cited must be the one definite war-aims programme so far drawn up by the Legislature of one of the federated States. On the 16th May the "Citizen Council," or Lower House, of the free city of Hamburg, passed a resolution begging the Senate, or Upper House, to use its influence with the Bundesrat to secure that the following points should be taken into consideration in the negotiation of the future peace treaties:—

1. A sufficient war indemnity, preferably in the shape of raw materials.

2. A larger colonial Empire adequate to the needs of the German people.
3. The guaranteeing of German claims in foreign countries.
4. The restoration of all German rights in foreign countries infringed as a result of the War.
5. Protection against attempts to boycott German enterprise.
6. Safeguards assuring equal rights to German shipping on the seas of the world.

The reasons which impelled the Hamburg community to frame this resolution are obvious enough; but this incursion into Imperial politics by a local Legislature is clear evidence of the widespread uneasiness which prevails at the situation in which the German commercial community finds itself after four years of war. So great has this uneasiness become that the Reichstag has recently taken the unprecedented step of sending a delegation to Hamburg to confer on the situation.

The same preoccupations reappear at the recent meeting of the German Associated Chambers of Commerce, at which a resolution was adopted in the following terms:—

"It must be pointed out with all possible emphasis that all difficulties as to the supply of raw materials after the war and the improvement of the German exchange abroad will be surmounted, at one stroke and without any artificial interference with the economic life of the nation, if the forthcoming treaties of peace secure us a war indemnity of adequate dimensions, and if part of this is paid in raw materials, or if the supply of raw materials is guaranteed to us in some other way. The Imperial Government is requested resolutely to present this demand at the peace negotiations still outstanding."

This programme, as will be observed, embodies an ingenious combination of predatory militarism and "business as usual." The securing of an indemnity by military force is to be made the occasion for the removal of all State restrictions on private trading.

A similar point of view was in evidence at a meeting of the Hansabund, an association of general trading and manufacturing interests, on the 30th April, when great stress was laid on the necessity for complete freedom of action for German enterprise, both as regards shipping and general trade after the war. The chief speaker, Dr. Köhler, the business manager of the association, declared that the conclusion of peace would signify not the end but the beginning of the struggle for the economic and political position of the German Empire in the world, and suggested "the Oceans for Germans" as the watchword of the association's policy. He went on to argue in favour of this "world activity" being exercised under conditions of complete freedom of movement and of enterprise, a point of view which was emphasized by subsequent speakers representing the shipping and textile interests. One of these, Herr Huldermann, Managing Director of the Hamburg-America Line, revealed his preoccupations in the following significant sentences:—

"Under present circumstances peace treaties may not be worth the paper they are written on, for we have to reckon with the personal inclinations of foreign nations. What will the most excellent peace treaties avail us if the nations unite in a voluntary boycott of Germany, and make our labours impossible by unfair customs and police regulations?"

Meanwhile the new Imperial Ministry of Industry, which has been specially entrusted with the preparations for Germany's economic reconstruction after the War, has been examining the question from its own special angle, and has lately drawn the public to some extent into its confidence. At a meeting in Frankfurt on the 14th April Dr. Weber, one of the chief officials of the Ministry, addressing the Union of South German Manufacturers, defended the control policy of the Government on the ground that, "even if the Government pitched its economic demands as high as possible in the future peace negotiations, and even if, in particular, it demanded the granting of currency loans and the signing of contracts for the delivery of raw materials, it is impossible at the present time to forecast the condition of affairs after the signing of peace." In the debate on the estimates of the new Department on the 3rd May the Minister himself was more outspoken:—

"I do not," he said, "take our enemies for a lot of old women. If they are constantly threatening us with an economic war I am disposed to take their words seriously. We must therefore arm ourselves with every weapon that will enable us to withstand them on this field also. For that reason imports and exports must remain under Government control. . . . At a time when there is a shortage of raw materials, and much else that is required for our industrial life, decisions must be made as to the purposes to which they shall be applied. Somebody must decide as to what is necessary and what is not. The interested parties are not in a position to do so. It is not their business, which is to make the most of what opportunities they have. Only one authority can decide, and that is the Government."

On the 4th May a further declaration of reconstruction policy was made by means of an interview between officials of the new department and representatives of the Press. No attempt was made to disguise the seriousness of the position, and especial stress was laid on the difficulties which would confront the textile industry, which, it should be remembered, employs over a million workpeople in the German Empire.*

"Germany," said one of the speakers, "will have to count on a shortage of raw material for a long time. Cotton crops are less abundant and the demand has increased. In America only 13,000,000 bales were harvested in 1917, as compared with 18,000,000 in 1913, while the demand there has gone up from 5,400,000 to 7,600,000. As England has already purchased the South African and Australian output for several years, wool will be almost entirely under her control. Moreover, the Egyptian cotton crop has also been secured by England for the next two years and jute will also be controlled from there."

Similarly pessimistic language was used about tonnage:—

"A large proportion of German tonnage has been lost during the War and further losses may yet occur. It appears to be impossible during the War to make good these losses in German shipyards, and therefore one must reckon with a reduced German tonnage as well as with a general reduction of international tonnage. No one can prophesy, but it is very probable that there will not be enough tonnage for the necessary imports."

The conclusion drawn by the department was that both shipping and trade must continue to be controlled, but that the conditions of the control must depend on the nature of the peace settlement. "The more favourable Germany's position is on the conclusion of peace the less stringently will these measures be applied."

Quotations could be multiplied indefinitely to show the extent to which these preoccupations as to the economic future of the country are exercising the minds of all classes in Germany. The professors, in particular, many of whom were at first attracted by the lure of "Mitteleuropa," are now singing in chorus in the opposite camp, led by some of the very men who were set on to specialize in "Continental" possibilities, and have been prominent in promoting schemes of closer economic union in the Near East. Articles on "the threatened raw material boycott" are now constantly appearing in German newspapers and reviews; and this is all the more striking because, up till about a year ago, the German Government seems to have tried to prevent the discussion of the subject, lest the realization of the seriousness of the position should cause discouragement. One feature of these discussions, however, deserves especial notice. This is the increasing tendency among sections of the most diverse opinion to advocate a settlement of the economic issues of the War by means of international organization rather than by a victory achieved at the point of the sword, as foreshadowed by the military party. Several striking pronouncements in this sense have been made recently. The most comprehensive of these is an article contributed by Dr. Dernburg to the Vienna Neue Freie Presse of the 19th May. He begins by painting the economic outlook of the Central Powers in gloomy colours:—

"Even if we recovered the German colonies and a good slice of the rest of Africa besides, the Central Powers could not meet their demand for raw material. Very few neutral States remain to help us out. Neither Sweden nor Spain nor the Dutch colonies can give us what we need, useful though their contributions are. The rest of the world, with the exception of Mexico, Argentine, and Chile, has joined our enemies; and since all these States retain sovereign powers to regulate their imports and exports in any way they please, there is nothing to prevent them from prolonging their war-time legislation into time of peace. England and her Dominions have already shown the way in this direction."

He goes on to point out that, even if the Peace Treaty provides safeguards against such legislative action, it is a mistake to suppose, as is commonly supposed in Germany, "that the whole world will be only too pleased to enter into business relations with the Central Powers." This is certainly not true of England and France, still less of the Dominions. It is therefore not a question of "securing permission" for the free use of the seas and the delivery of raw materials. Compulsory powers must be provided in case of need to make sure that the Central Powers get their due. This compulsion, he continues:—

"Can only be exercised as the result of an agreement between all the sovereign States to set up an International Rationing Commission armed with powers of judicial decision, which will be empowered to allocate, transport, and pay for the materials on the basis of standards previously laid down. . . . The determination of the quotas will be difficult, but more difficult questions have been known to be settled. What this will mean in practice is that a very large part of the merchant shipping of the world will be plying under a single control, that a long list of materials will be drawn up, and the individual States will be asked, and, if necessary, compelled, to deliver the products of their own territory for the benefit of the world as a whole, so that a general settlement will be brought about between commodities and money. In other words, the distribution of raw materials and of a portion of the articles of consumption will remain in Government hands for a period which, though it will be as short as possible, will not be inconsiderable."

The article concludes by summing up the proposed international economic organization as "a League of Peoples for the Universal Provision of a Humanity pining for Want of Raw Materials."

The putting forward of so bold and comprehensive a suggestion by a politician of Herr Dernburg's standing would be remarkable enough in any event, but it is all the more remarkable in view of the disinclination hitherto of Germans of all sections of opinion to pay serious attention to questions of international organization or the League of Nations. Still more remarkable is the statement of peace-terms contributed to the Junker organ, the Kreuz-Zeitung, by an anonymous writer on the 5th June, which includes a demand for "German participation in international commissions of control for all spheres of economic interest in lieu of an actual war indemnity." Men like Dr. Dernburg and the Kreuz-Zeitung writer have clearly been driven, contrary to their own natural bent of mind, to advocate international organization, because they can see no other prospect of relief from Germany's inevitable post-war embarrassments.

The practical conclusion which emerges from the foregoing may be briefly stated:—

It is important to strengthen, with every means at disposal, the machinery of economic control in the hands of the Allies, and, more particularly, of the British Empire. The Germans, as has been shown, rate the potency of the economic weapon very high; in some cases, as appears in the extracts quoted above, they have even allowed their apprehensions to outrun their information and announced as a fait accompli policies designed to secure the control of important materials for several years ahead, which are not yet known to have been, and perhaps have not been, adopted by the Governments concerned. It may be stated with absolute confidence, from a close study of German opinion, that nothing would do more to encourage the enemy at this moment than any suspicion that there existed reluctance on the Allies' side to perfect their machinery of joint economic organization, irrespective of private, local, or national interests, or to adopt the measures of purchase, control, and unification necessary to render that organization effective for several years ahead.

Inseparably bound up with this, however, is the question of the economic aspect of the post-war settlement. It must never be forgotten that the economic issue is by far the best leverage at our disposal for influencing German opinion. The German public is not interested at this moment in programmes designed to "make the world safe for democracy," or, indeed, in any of the political ideas put forward on either side of the Atlantic in connexion with the peace settlement. But it is vitally and anxiously interested in questions of economic policy, for upon their settlement depends the prospect of a restoration of domestic comfort and national prosperity. Great and not unnatural confusion exists among the German public at present as to the economic policy of the Allies, and this has enabled the military party to whip up much lagging support. If it were made perfectly clear that the Allies intended to use the economic weapon to its fullest extent in order to achieve their declared purposes, including full reparation, but to use it no further, it would have a far more disintegrating effect upon German opinion than any statement of purposes hitherto issued from the Allied side.

NOTE BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE.

For the purpose of giving effect to the resolution regarding the control of wool supplies after the War passed by the Imperial War Conference of 1917, I convened a Conference consisting of representatives of the Board of Trade, the India Office, the Raw Materials Department of the War Office, the Ministry of Reconstruction, and the Governments of the Oversea Dominions.

The Conference met in March, May, and June, 1918, and, as a result of their deliberations, prepared a report, which is now submitted for the consideration of the Imperial War Conference.

Having regard to the terms of reference, the recommendations made in this report are confined to the question of the control of the wool within the Empire, but I desire to call attention to the opinion expressed by the Conference that the arrangements that they recommend regarding wool within the Empire are perfectly compatible with any methods of settling the wider problem of securing adequate supplies of wool for the Empire and the Allies after the War.

A. H. STANLEY.

Board of Trade,
Whitehall Gardens, S.W.,
15th June, 1918.

Report of the Conference.

THE Conference was summoned by the President of the Board of Trade in pursuance of a resolution passed by the Imperial War Conference in 1917. This resolution was as follows:—

"It is desirable that there should be immediate consultation among such of the Governments of the Empire as are concerned with wool production, for the purpose of framing a scheme for the control, as far as possible, of wool produced in the British Empire during the period immediately following the War, with a view to safeguarding Imperial resources and meeting the industrial needs of the Empire and the Allies."

The Conference had before it the statistical tables prepared by the Board of Trade which are set out in the Appendix to this report.

The first set of tables is derived chiefly from official publications of the various countries concerned.

The second set is based on figures derived from private trading sources.

The compilation of accurate statistics of the wool trade is a matter of considerable difficulty, owing mainly to the absence of official information respecting the different qualities of wool imported and exported, but the trading figures, which are not substantially different, on the whole, form a useful support to the official statistics, inasmuch as they distinguish between the three leading types of merino, crossbred, and low wool, which are all treated together in the Custom House statistics. The available information is admittedly incomplete, especially as regards Russia and Asiatic countries. The Conference felt, however, that for the purpose of their inquiry a sufficiently accurate view of the statistical position had been obtained.

The outstanding feature of the statistical position is that the British Empire is self-supporting as regards each leading type of wool. As to merino wool, the production of Australia and South Africa (about 680,000,000 lb.) is nearly four times the pre-War consumption within the Empire, and much more than sufficient to supply all the present Allies and neutral countries on the 1913-15 basis. The production of crossbred wool in the United Kingdom, New Zealand, and Australia (about 400,000,000 lb.) is amply sufficient to provide for the maximum requirements within the Empire, leaving a surplus available for, but not adequate to meet the full requirements of, our Allies. India produces enough low wool to supply the United Kingdom with some surplus for the Allies.

Outside the British Empire by far the largest exporting countries are the Argentine and Uruguay. Their production of merino wool is relatively small (73,000,000 lb.), and cannot take the place of that of Australia, owing to its lower quality. But the exports of crossbred wool (331,000,000 lb.) are essential to the Allies. At least one-third of the latter will be needed to keep up the supply of wool to the Allies on the 1913 level, and the increased requirements of the United States can hardly be met unless the greater part of the South American crossbred wool is available.

The large production of Russian low wool is almost entirely used for domestic consumption. The same is true of the Asiatic countries. Next to the Argentine and Uruguay, Spain is the largest neutral exporter of wool (32,500,000 lb.). No neutral country is a large importer of wool. For the broad purposes of this inquiry neutral countries, apart from the Argentine and Uruguay, do not materially affect the problem.

The Conference unanimously concluded that it was desirable that the whole of the Empire clips should be controlled, and that it was also desirable that if possible some arrangement should be effected by which the destination of the Argentine and Uruguayan clips could also be brought under control, as in that event the Allied nations would effectively control the world's supplies of merino and crossbred wool.

The Conference further agreed that control by means of export licences alone would be unreliable and difficult to work. Wool-growers, moreover, if they were deprived of the advantage of an unlimited world market, would require a guarantee that they would secure a sufficiently remunerative price for their whole produce.

The Conference unanimously concluded that the existing arrangements between the United Kingdom on the one hand, and Australia and New Zealand on the other, formed an acceptable solution of the difficulty. Some modifications would, no doubt, require to be introduced to adapt these arrangements to post-war conditions, but it seemed that the main lines of the existing arrangements might, in the opinion of the Conference, be continued for the period of the War and for a reasonable period thereafter.

The following recommendations are therefore submitted to the Imperial Conference:

1. That agreements shall be negotiated between the Imperial Government on the one hand, and the Governments of Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa, respectively, on the other hand, to acquire the total wool clip of each of these Dominions for the duration of the War and a reasonable period thereafter.
2. That a guaranteed minimum price for each type and grade of wool shall be fixed, to be paid on behalf of the Imperial Government to the wool growers.
3. That certain partnership arrangements shall be stipulated, whereby any surplus which may result from the ultimate sale of the wool shall be divided on an agreed basis. The Imperial Government should act in general accord with the Dominions in defining the policy and laying down the arrangements for the disposal of the wool, both for domestic use and for sale abroad.
4. That negotiations be entered into with the Government of India with a view to securing the exportable surplus of East India wool for Great Britain and the Allied countries, either by a continuance of the present arrangements or by any other means suitable to the special position of India.
5. That during the period of control exportation of wool from any part of the Empire, except under licence, shall be prohibited.

The Conference's terms of reference do not go beyond the problem of wool supplies within the Empire. Some general observations regarding the wider problem may, however, also be submitted.

It will be seen that the Imperial wool clips are sufficient in the case of merino to cover the entire requirements of the Allies and neutral countries, as well as those of the Empire itself, but, as regards crossbred wool, the full requirements of the Allies cannot be met without obtaining large supplies from the Argentine and Uruguay, and this factor very materially affects the wool problem in all its aspects, and especially with regard to price.

The Conference takes the view that the above negotiations within the Empire should be undertaken at once. If it should prove to be possible to make arrangements for securing the supplies of wool from Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and India, in their entirety, or the greater part of such supplies, the Conference suggests that it would be proper for the Imperial Government to notify to the Allied countries, and especially to the United States and France, that such arrangements had been made, and to invite them jointly to consider the problem of securing supplies of wool from the Argentine and Uruguay. Upon the result of any such negotiations, and upon the action to be taken by each country with regard to home clips, would necessarily depend the arrangements made for distributing between the various markets, and for fixing the ultimate prices of the wool acquired under partnership arrangements with the various Dominions.

The Conference is of opinion that the arrangements within the Empire recommended in this report are perfectly compatible with any methods of settling the wider problem which may be afterwards agreed upon, and that a very great step would be made in attaining the object which all the Allied nations have in view if this preliminary agreement between the Imperial Government and the respective Dominions could be successfully negotiated.

June, 1918.

APPENDIX.

NOTE ON THE GENERAL POSITION OF SUPPLIES.

Taking 1913 as a standard year for the world's consumption, and assuming that the consumption in the first year after peace will be on similar lines, the figures of consumption, i.e., the distribution of the British Empire and South American clips, would be roughly as follows:—

					In millions of lb.
					Merino.	Crossbred.
United Kingdom	189.0	314.3
Allies	365.0	217.4
					554.0	531.7
Enemy countries	272.0	129.7
All others	15.0	28.1
Total					841.0	689.5

These figures, which are given in detail in table II. (c), represent the import into the countries named of wool from the British Empire (including the United Kingdom) and South America. Their total consumption can only be estimated in the roughest way by adding to these imports the amount of their own home-grown clips, less any part of these that may be exported. An attempt is made to work this out in detail for the United Kingdom in table II. (d). But, as already pointed out, practically all European countries and America do, as a matter of fact, consume the whole of their own clips, and import in addition from the British Empire and South America. The extent of these imports does, therefore, represent their consumption, in the sense that it shows the share taken by them of the world's exportable surplus, namely, the British Empire and South American clips.

It must, however, be kept in view that the actual consumption of wool to-day in many of these countries has changed most materially, and in a way which is bound to affect their post-War consumption. Thus America and the United Kingdom have very largely increased their consumption (especially of crossbred), owing to war conditions, and it is probable that that increased consumption will continue to some extent at least after the War. On the other hand, the invaded districts of France and Belgium have largely fallen out of consumption, and it will be some time after peace before they can possibly return to normal.

In order to estimate how far and from what sources the post-War needs of Europe and America can be met, it is necessary to take the latest available figures of the growth in the British Empire and South America, i.e., those for 1915, and to assume that the supplies in the first year after peace will not differ substantially from these figures. The total supply thus available is as follows:—

	In millions of lb.
	Merino.	Crossbred.
British Empire (including United Kingdom)...	676	408
South America	73	331
	749	739

These figures are arrived at by extracting the estimated clips of the British Empire and South America from the figures of the total world's production in 1915, as given in table II. (b).

It will be seen by a comparison of these two tables that

1. The needs of the United Kingdom and the Allies together, i.e., 554 million lb. merino, and 531.7 million lb. crossbred, could easily be supplied from the British Empire clip alone, as regards merino, of which they would only take eighty-two per cent. of the total. But they would be distinctly short on crossbred, the whole Empire supply being only equal to seventy-seven per cent. of their apparent consumption in 1913.
2. If, however, the Allies had control of the South American clips as well as of those of the Empire, there would be more than enough to cover the Empire shortage of crossbred for Empire and Allied needs. Their total needs would then leave a margin of twenty-six per cent. of the total merino, and twenty-eight per cent. of the total crossbred, supplies.
3. The needs of the enemy and neutral countries total 287 million lb. merino and 157.8 million lb. crossbred. For the former the surplus indicated under (2) would supply sixty-eight per cent., while the balance of crossbred would more than cover their total requirements of that class.

NOTE.—It will be observed that the aggregate imports exceed aggregate exports in all years. This is due to the fact that there is a very large interchange of wools between the United Kingdom, France, Germany, Netherlands, and Belgium, with consequent duplication. Moreover, a considerable quantity of the wool exported from the countries named consists of washed wool.

Board of Trade.

The Imports and Exports (Temporary Control) Bill.

(See discussion on pages 30-31, 45-46, and 53-58.)

MEMORANDUM BY THE BOARD OF TRADE.

THE object of this Bill is twofold: to continue during the period of transition from war to peace conditions the powers which have been exercised by the Crown during the War as regards the control of imports and exports, which must otherwise lapse the moment the War comes to an end, as they rest, except as regards a very limited range of commodities, on legislation passed since the War began, which without re-enactment will automatically cease with the end of hostilities; and to provide the necessary machinery for carrying out any policy regarding such control after the War which may be decided upon (including, if it is thought desirable, a policy of discrimination between the economic treatment to be accorded to our friends and our foes).

While it is not proposed to apply anything comparable with the control now exercised under war conditions to the export trade after the War, as it is obvious that so far-reaching a system of control would not be necessary in time of peace, and that the sooner the existing control can be relaxed the quicker will be the trade recovery from the effects of the War, it is equally obvious that all foreign trade cannot be left immediately the War ends without any check, and that there must be some transition period during which a policy can be framed to meet the new conditions, which will to a large extent be governed by two main considerations—shortage of many important raw materials, and shortage of the shipping necessary to replenish the supplies of such materials.

Apart from the temporary war legislation referred to above, the powers of the Crown in regard to the control of imports and exports are limited to those contained in:—

(1) Section 43 of the Customs Consolidation Act, 1888, which confers the power of prohibiting by Proclamation or Order in Council the importation of arms, ammunition, gunpowder, or any other goods.

(2) Section 8 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1879, which confers the power of prohibiting absolutely by Proclamation or Order in Council the exportation of arms, ammunition, and gunpowder, military and naval stores, and any articles which the Crown shall judge capable of being converted or made useful in increasing the quantity of such stores, provisions, or victual which may be used for the food of man.

* Including alpaca, etc., which amounted to about 55 million lb. in 1913.

(3) Section 1 of the Exportation of Arms Act, 1900, which confers similar powers as regards exportation to any country or place named in any Proclamation made thereunder whenever it may be judged expedient.

The powers conferred by (2) and (3) have been extended by war legislation to cover all goods of any description, and those conferred by (3) have also been extended to cover the exportation of goods to any particular country or place unless consigned to particular individuals, but these extensions operate only while the War continues and any Proclamations or Orders made under them during the War will in large measure cease to have effect.

The present Bill therefore proposes to give to the Privy Council, on the motion of the Board of Trade, the power to prohibit either the importation or the exportation, except under licence, of any goods, or of any goods of a particular origin, or place of manufacture, or shipped from or to a particular country, and to amend or revoke any such prohibitions as may be necessary.

Moreover, in order to tide over the transition period immediately after the War, it maintains in being all existing prohibitions until so amended or revoked, as though they had been imposed by Orders issued under the provisions of the Bill itself and also all licences which may be in existence when the War ends.

Provision is further made for enforcing the necessary penalties for contravention of any Order made under the Bill, by enacting that the provisions of the Customs Consolidation Act, 1888, which impose a penalty in cases of illegal importation, shall apply as though the penalizing clause of this Bill were a part of that Act, and shall be extended to apply equally to cases of illegal exportation.

The maximum penalty which can be imposed under these provisions is treble the value of the goods or a fine of £100 at the discretion of the Commissioners of Customs, while the goods are in each case liable to forfeiture. The very severe penalties imposed by war legislation, including imprisonment in cases of actual trading with the enemy, are for obvious reasons not re-enacted by this Bill, which is framed to deal solely with conditions after the War.

The period of operation of the Bill, as drafted, is fixed at three years, but it is possible that some reduction in this period may be made during the passage of the Bill through Parliament. It will, however, be open for Parliament to decide when the period is drawing to a close whether it is necessary to extend for some further period the powers conferred by the Bill.

It will thus be seen that, without laying down policy, the Bill provides machinery not only (1) for securing the control over imports into, and exports from, this country, which must be exercised in the interests of our own material needs and those of our Allies during the transition period from war to peace, and for a certain period after peace has been established, but also (2) for rationing those commodities of which there is, or will be, a world shortage, in order to avoid a disastrous enhancement of prices due to a scramble for supplies, and also, if it is considered expedient, for differentiating between the economic treatment to be accorded to those who have been our friends and those who have been our foes, with a view to combating any attempt on the part of the latter to crush out industries in this country by a process of dumping, thereby impeding our economic recovery from the results of the War.

The machinery set up by the Bill will be the same as that in operation during the War, viz., prohibition or restriction by Order of Council, subject to exemptions by means of licences.

Report of Committee on Imperial Meat Resources.

NOTE BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE.

(See discussion on pp. 31, 45, 46-50, 58-70, 72-90, 120, and 195-208.)

For the purpose of giving effect to the resolution on the development of Imperial meat resources passed by the Imperial War Conference of 1917, a Conference, consisting of representatives of the Board of Trade, Colonial Office, and the Governments of the Oversea Dominions, was convened by me in October 1917. A committee was appointed by the Conference, under the chairmanship of Mr. Shirley Benn, M.P., to draw up a detailed scheme, and its report was submitted to two further meetings of the Conference held in May 1918. The Conference now commends the report to the Imperial War Conference as a basis for its deliberations.

In submitting the report I desire to point out that the committee did not think it expedient to call before it representatives of the shipping, meat, and cold storage interests, as the general facts of the situation were before them, and the broad views of the members of those industries as to State control were matters of common knowledge, and they did not wish to run the risk of any premature disclosure of their proposals. If, however, the Imperial War Conference adopts these proposals in principle, steps will no doubt be taken by the Governments concerned to consult the various trade interests before introducing the legislation which would be necessary to carry out the scheme.

ANNEXURE TO VII.

REPORT ON IMPERIAL MEAT RESOURCES.

COMMITTEE.

Mr. A. SHIRLEY BENN, M.P. (Chairman);
 Lt.-Col. Sir THOMAS B. ROBINSON, K.C.M.G., K.B.E., representing the Board of Trade;
 Mr. E. J. HARDING, C.M.G., representing the Colonial Office;
 Mr. W. L. GRIFFITH, representing the High Commissioner for Canada;
 Mr. C. C. CHERRY, representing the High Commissioner for Australia;
 Mr. A. CRABBE, representing the High Commissioner for New Zealand;
 Mr. C. du P. CHIAPPINI, representing the High Commissioner for the Union of South Africa;
 Mr. H. W. MACROSTY, O.B.E., Board of Trade (Secretary).

INTRODUCTION.

1. This Committee was appointed as the result of a conference convened by the President of the Board of Trade to consider the best means of giving effect to the following resolution passed by the Imperial War Conference of 1917: "In view of the extent to which the United Kingdom and certain other parts of the Empire are dependent on overseas supplies for meat, and of the desirability of freeing British markets from excessive dependence on foreign organisations which control important sources of supply, this Conference is of opinion that there should be co-operation between the Governments of the Empire to ensure that the Empire should become as far as possible self-sufficing in the matter of meat supplies, and that the Governments concerned should prepare detailed plans with this object."

2. Briefly the position of affairs which led to the foregoing resolution was as follows: Before the war the United Kingdom drew from abroad 40 per cent. of its supplies of beef, 50 per cent. of its supplies of mutton, and 45 per cent. of its supplies of pig products. About half the beef and a large proportion of the pig products were in the hands of a group of American companies popularly understood to be working together. India and the West African Colonies received some supplies of meat (both British and foreign) and the Union of South Africa some bacon from the United Kingdom, while British Possessions in the Mediterranean and the East, as well as Canada, imported from Australia and New Zealand.

NATURE OF THE PROBLEM.

3. The question remitted to us was that of co-operation between the Governments of the Empire to ensure that the Empire should become as far as possible self-sufficing in the matter of meat supplies, but we feel bound to point out that the needs of the Empire cannot be considered in isolation, and that account must be taken of the changes during the war in the meat-consuming habits of the population of Europe and of the needs of foreign Powers for importing meat supplies after the war. For example, since 1913, the number of cattle in France has decreased by 2,000,000 head, and the cattle herd of Italy has declined by about 1,400,000 since 1915. At the same time the soldiers and many workers of these two countries have during the war acquired a taste for meat-eating which they did not previously possess, but are likely to retain in time of peace. Belgium and Serbia will have to be restocked and the people maintained during the period of replenishment. Finally, the Central Empires will also be very short of animals for food, and will have to enter the international meat market.

SOURCES OF IMPORTED MEAT SUPPLIES.

4. In these circumstances a brief indication of the world's sources of supply of imported meat will be useful. As the United Kingdom is by far the most important of the parts of the Empire (and, indeed, of the world) dependent on outside supplies, a short survey of the countries from which it obtains its imports will also help in indicating those parts of the world in which the development of meat production may be expected.

(a) Beef.—The United States had practically ceased to export beef by 1912, and their place as an exporter had been taken by the Argentine Republic and Uruguay. Australia and New Zealand supplied smaller amounts, but not more than 26 per cent. of the United Kingdom imports.

(b) Mutton and Lamb.—Australia and New Zealand contributed together 75 per cent. of the United Kingdom imports, the balance coming from the Argentine and Chile.

(c) Pork, Bacon, and Hams.—The United States were formerly the main suppliers of pork and bacon, but in recent years they have been largely displaced, in the case of pork, by the Netherlands and, in the case of bacon, by Denmark; they still, however, contribute the main supply of hams imported into the United Kingdom. A little over 5 per cent. of the total imports of pig meat is derived from Canada.

5. During the war new sources of supply of beef within the Empire have been developed in Canada and the Union of South Africa. Future potential sources of supply are Rhodesia, East Africa, and possibly Nigeria. In the case of mutton the Union of South Africa seems to present possible opportunities for development. Australia and New Zealand are beginning an export trade in pork. It is, however, obvious that for many years to come the British Empire must continue to be partially dependent on foreign countries for its imported supplies of beef, pork, bacon, and hams.

DEVELOPMENT AND CONTROL OF MEAT SUPPLIES.

6. It appears to us that the questions arising out of the present enquiry must be considered under three heads:—

I.—Development of sources of supply.

II.—The question of oversea transport.

III.—The question of supervision of production and distribution (under which we include schemes of Government purchase and control).

We propose to deal with each of these subjects separately.

I.—DEVELOPMENT.

7. We assume that it will be part of the policy of the Imperial Government to increase the production of meat in the United Kingdom, but the fostering of such a policy (including the encouragement of pig-breeding to the fullest extent, both for farmers and cottagers) naturally falls to the Departments of Agriculture concerned, and we consider it unnecessary for us to deal with the matter here. Similarly, the development of the pastoral industries in the oversea parts of the Empire is a subject to which much attention is devoted by the Governments concerned, whose policy is, through the efforts of their Agricultural Departments and in other ways, to stimulate production in every way possible. As regards foreign countries, it is obvious that we cannot submit suggestions for the development of their pastoral industries. Altogether, in this part of our report, we are forced to restrict ourselves to very limited proposals. We think it well to take each part of the British Dominions, and also foreign countries, separately.

THE BRITISH EMPIRE.

Beef.

8. Canada.—Canada is most anxious to resume the exportation of store cattle to the United Kingdom, and we think that this method of developing the export trade is likely to prove suited to the needs of the Dominion. At the Imperial War Conference of 1917 the subject of the present exclusion of Canadian cattle was fully discussed, and Mr. Prothero stated that "we do not believe that there is now, or has been for a good many years past, the slightest ground to exclude Canadian cattle on the score of disease." We recommend that the Imperial Government should arrange to accept a veterinary examination of cattle for export at the port of shipment. As soon as shipping is available we see no reason why there should not ensue a considerable trade in store cattle.

9. Australia and New Zealand.—Queensland is pre-eminently the beef-exporting State of the Commonwealth, and, with the exception of West Australia and the Northern Territory, it is there that development for export is most promising. Both in Australia and in New Zealand, however, the beef industry is a well-established one, and its natural progress, together with the incentive of high prices during the war, has raised the export from Australia from 67,000 tons in 1913 to 99,000 tons in 1917; and that from New Zealand from 12,000 tons in 1913 to 53,000 tons in 1916, and to 44,000 tons (including unshipped beef) in 1917, a year when tonnage was short. Further development must necessarily depend on increase of population and opening up of the countries, both of which matters raise questions of policy with which we are not directly concerned. In so far, however, as development of the meat industry depends on the supply of railway and other material and plant from the United Kingdom, we recommend that, after the war, priority should be given to the needs of the various parts of the Commonwealth and of the Dominion over demands coming from other sources.

10. Union of South Africa.—As regards internal development, the problem in the Union is much the same as in Australia and New Zealand, and what has been said above as to supplies of material from the United Kingdom applies here also. One most serious difficulty in the way of an export trade in beef has been, however, the absence of a proper service of meat-carrying ships. Producers have complained of lack of tonnage and shipowners of uncertainty of cargo. We deal with this problem under the heading of transport.

11. Rhodesia.—This territory undoubtedly possesses considerable possibilities as a cattle-producing country, but the problem in Rhodesia, even more than in the Union of South Africa, is one of improving the means of land transport, and the foregoing remarks as to supplies of material from the United Kingdom could well apply. The farmers are at present aiming at the creation of an export trade by the erection of a co-operative canning works. If shipping facilities for the Union of South Africa be increased they should be made available for Rhodesia also.

12. Nigeria.—In Nigeria the Northern Provinces alone are of importance from the point of view of the production of beef, but all the territory has been declared by law "native lands" to be administered for the use and common benefit of the natives, and there is, accordingly, no prospect of extensive concessions to Europeans for ranching. The Colonial Office has advised us that there is practically no possibility of Nigeria being able, within the next five or six years, to supply even the British West African Colonies with beef, still less to start an export trade to the United Kingdom. It would seem that the most effective means of progress is to develop the veterinary branch of the Agricultural Department, and if possible to initiate experiments in crossing native cattle, particularly humped cattle, with imported European cattle.

13. East Africa.—The beef products of the East Africa Protectorate are sufficient to provide for the ordinary requirements of the region, but we are informed by the Colonial Office that progress in the direction of export trade must necessarily be slow. As in Nigeria the question turns chiefly on the protection of native rights. We understand that in the East Africa Protectorate, as well as in Nyasaland, Government farms have been established where breeding experiments have been conducted, and we would urge that these experiments should be continued and extended with particular reference to the production of cattle satisfactory from the beef point of view.

Mutton.

14. Many of the remarks in the foregoing paragraphs apply to the case of mutton and lamb. There is, however, an essential difference between the case of mutton and that of beef in that, as we have shown, much the larger share of imported supplies of mutton comes already from within the Empire. We think Australia and New Zealand should, within the next few years, be able to supply the whole of the requirements of the British Empire in the way of mutton and lamb, and we need only mention as additional potential sources of supply the Union of South Africa and the Falkland Islands. Possibilities also exist in Nigeria and East Africa, and we suggest that experiments should be undertaken as to the crossing of native with European sheep.

Pork, Bacon, and Hams.

15. The proportion of the supplies of imported pig products which come from within the Empire is so small that we think it out of the question to propose detailed schemes of development which would have any prospect of making the Empire self-sufficing in this respect. Expansion of Imperial supplies must be left to the natural growth of agriculture in the various parts of the Empire and in particular to the progress of closer settlement in the self-governing Dominions, especially in Canada.

FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

Beef.

16. United States.—The attraction of high prices and, latterly, deliberate abstention from consumption have brought the United States again into the ranks of exporting nations, but although its capacity for increased beef production is not by any means exhausted, we have to reckon with the possibility that after the war the growth of population may not only absorb all the beef produced in the country, but also cause a resort, as in 1913-15, to importation. In 1915, about 50,000 tons of meat were imported from the River Plate and the contracts made between the meat companies and the shipping companies contemplate that at an early date the imports into the United States might exceed 100,000 tons per annum.

17. Argentine and Uruguay.—So far as the United Kingdom is concerned the problem is not alone one of increasing the aggregate output of the Argentine Republic and Uruguay, but of securing control of a larger share of the trade, and that problem will be considered later. Of the two States the industry in Uruguay is the less developed, but American companies are now erecting additional works. For practical purposes the exportable surplus of the River Plate may be put at between 600,000 and 700,000 tons a year in the near future, or about double the pre-war export. In 1916 it was 494,000 tons and somewhat less in 1917.

18. Brazil.—Brazil with about 30,000,000 cattle is one of the great beef-producing countries of the future, though its output is now only about 60,000 tons a year. Much has to be done to improve the breed of cattle before the beef produced is of the quality appreciated in British markets, and as Brazilian beef has so far chiefly found acceptance in France and Italy it is, from the immediate point of view, rather as a means of meeting the continental demand than as furnishing an increase in British supplies that the development of Brazil has to be considered. In view, however, of the rapidity with which Brazil is being opened up, the problem of promptly securing for British companies an adequate share in that development must be considered with the similar problem in other parts of South America.

19. Colombia.—The cattle resources of this State are now being explored by a British company and appear capable of a moderate export of perhaps 2,000 tons a month.

20. Venezuela.—There is one meat-works in this country which appears capable of dealing with the output, which under favourable circumstances might rise to 10,000 or 15,000 tons of beef a year for export.

21. Madagascar.—The present productive capacity of the meat-works is about 8,000 tons of beef per annum, all available for export, and it is probable that after the war the French Government will endeavour to develop the resources of their colony to the fullest.

22. China.—Manchuria and the Yangtze valley are new sources of beef supply that have been developed during the war, and have proved useful in helping to provision Italy. The effect of the withdrawal (for war purposes) of all insulated tonnage from the Far East, and the difficulties of exchange, make it hard for us to estimate what will be the situation on the restoration of peace, but the existence of this new source of good beef must not be left out of account.

Mutton.

23. South America.—The exports of mutton from Argentine and Uruguay have, owing to the greater attractiveness of the beef trade, been stationary or decreasing. The southern portions of the Argentine and Chilian Patagonia are exclusively sheep-rearing districts, but the possibilities of their development are not great enough to produce any effect on the vastly superior capacity of Australia and New Zealand.

24. Netherlands.—The Netherlands have always in the proper season given a small but not unimportant supply of fresh mutton to the London market, and, though that has latterly been interrupted by war conditions, it will probably be renewed.

Pig-Meat.

25. Denmark and the Netherlands.—Before the war Denmark was the chief source of supply of bacon to the United Kingdom, and the Netherlands of fresh pork. Although war conditions have compelled a great reduction of the pig herds of these countries and a consequent reduction of British supplies, the pig is so prolific an animal and the energy of the Danish bacon producers is so great that the trade will probably before long be restored to its former proportions.

26. United States.—The United States are the chief suppliers of imported hams and are second only to Denmark as suppliers of bacon. Their capacity to export will be limited only by the demands of their own population and by the power of Canada and Denmark to compete.

27. China.—China is the one new source of pork and bacon production which the war has brought forward. At present the capacity for export is about 30,000 tons a year, but the possibilities are quite unexplored, and what has been said about the difficulties of exporting Chinese beef in paragraph 22 applies equally to Chinese pork and bacon.

II.—THE PROBLEM OF TRANSPORT.

28. Bacon and hams, except in unusually hot weather, can with proper stowage and ventilation be carried in ordinary cargo space, and their transport need not concern us specially. Fresh beef, mutton, and pork, must, on the other hand, be conveyed in steamers equipped with refrigerating plant, and, though for practical purposes no account need be taken of the small imports of frozen pork, the transport of beef and mutton gives rise to special problems. Leaving out of account the Atlantic liners and the insulated steamers sailing between Australia, New Zealand, and the Pacific coast of North America, we estimate that if the British insulated steamers now afloat were put back into their proper trades, and were run under commercial conditions (due provision being made for the trade in dairy produce, rabbits, and fruit from Australia and New Zealand), they would not, even under the most favourable circumstances, be able to transport to the United Kingdom more than a million tons of meat in the year.* This is a theoretic figure from which in practice heavy deductions would have to be made, especially since steamers arriving in Australia and New Zealand at certain seasons do not find any meat waiting and have to carry general cargo in their insulated spaces. British insulated steamers now under construction and likely to be completed within the next two years would under similar conditions be able to carry about 200,000 tons of meat in 12 months. Against this new construction must, however, be set the losses that will occur before restoration of peace, either by enemy action or marine accident. In addition to British tonnage, the annual meat-carrying capacity of French and Italian insulated steamers now afloat will be under peace conditions about 130,000 tons. This carrying capacity may be compared with the requirements of the Allied importing countries and with the exporting capacity of the producing countries.

29. The United Kingdom imported 755,000 tons of frozen beef, mutton, and lamb in the 12 months ended 31st July 1914, and its probable post-war requirements may run to 750,000 or 800,000 tons a year. France and Italy will probably end the war with a reduction of not less than 5,000,000 cattle and 7,000,000 sheep in their herds and flocks. This is equivalent to about 1,400,000 tons of meat, and allowing five years for recovery would necessitate an importation of 250,000 tons a year during that period. The population of Belgium will have to be fed for some years, while the country is being restocked, and the same is true of Serbia. What this may require is a matter of pure speculation, but it cannot be much short of 200,000 tons a year. Finally, the United States may require about 100,000 tons a year. A conservative estimate of needs would thus yield us a total of about 1,300,000 tons a year.†

30. Turning to supplies, we may expect in the near future, provided that shipping tonnage is available where and when it is required, about 700,000 or 800,000 tons (of which about one-eighth will be mutton) a year from South America, about 350,000 tons a year from Australia and New Zealand (140,000 tons beef and 210,000 tons mutton and lamb), and from 50,000 to 100,000 tons (mainly beef) from other sources, altogether from 1,100,000 to 1,250,000 tons a year.

31. It is, however, clear that there will be a shortage of shipping tonnage, and that, unless there is an increase of shipbuilding on a fairly extensive scale, production will be hampered and the provisioning of the Allied peoples will be subject to the risk of high freights and high meat prices. The cost of shipbuilding after the war will for some time continue to be higher than it was before the war, and it may be that if building of insulated ships on private account is not economically possible the Government may have to step in to ensure the national food supplies.

32. The owners of refrigerated tonnage in the Plate trade will have to carry out contracts for five or ten years made when the costs of operation were far below what they will be at the end of the war, and, unless the Imperial Government intervenes, will have to run at a loss or make fresh terms with the meat companies; the latter course might conceivably reduce the supplies of the United Kingdom by diverting them to higher-priced markets.

33. We accordingly recommend:—

(a) That all insulated steamers at present under construction or on order should be completed as speedily as possible, and that during the first five years after the war priority should be given for the construction of insulated steamers for British owners sufficient to convey exports of meat from the producing countries up to the amount needed to meet the needs of the Empire and the Allies.

(b) That the construction of insulated ships for foreign owners and the sale or transference—fictitious or genuine—of British insulated ships to foreign control should be prohibited during the "reconstruction period" except with Government permission.

(c) That for a period after the end of the war the Imperial Government should control insulated ships registered in the United Kingdom and the Dominion Governments insulated ships registered in the Dominions so that the Imperial Government and the

* Before the war a larger fleet of insulated steamers transported only about 750,000 tons of meat.

† In addition, the needs of the Central Empires and their present or future meat-carrying capacity will have to be borne in mind, but with this problem we do not deal.

Oversea Governments acting in concert in all matters affecting both the United Kingdom and the Oversea Dominions might be able, when necessary, to determine the cargo to be carried, the movement of the ships, and the rates of freights.

(d) That so far as insulated steamers are suitable for service on the respective routes, they should be so used as to give a priority to meat produced within the Empire, subject always to the need for bringing to the United Kingdom a full supply of beef.

(e) That, if Government control of shipping should come to an end, shipowners should be forbidden to charge different rates on refrigerated produce to large and to small shippers at the same time for the same service. We would also urge that it is in the interests of shipowners themselves that freight rates on refrigerated produce should be fixed from time to time in consultation with various groups of shippers, with, where necessary, the friendly assistance of the Governments concerned.

34. The Union of South Africa is in a special position, in that there is not at present an adequate service of insulated ships to the United Kingdom.* The problem of supplying the required service is entirely a business one, which we hope the Union Government will at once proceed to examine in detail with the shipping lines. Elsewhere we make recommendations which would enable the Imperial Government to offer the Union Government a guaranteed market for the meat during the years following the war.

III.—SUPERVISION OF PRODUCTION AND DISTRIBUTION.

35. In connection with recent developments in the meat industry, the matter which has attracted most public attention and aroused most alarm is the alleged attempts of the organisation known as the "American Beef Trust" to obtain control over Imperial supplies. Some account of its activities is, therefore, necessary.

"The American Beef Trust."

36. As far back as 1890 an inquiry was held by the United States Senate, and their Committee reported that the beef business in the United States was mainly in the hands of the Armour, Hammond, Morris, and Swift Companies, which acted in unison to reduce the price of cattle and to fix the price of beef. The Bureau of Corporations found that in 1903 the six companies of Armour, Swift, Morris, National Packing, Sulzberger, and Cudahy slaughtered 45 per cent. of all the cattle in the United States and supplied from 50 to 75 per cent. of the beef consumed in the eastern cities. Armour, Swift, and Morris owned the National Co. (a combination of Hammond and other firms) and were believed to act closely together both in the purchase of cattle and in the sale of beef. Sulzberger and Cudahy were independent, but in 1915 the Sulzberger Co. was brought under the control of financial houses in which Armour and Swift were interested.

The National Packing Co. was dissolved and its member-firms redistributed between Armour, Swift, and Morris in 1912. There is a considerable amount of evidence as to agreements about price, allotment of output, division of markets in the States, and concerted purchasing, but there has been no proof of a formal combination. The arrangement between Armour, Swift, Morris, and Sulzberger (now Wilson) is of the nature of a "gentlemen's agreement," and, while a certain amount of efficiency competition among branches is allowed, it is never permitted to go too far. The capital of the four companies is well in excess of 24,000,000*l.* sterling. During the time when the United States was the chief supplier of beef to the United Kingdom these leading American companies controlled all the refrigerated beef coming into the United Kingdom from the United States and a large proportion of the live cattle. Their London representatives used to meet regularly to fix prices, but some time before 1908 the meetings ceased, or at least became less formal. In 1907 the American companies entered the River Plate, and, after severe price-wars, in 1911 and 1913-14 they reduced the British and native companies to a position of subordination, raising their own share of the trade from 46 to 62 per cent. and reducing the British share from 31 to 27 per cent. During the war the Imperial Government arranged for the reopening of the Las Palmas works belonging to one of the British companies, and the American share of the Plate trade has fallen to about 60 per cent. In 1913 the American companies controlled 55.6 per cent. of the imported beef supply of the United Kingdom. They own about 31 per cent. of the mutton output of Patagonia, and about a third of the output of Brazil. Swift & Co. are building new works in Paraguay and Brazil, and Armour & Co. in Patagonia, Uruguay, and Brazil.

Swift and Armour have branch companies in Canada owning one-sixth of the cold storage space of the abattoirs and packing houses. In Australia, Swift's have a company which owns two works in Queensland, with a killing capacity of rather less than one-fourth of that of the whole State. Armour & Co. have close business relations with certain of the Australian meat companies and have gone beyond the ordinary practice of buying c.i.f. cargoes by buying in 1914 the whole output of one company's works for seven months and the greater portion of the output of another company's works.* Armour & Co. in 1917 acquired a meat-trading company in New Zealand, but have no share in any freezing works; they buy for export a large number of sheep and lambs, and have them killed and frozen at works belonging to other companies.

* The Mail Contract between the Union Government and the Union Castle Line stipulates that the freight on frozen mutton and lamb shall be 1*d.* per lb., and that the freight on chilled beef shall be the same as the current Argentine rate, subject to the shippers contracting for a series of voyages. The shipping company must provide at least 18,000 cubic feet of cool space in each mail steamer for all kinds of refrigerated produce.

37. It will be seen from the foregoing that the associated American companies operate differently in the various countries where they are established. In the United States they buy cattle, kill, and sell; in South America they buy cattle and sheep and produce chilled and frozen meat for export; in Canada two of them have extensive cold storage; in Australia one American company has freezing works and another is an extensive buyer of frozen meat, while the latter company also buys stock in New Zealand and has the animals killed and frozen on commission; in the United Kingdom they sell imported meat through wholesale branches and agencies distributed over the country. Consequently, while those companies have great opportunities of dominating the beef trade everywhere, they must be dealt with differently according to the circumstances under which they operate, according to whether their dealings affect most the producer or the consumer, and whether they operate within the British Empire or in foreign countries.

Control by the Oversea Governments.

38. The Oversea Dominions are still in the main primary producers, and their first concern in connection with meat supplies is to protect the interests of their farmers. Where, however, as has actually happened, a foreign firm establishes a subordinate company and offers, for the time being, higher prices than the market warrants in order to get together a large connection, there are strong grounds for fearing that, especially if other companies do the same, the same results would follow as have happened in the Western States of America, and the large buyers would ultimately drive the small independent buyers out of business and so be able to fix the prices of stock to the detriment of the farming community. A formal or informal combination of companies for export trade would be formed, and would probably bring with it a domination of local meat markets in the Dominion concerned, forcing up meat prices to the cost of the consumer as well as reducing cattle prices to the loss of the producer. Quite apart, however, from the intervention of foreign companies, there is also the possibility that a domestic combination might arise which might be in a position to exploit both producer and consumer. It seems clear that some Government control is necessary.†

39. The first step in control of the meat industry in the common interests is that all freezing works, cold-storage companies, meat-exporting companies or firms, and also the buyers or agents for non-resident companies should be licensed by the Dominion or State Government concerned, and only allowed to do business on specified conditions. In the case of freezing works and cold-storage companies, these should be—

(a) That a specified proportion of the killing, freezing, and storage space should, on formal application by the farmers or traders to the Government, be reserved for custom trade, and the companies to the extent of that space should be compelled to kill, freeze, and store on commission for all-comers.

(b) The rates for killing, freezing, and storing should not be subject to any rebates, allowances, or discounts special to particular firms or companies, and should, for each local territory, be subject to the approval of the Government concerned.

(c) Periodical returns should be made to the Government concerned, showing the numbers of stock killed, the persons on whose account business was done, and any other particulars required by that Government.

All buyers of stock for freezing or of refrigerated meat for sale or export should be—

(a) Required to furnish such returns as the Government concerned may order relating to the stock bought, prices paid, &c.

(b) Subject to withdrawal of their licence on proof being given before a judicial or quasi-judicial authority, set up for the purpose, that they have acquired or are attempting to acquire a monopoly, either of purchase or of sale, prejudicial to the common interests.

40. We also suggest that a Dominion or State Government might find occasion to acquire or control one or more meat works for killing, freezing and storing meat, both on account of that Government and on commission, as a means of checking costs and prices, and also, on occasion, of countering monopolistic manoeuvres.

41. These proposals may serve as a basis for permanent control of the meat industry, if such control is found necessary. Until experience has been had of their working we are not disposed to urge the adoption of more drastic measures of a permanent character. But we are forced to recognise that the first few years after the restoration of peace will not be a period of normal trading. War conditions, both in the United Kingdom and in the Dominions, will continue for some time; special measures will probably have to be taken for the allocation of meat supplies among the Allies; whilst the shortage of tonnage will make it essential that it should be used to the best advantage and in the common interest. The great necessity of the immediate future is that the production of meat, which has been increased during the war, should be still further augmented and directed to the right quarters, and that risk of violent fluctuations of prices in a disturbed market should be avoided. It is important that the producer should have that feeling of security which is necessary for the expansion of business. Both the producing and freezing interests will know that the trust danger is hanging over them. The American companies are wealthy enough to enable them to tide over any difficult times in which smaller companies would go to the wall, and there will be reason to fear that they may seize the opportunity of obtaining control of the production of meat.

42. In these circumstances we suggest that it might be advisable that, during the period of reconstruction, the system of State purchase of the exportable surplus of meat, which has been in existence for the last three years in Australia and New Zealand, should be continued and extended to the other Dominions producing meat. This would require the consent and co-operation of the Imperial and Oversea Governments, and involves the question of the distribution of the meat in the United Kingdom or other importing portions of the Empire, and also the allocation of part of the supplies to other countries. Here we deal only with the purchase of the meat. By negotiation between the Imperial Government and the Oversea Government concerned prices should be fixed at which the latter should buy from the freezing works the exportable surplus of all meat and "sundries," subject to the provisions of paragraphs 52 and 53. These prices should be based on cost of production plus a rate of profit commensurate with the usual local return to capital and reasonably sufficient to stimulate additional production (see also paragraph 47). The establishment of State freezing works, as suggested in paragraph 40, might assist in the determination of costs and prices.

43. We have not thought it possible to define by a specific number of years the period following the war referred to as the reconstruction period, as its length must depend on circumstances which we are not able to forecast. It is sufficient for us to say here that the course of events during that period, and the working of the proposals which we have put forward, should be carefully watched, since, after some time, it may be possible and desirable to revert to normal conditions of trading, or to relax the control by substituting for the full system of State purchase a more limited scheme.

Government Control in the United Kingdom.

44. Proceeding on parallel lines with the action suggested in the Dominions, we recommend that the Imperial Government should take powers to license all importers of meat, and that these licences should be revocable for action contrary to the interests of the community. In order to ensure equality of treatment to all persons desiring to store refrigerated produce in a public warehouse, the Government should also take powers to control, where necessary, the use of cold stores in the interests of the community. Returns of produce stored, the names of the owners, and the periods for which the goods are held in store, should be kept by the warehouse keepers, and should be open at all times to Government inspection. Steps should also be taken, where necessary, to ensure that dock accommodation (including warehouses) should be sufficient for the prompt discharge of ships, and that suitable provision is made for the speedy delivery of meat to markets in good condition.

45. We would also call attention to an incidental advantage which will follow from the purchase by the Imperial Government of the exportable surplus of meat from the Oversea Dominions during the transition period. In ordinary course certain Departments of the Imperial Government—in particular, the Admiralty and War Office—and also municipal and other local institutions are large buyers of meat, and much economy in the ordinary expenditure of those bodies has resulted from the utilisation of the contracts made during the war by the Imperial Government, while the removal of such large buyers from the ordinary markets has had a moderating effect. In the arrangements for the post-war distribution of any meat purchased by the Imperial Government, the needs of the various Government Departments and local authorities will no doubt be supplied direct, and considerable savings should result.

46. The general distribution of meat purchased from the Dominions during the transitional period should be controlled by the Imperial Government, at least as far as wholesale transactions are concerned, and in this the existing trade organisations should be utilised and extended so that no part of the country should be left without supplies of meat produced within the Empire. The freezing works for themselves or their clients should continue to recommend (as they have done during the war period) the houses through whose hands they wish their products to pass; so that, at the termination of the State purchase scheme, trade connections may be maintained, but these recommendations should be subject to the approval of the Imperial Government, and before granting this approval any representations of the Oversea Government concerned should be taken into account. When the meat has been released to these importing houses, they should, as agents for the Imperial Government, undertake its distribution to the wholesale houses or to retailers according to previous practice, subject to any limitation on the amount of sales to individual firms which the Imperial Government might impose. The wholesalers should, in turn, undertake the distribution to the retail trade. The agents should, as at present, receive a commission on their sales, or its equivalent in a fixed rate per lb., and wholesalers should be limited to a definite rate of profit per lb. above the price at which the meat was bought from the agents.* Both agents and wholesalers should hold their books open to inspection and furnish regularly summary particulars of their transactions; for breach of the regulations they would be liable to be struck off the lists of agents and wholesalers.

* At present agents receive 1 per cent. on ex ship sales and 2 per cent. on other sales, while wholesalers are allowed 4d. per lb. gross addition to the price at which meat is sold to them. The latter is higher than in pre-war time, to compensate the wholesalers for their much smaller turnover.

47. The meat would thus be delivered to the retailer at a price compounded of the landed cost of the meat, the expense of internal distribution, and administrative charges. Further, the wholesale prices of the meat should bear a proper relation, quality for quality, to Plate meat, and should this involve a profit, that profit should be divided in proportions to be agreed between the Imperial Government and the sellers of the meat in the Dominions. Competition among butchers would probably result in retail prices being kept at a level which would not allow the retailers to make undue profit. It will be the policy of the Government to keep wholesale prices as low as possible, but should there be a shortage of meat a butcher should not be allowed to gain by buying cheap from the Government and selling dear to the consumer. In any such case, the Government will have the power to refuse supplies.

Control of South American Meat Supplies.

48. The great bulk of imported mutton and lamb will be obtained from Imperial sources, but as has already been pointed out, the United Kingdom is and must continue for some time to be dependent on foreign countries, principally the Argentine and Uruguay, for the great bulk of its imported beef supply. The main problem is how to act so as to strengthen British companies against undue foreign competition and to protect British markets at home from foreign control.

The present position in the Argentine and Uruguay is that two British companies, the British and Argentine Meat Company, Limited, and the Smithfield and Argentine Meat Company, Limited (including the Las Palmas works of the former company), produce about 20 per cent. of the present output. In addition, there are the works opened in the summer of 1916, owned by Vestey Brothers, Limited, a registered English company controlled by Sir William and Mr. E. H. Vestey who reside in Chicago, and their share of the present output is about 7 per cent. of the whole.

49. The Las Palmas works of the British and Argentine Meat Co., Ltd., have been run by that company on behalf of the Board of Trade on profit-sharing terms, and a large profit has accrued to the Imperial Government during the war. This experience shows that, when business has been conducted on the same terms which the American companies secured, it has been free from risk; in addition, the Government has obtained an insight into the costs of operation which could not have been got otherwise, and has been of great value in controlling contract prices.

50. In our opinion the most effective methods of securing an adequate share of the South American meat supplies for the United Kingdom are either the establishment of meat works owned by the Imperial Government or the strengthening of British companies at present operating there. Proceeding on the accepted method of utilising existing institutions, we propose that the Imperial Government should guarantee to all purely British companies (including Vestey Brothers, Limited, if they made such arrangements as would ensure that their works were fully under British and not under foreign control) a fair return on their capital. In return these companies would be required to terminate all their engagements with the other meat companies, and to place themselves fully under the control of the Imperial Government. They would be bound to produce meat in the quantities specified, and to place it on the market under specified conditions. With the quantities of South American and Colonial meat thus at their disposal, the Imperial Government would be in a position to regulate the market and to counter any price-raising manoeuvres. Probably, subject to a general supervision, it would be sufficient to leave the companies liberty of action so long as the ordinary dividend earned did not exceed a specified rate, the surplus above the guaranteed minimum being shared equally by the companies and the Government. The Government share of the earnings might then be kept as a contingency and development fund. The foreign companies operating in the Plate would not be able to sell at prices above those resulting from the controlled trading of the British companies, for if they tried to sell dear they would lose trade. On the other hand, if by more efficient methods they could fairly undersell the British companies, the latter would have to meet their prices and would be forced by the reduction in their dividend to improve their methods. The detail work of distribution might be left to the companies, but they should be encouraged and might be helped to extend their organisation so that no part of the country might be left to be supplied with imported meat solely by foreign companies (compare paragraph 46). It is the general opinion of the trade that the foreign companies would cease to be unfairly aggressive once they knew that the Imperial Government was behind the British companies, but if that expectation proved incorrect, the British companies with the Government behind them would be in a better position than their opponents to face a price-war as (following our recommendations in paragraph 33) the Imperial Government would be in control of all insulated shipping registered in the United Kingdom. The guarantee scheme here outlined would, of course, be for a term of years, at the end of which it could be abandoned or modified.

British Development of new Countries.

51. The encouragement of the opening up of new sources of supply by British capital should also engage the attention of the Imperial Government, especially in the case of Brazil. That country has over 30,000,000 cattle, and is recognised as being one of the great beef exporting countries of the future. If it becomes a greater and cheaper source of beef supply than the Plate, and is left to foreign exploitation, the same position of British dependence on foreign companies may develop as is found in the Plate trade to-day. Wilson and Company (one of the American companies) and Vestey's (whose proprietors reside in Chicago) are already operating in Brazil, and Swift and Armour are building works, while only one British company is producing frozen meat, and that under disadvantageous circumstances. We strongly urge that the Imperial Government should encourage and, in case of need, assist British companies to build meat works in Brazil or other good cattle countries, subject to the same conditions of control of production and distribution as those suggested for the support of British companies in the Argentine.

Supply of Meat to Parts of the British Empire, other than the United Kingdom.

52. Australia and New Zealand have a growing trade with Canada in mutton and lamb, and they also export meat to Hong Kong, the Straits Settlements, Ceylon, Egypt, and Malta. It is obviously undesirable that this trade should be stopped in the interests of the United Kingdom, and we accordingly recommend that the Imperial Government should leave the terms and conditions on which any such trade should be carried on to be settled directly by the Governments concerned.

Trade between the Empire and Foreign Countries.

53. Before the war a small trade in meat was done by Australia with Italy, but the importation of meat into France from Australia and New Zealand was seriously hampered by a differential duty in favour of Argentine meat, by a surcharge d'entrepôt on re-exportations from the United Kingdom, and also by certain inspection regulations. There is also a small export to Manila and Honolulu. In our opinion it would be a mistake to attempt to reserve the meat produced within the Empire exclusively for the use of the Empire, even during the reconstruction period, with which our main recommendations deal. It is plain that if provision be not made for the development of Dominion trade with foreign countries during that period, the exporting Dominions would at its expiry be at a disadvantage in any endeavour they might then make to secure a share of the Continental and American trade after the Argentine, Brazil, &c. had been able to get a firm footing. This is a contingency of which account should clearly be taken beforehand, and it is particularly important in the case of mutton and lamb, since the productive power of Australia and New Zealand is likely soon to outrun the absorptive capacity of the United Kingdom. Even if the result should be that for a time the United Kingdom should be thrown more on to foreign countries for supplies—and this could only happen to a small extent—we think that in the allocation of meat supplies to France, Italy, and our other Allies it should be made a condition that a reasonable quantity should be drawn from British Dominions. As a very large proportion of the total supplies to be allotted would have to be transported from the countries of origin to the countries of importation in British ships, the Imperial and Overseas Governments will obviously be in a favourable position to make such arrangements in conducting the negotiations. What the proportion of supplies from British Dominions should be we are not in a position to determine; it can only be settled by negotiation between the several Allied Governments with the Imperial Government and the Dominion Governments. When the quantities have been settled, it might be advisable that they (like those referred to in paragraph 52) should be excluded from the purchases made by the Imperial Government from the Overseas Governments, and that the financial arrangements should be made directly between the latter and the Allied Governments concerned. The Imperial Government, however, will come in again in connection with the transport of the meat, since it will, for example, frequently be desirable that the same steamer from Australia or New Zealand should take a part cargo to Marseilles or Havre and a part cargo to London; all such details are susceptible of easy settlement. We would emphasise that it should be a condition of the arrangements set out above that all discriminations against meat from the British Empire, whether imported directly or indirectly, should be permanently removed. Incidentally the call of British insulated ships at continental ports with necessary supplies should afford an excellent means of securing return cargoes for British ships, and we suggest that foreign Governments should be approached with the object of their co-operating in this matter.

IV.—SUBSIDIARY QUESTIONS.

54. There are certain subsidiary questions which we consider important but not requiring elaboration, since their desirability is, to us, obvious.

Among these are—

- (a) The confining of Government and municipal contracts to the British Empire or to British firms operating in foreign countries.
- (b) The establishment of a satisfactory system of grading of meat in each of the exporting Dominions.
- (c) The establishment of a system of inspection in the producing countries which will be satisfactory to the importing countries, and of a uniform system of meat inspection in the United Kingdom.
- (d) The improvement of stock in the exporting countries by the importation of breeding animals of good quality, and the grant of facilities for the export of such stock from the United Kingdom.

V.—ADMINISTRATIVE MACHINERY.

55. The proposals sketched out above will, of course, involve new legislation, and will require complete co-operation between the Imperial Government and the Governments of the Oversea Dominions. Executive machinery will have to be set up both in the United Kingdom and in the Dominions, but with its details we do not here concern ourselves, except to recommend that the practical conduct of the work will require, especially in the United Kingdom, that part of the staff should consist of men with business training.

VI.—SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS.

56. In framing this Report, we have had in view an indefinite period following the war which may be called the "reconstruction period." We cannot forecast what the length of this period will be, and we can only urge that the course of events and the working of our proposals should be carefully watched, since after some time it may be practicable to substitute some more limited scheme of control even before it is possible to revert to normal conditions of trading. To conclude, we may summarise our recommendations as follows:—

1.—Development of Sources of Supply.

1. The acceptance by the Imperial Government of a veterinary examination of cattle for export from Canada at the port of shipment, so as to further the exportation of store cattle to the United Kingdom (paragraph 8).
2. The grant of priority for the supply of railway and other material and plant from the United Kingdom to the Dominions (paragraphs 9, 10 and 11).
3. The development of the Agricultural Departments of Nigeria and East Africa and the initiation of experiments in the crossing of native cattle and sheep with European breeds (paragraphs 12, 13 and 14).

2.—Oversea Transport.

1. The speedy completion of insulated steamers now under construction or on order, and the grant of priority during the first five years after the war for the construction of insulated steamers for British owners, sufficient to carry the imported meat required by the Empire and the Allies (paragraph 33 (a)).
2. The prohibition of the sale or transfer of British insulated ships to foreign control during the reconstruction period except with Government permission (paragraph 33 (b)).
3. The control of insulated ships by the Imperial and Dominion Governments, acting in concert in all matters affecting both the United Kingdom and the Oversea Dominions, during the reconstruction period, so as to ensure, where necessary, the determination of the cargo, of the movements of the ships, and of the rates of freight (paragraph 33 (c)).
4. The use of British insulated ships so as to give a priority to meat produced within the Empire, subject to the suitability of the ships for the service proposed and to the need for bringing to the United Kingdom a full supply of beef (paragraph 33 (d)).
5. When Government control terminates, shipowners should be forbidden to charge differential rates on refrigerated produce to large and small shippers at the same time for the same service; shipowners are also recommended then to fix rates from time to time in consultation with groups of shippers, with, where necessary, the friendly assistance of the Government concerned (paragraph 33 (e)).
6. The investigation by the Government of the Union of South Africa, in co-operation with the shipping lines, of the business problem of providing South Africa with a sufficient service of insulated ships (paragraph 34).

3.—Supervision of Production and Distribution.

(a) Control by the Oversea Governments.

1. The licensing of freezing works and cold stores, subject to the reservation where required, of part of their space for custom trade; to the approval by the Government concerned of the rates for killing, freezing, and storing; to the prohibition of special rebates; and to the furnishing of statistical returns (paragraph 39).
2. The licensing of meat exporting companies or firms and of buyers or agents for non-resident companies, subject to the furnishing of statistical returns, and to the withdrawal of the licences on proof that the holders have acquired or attempted to acquire a monopoly of purchase or sale (paragraph 39).
3. The acquisition or control by a Dominion or State Government of one or more meat-works, should occasion render that course desirable (paragraph 40).
4. The continuation, during the period of reconstruction, of the system of State purchase of the exportable surplus of meat which has been in existence in Australia and New Zealand, and its possible extension to other Dominions producing meat. The Oversea Government concerned should purchase the meat from the freezing works on behalf of the Imperial Government at prices returning to the producer a fair profit over cost (paragraph 42). After a period it might be possible to relax or abandon this control of trade (paragraph 43).

(b) Government Control in the United Kingdom.

1. The licensing of importers of meat; the control, where necessary, of the use of the cold stores; the obtaining of the necessary statistical returns; the provision of sufficient dock accommodation and of means of transporting meat to the market (paragraph 44).

2. During the reconstruction period the control by the Imperial Government of the distribution of the meat purchased from the Dominions. The meat should be distributed through the ordinary channels of trade, the "importing houses" and wholesale houses working subject to conditions laid down by the Government, and at fixed rates of remuneration. Wholesale prices should bear a proper relation to the prices of Plate meat, and any resulting profit should be divided between the Imperial Government and the sellers of meat in the Dominions. Supplies of meat may be refused to traders who exploit the consumer (paragraphs 46 and 47).

(c) Control of South American Meat Supplies.

The guarantee to purely British meat companies operating in the Plate of a fair return on their capital, the surplus above that rate and below a fixed maximum being shared equally between the companies and the Government. In return the companies would be required to terminate their engagements with the other meat companies and place themselves under the control of the Imperial Government, producing meat in quantities specified from time to time, and placing it on the market under specified conditions (paragraph 50).

(d) British Development of new Countries.

The encouragement and assistance of British companies to build meat-works in Brazil or other good cattle countries, subject to the conditions of control specified in the preceding paragraph (paragraph 51).

(e) Supply of Meat to Parts of the Empire other than the United Kingdom.

The supply of meat from the Dominions to parts of the Empire other than the United Kingdom should be settled by negotiation between the Governments concerned (paragraph 52).

(f) Trade between the Empire and Foreign Countries.

The allocation of meat supplies to the Allied countries should be settled by negotiation between those Governments and the Imperial and Dominion Governments. Conditions of this allocation should be the assurance to the Dominions of a reasonable share of the trade with the Allies during the reconstruction period, the permanent removal of all discriminations against meat from the British Empire, and the facilitation of return cargoes for British steamers (paragraph 53).

4.—Subsidiary Questions (Paragraph 54).

1. The confining of Government and municipal contracts to the British Empire or to British firms operating in foreign countries.

2. The establishment of a satisfactory system of grading of meat in each of the exporting Dominions.

3. The establishment of a system of inspection in the producing countries which will be satisfactory to the importing countries, and of a uniform system of inspection in the United Kingdom.

4. The improvement of stock in the exporting countries by the importation of breeding animals of good quality, and the grant of facilities for the export of such stock from the United Kingdom.

5.—Administrative Machinery (Paragraph 55).

Not only will new legislation be involved, but new executive machinery will have to be set up both in the United Kingdom and in the Oversea Dominions.

Enemy Debts.

MEMORANDUM PREPARED IN THE TREASURY.

[See discussion on pp. 90-93.]

On 13th November 1916, a Committee was appointed by the Treasury:

"To report on the arrangements to be adopted for the liquidation of the commercial, banking, and other financial transactions between British and enemy persons the completion of which was prevented by the outbreak of war, and for this purpose to consider the returns made to the Custodians of Enemy Property and to the Public Trustee and the Foreign Claims Office, and any information on matters relating thereto."

An interim report was made by the Committee on 4th April, 1917, which was circulated to the Dominions.

The Committee have now presented a further and final report, under date 23rd January, 1918, which, together with a secret memorandum dealing with the returns made in regard to debts and property, is now submitted for the consideration of the Imperial War Conference. Copies of these papers were sent to the Dominions on 14th May.

The subject, the importance of which need not be emphasised, involves a mass of very technical and complicated considerations. The Committee make comprehensive proposals for dealing with it, which are summarised on pages 29 and following* of the report.

The questions inquired into by the Committee have led them to make recommendations which may be stated briefly under two heads, namely:—

(a) A general settlement of pre-War debts by Government intervention by means of a clearing scheme. This recommendation, if adopted, will require legislation.

(b) Arrangements recommended in order to confirm, by legislation, action taken in this country and other parts of the British Empire, as the result of the War, or measures contemplated affecting the rights of enemies or the property of enemies. Such legislation will be required in any event, irrespective of the decision under head (a).

The outline of proposal (a) is that by agreement between the belligerent Governments embodied in the treaty of peace, an arrangement should be made for the settlement by the intervention of the Governments of all indebtedness arising out of commercial, banking, and financial transactions which were not completed owing to the outbreak of war.

The principle of such a scheme would be that each Government should be responsible for collecting the sums ascertained to be due from its own nationals, and would pay the sums ascertained to be due to its nationals, the balance being settled between Governments.

The official dealings between the Governments would be conducted by clearing offices to be established by each Government. One such clearing office should be created in each Dominion, in India, and in individual Colonies or groups of Colonies, as might be found expedient. These clearing offices should be at liberty to communicate direct with enemy clearing offices as regards the various amounts due, but there should be one central British clearing office, through which claims between the British Empire, on the one hand, and enemy Governments, on the other, should be settled.

It is further suggested that the scheme should apply to debts due or accruing due before the outbreak of war from a person coming within the scheme in one country to a person coming within the scheme in another, and to debts which have become due during the War as the result of transactions, &c., entered into before the War.

Each Government would assume the responsibility of paying over to the enemy Government the balance of indebtedness struck between the Governments (the British Empire being treated as a whole for this purpose) and would assume in its own country the responsibility of collecting debts due to enemies and paying debts due from enemies, and a commission would be charged on all payments made to persons claiming through the British clearing office to meet the working expenses of the scheme and losses caused by failure to collect debts for which the Government under the scheme had assumed responsibility.

* pp. 321 et seq. of this volume.

The detailed recommendations as to the scope of the clearing scheme, i.e., the persons, the territory, and the debts to which it shall apply, its organisation, the method of determining the validity or amount of debts, &c., &c., are all summarised on pages 29 to 35^c of the report, and hardly admit of further compression.

The questions referred to under head (b) are indicated in the statement annexed to this memorandum, and it is desirable that they should be examined as soon as possible with a view to legislative action being taken throughout the British Empire on uniform lines.

In submitting the report the Chairman of the Committee has pointed out that, if their recommendations appear to His Majesty's Government to be acceptable in principle, it will be necessary to consult the Governments of the Dominions and India, and of other parts of the Empire, as well as the Allied Governments. He added that the main question with which the report deals is one of much greater magnitude for the Allied countries even than for the Dominions, and suggested that, as its examination will necessarily occupy a considerable time, it would be desirable not to defer communication with the Allies until the discussion with the British Dominions has been completed.

The report, together with the secret memorandum on debts, has been already circulated to each of the Dominions, as well as to the Government of India, but His Majesty's Government have withheld its communication to Allied Governments until the Imperial War Conference has had an opportunity of expressing its views in regard to it.

The report, which has been approved in principle by His Majesty's Government, is now submitted for the consideration of the Conference.

It may well be that the representatives of the Dominions and India may not feel able to pledge their Governments to accept as regards all details the action proposed in the Committee's report, but, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, it is very desirable to obtain at once such an expression of general concurrence in the terms of the report on the part of the Governments represented at the Conference as will enable His Majesty's Government to open discussion with the Allies.

The Conference will then be invited to express general approval of the report as a whole, and, in particular, to accept the principle that pre-War debts should be settled by means of a clearing scheme as outlined above, and to undertake that the necessary legislation shall be passed to give effect to it, and to provide for the matters—in regard to which legislation is required in any event—specified under head (b).

11th June 1918.

HEAD (b).

Questions on which recommendations have been made which will require legislative action in any event.

Sale of security.

Insurance contracts: recovery of premiums in arrear, and permissive legislation regarding payment of certain classes of claims or revival of policies.

Closure of contracts under the regulations of a recognised exchange or commercial association.

Contracts relating to patents, trade-marks, &c.—licences granted under War legislation.

Modification of the existing law to provide against the holder of enemy property restoring it to the owner after the War until released by Order in Council.

Similar legislation to cover property in British territory owned by enemy subjects residing in British territory.

APPENDIX.—Resolutions of Paris Conference on Insurance and Re-insurance - -	328

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE.

The Committee was appointed by the Treasury on 13th November 1916, to report on the arrangements to be adopted for the liquidation of the commercial, banking and other financial transactions between British and enemy persons, the completion of which was prevented by the outbreak of war, and for this purpose to consider the returns made to the Custodians of Enemy Property and to the Public Trustee and the Foreign Claims Office, and any information on matters relating thereto.

The Committee consisted of the following members, viz. :—

Sir H. BABINGTON SMITH, K.C.B., C.S.I. (Chairman).

The Right Hon. Sir DONALD MACLEAN, K.B.E., M.P.

Sir ALGERNON F. FIRTH, Bart.

Sir WILLIAM PLENDER, G.B.E.

Mr. C. J. B. HURST, C.B., K.C.

Sir BRIEN COKAYNE, K.B.E.

Mr. WALTER LEAF.

The Hon. M. M. MACNAGHTEN.

Mr. G. H. POWNALL.

Sir CHARLES J. STEWART, K.B.E.

Mr. J. J. WILLS.

Mr. M. F. LEVEY.

Mr. M. F. Levey, of the Board of Trade, was appointed on 2nd April 1917, vice Mr. J. J. Wills, who had been prevented by illness from attending meetings since January 1917.

A vacancy which occurred on the Committee, owing to the death of Mr. G. H. Pownall in December 1916, has not been filled.

ENEMY DEBTS COMMITTEE.

REPORT

TO THE LORDS COMMISSIONERS OF HIS MAJESTY'S TREASURY.

I.—INTRODUCTION.

1. The Committee has, since its appointment, held 61 meetings, and has taken evidence from 46 witnesses representing most of the important interests affected, such as the Banks, the Accepting Houses, the Stock Exchange, the Baltic, Lloyds', the Insurance Companies (Fire, Life and Marine), and trades such as coal, cotton, woollens, jute, sugar, oil, rubber and other kinds of produce. We have also had the assistance of representatives of the Government departments dealing with questions included in our reference; and on legal questions we have had the advantage of advice from Sir John A. Simon, Mr. R. A. Wright and Sir Mackenzie D. Chalmers.

Clearing Scheme for settlement of pre-war Debts.

2. In our Interim Report (dated April 4th, 1917) we made recommendations which were summarised as follows:—

- "(1) By agreement between the belligerent Governments, embodied in the Treaty of Peace, an arrangement should be made for the settlement by the intervention of the Governments of all indebtedness arising out of commercial, banking and financial transactions which were not completed owing to the outbreak of war. The principle of such a scheme would be that each Government should be responsible for collecting the sums ascertained to be due from its nationals, and would pay the sums ascertained to be due to its nationals, the balance being settled between Governments.
- "(2) The agreement should cover other matters, incidental to the settlement, on which at present we do not make detailed recommendations. All settlement of indebtedness otherwise than through the agency thus provided by the Governments should be prohibited.
- "(3) The existing prohibitions of payments to enemies and of the restoration of enemy property should be maintained until a satisfactory arrangement has been concluded, including adequate assurance, in the form of tangible security or otherwise, for its execution.
- "(4) The scheme to be adopted should apply to the British Empire as a whole, and should, if possible, be concerted with our Allies."

3. Our reasons for these recommendations were stated fully in our Interim Report, and need not be repeated here; but we may recall briefly that our principal grounds for recommending that all pre-war debts should be settled through Government intervention were (1) that there were serious objections to leaving creditors to recover their debts by recourse to the Courts in an enemy country; (2) that enemy debtors would be in a position to use the settlement of their debts as a means of bringing pressure on their creditors to resume commercial relations.

4. If our proposals appear to His Majesty's Government to be generally acceptable, we recommend that immediate steps should be taken to consult the Governments of the Dominions, of India, and of other parts of the Empire, with the object of obtaining their concurrence in the scheme. It will be desirable also, as soon as practicable, to enter into communication with the Allied Governments with a view to common action when the time arrives for peace negotiations.

In both cases, having regard to the complex nature of the questions, it may be better that discussion should take place by Conference rather than by correspondence.

5. We stated in our Interim Report that numerous questions arose as to the arrangements necessary for the Clearing Scheme, and in connection with pre-war indebtedness generally, which were still under our consideration.

We proceed now to make recommendations on these matters.

II.—SCOPE OF THE CLEARING SCHEME.

6. We consider first the extent and limits of the scheme as regards (i) the Persons, (ii) the Territory, (iii) the Debts to which it would apply. We use the term persons for convenience, as including not only individuals, but firms, partnerships, companies, corporations, and other legal personalities.

(i) Persons to be included in the Scheme.

British subjects.

7. The scheme would apply primarily to persons of British nationality resident or carrying on business in the British Empire. It would not be practicable to extend it to such persons outside the British Empire, because the British Government, which would be responsible for the collection of debts, directly or through the Government of the part of the Empire concerned, has no means of enforcing collection, if the debtor is not within any British jurisdiction. Moreover, the British Government has no means of requiring persons outside British jurisdiction to settle their debts and credits through the proposed Clearing Office or of preventing them from settling otherwise; nor has it the means of enforcing the conditions which may be agreed upon as regards interest, exchange, settlement of disputed amounts, &c.

8. It has been suggested that British subjects outside the British Empire might be given an option of coming within the scheme if they were willing to pay any debts due from them and to submit themselves to the conditions applying to British subjects within the Empire. This, however, does not appear to us to be practicable. Creditors would elect to come within the scheme, especially if the recovery of the debt was doubtful—thus obtaining a Government guarantee for the sums owed to them—while debtors would remain outside. Moreover, a British subject resident in a neutral country would not, by voluntary acceptance of certain conditions, be protected against legal proceedings, if these conditions did not make law in his country of residence, nor would it be possible to employ the machinery of the Courts of the neutral country to enforce these conditions.

9. A special case arises where a British subject, resident or carrying on business in a place which is not British territory, is amenable, in his relations with enemy subjects, not to the law of the country of residence, but to ex-territorial law administered by British Consular or other special Courts—as, for instance, in China. Such persons may be included in the scheme.

Subjects of Allied Countries.

10. The reasons which prevent the inclusion in the scheme of a British subject outside British territory operate in favour of the inclusion of an Allied subject resident or carrying on business in British territory. He could not, for the same reasons as those applying to the British subject abroad, be included in the scheme in his own country. He would, on the other hand, be amenable to British law as regards the collection of a debt owed by him and the conditions to be applied for fixing its amount, and he could therefore be included in the scheme in this country; just as a British subject in an allied country, such as France, could be included in the scheme in that country. Similar considerations apply to a firm domiciled or company registered in an allied country, and doing business in this country.

11. We recognise, however, that this arrangement might not be acceptable to our Allies. France, for instance, is inclined to regard a French subject, wherever resident, as dependent upon the French Government, and not upon any other, and might not concur in a scheme which for this purpose would make him, if resident in the United Kingdom, dependent upon the British Government.

The two views might be combined by arranging that a French subject in British territory should be included in the French Clearing Scheme, but that the British Clearing Office should act as the agent of the French Clearing Office for the recovery and payment of debts due from or to him, and vice versa, with a similar arrangement, if desired, in the case of other Allied countries.

Subjects of Neutral Countries.

12. A subject of a neutral country resident or carrying on business in British territory may have had opportunity, during the war, of recovering debts due to him from persons in an enemy country, but it has been illegal for him to make any payment or remittance to an enemy country. He would, unless specially excepted, be subject to any legislation passed in this country as to the rules or methods to be applied in determining the amounts of debts. It would be possible, therefore, to include in the scheme neutrals resident in British territory; but it is evident that the reasons for setting up a clearing system do not apply in the case of a neutral with the same force as in the case of a British or Allied subject. We therefore recommend that neutrals should not be included.

Enemy Subjects.

13. Enemy subjects in British territory, and also any business in respect of which an order has been made under section 1 of the Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act, 1916, as being of enemy nationality or associations, or which has been the subject of corresponding treatment elsewhere in the Empire, would naturally be excluded (except as indicated in paragraph 21 in relation to sums which have passed into the hands of the custodians).

Persons in Enemy Countries to be included in the Scheme.

14. On the enemy side the definition of the persons to be included would be similar to that to be adopted in this country. In the case of Germany, for instance, the scheme would apply primarily to German subjects in German territory. It might apply also, if it were so decided, to Austrian, Bulgarian and Ottoman subjects in Germany. It would not include German subjects in neutral territory, or British or neutral subjects in German territory.

(ii) Territory to be included in the Scheme.

15. We have already expressed the opinion that the British Empire should take part in the scheme as a single whole. It is desirable, if possible, that all the allied countries should take part in it, not jointly but severally. If any of them abstain, that need not prevent the adoption of the scheme by the others; it might even be applied as between the British Empire and Germany alone.

16. On the enemy side, the scheme should apply to the enemy countries severally; but there may be difficulty in applying it as it stands to Turkey, especially if the Ottoman Government is responsible for carrying it out. Some of the difficulties arising in Turkey would be removed if the execution of the scheme were placed in the hands of a body such as the Council of Administration of the Ottoman Public Debt. The question of the application of the scheme to Turkey may, however, be entirely modified in consequence of the terms of Peace.

17. British Protectorates generally should be included as forming part of the British Empire; but the case of Egypt presents special difficulties. The collection of debts is well known to be slow and uncertain there, owing partly to the character of the traders, and partly to the legal system; and collusive claims would be difficult to detect. There may therefore be serious objection to the Government taking responsibility for the collection of debts. Questions of nationality are complicated owing to the former connection of Egypt with Turkey and the existence of a system of capitulations, under which many persons resident in Egypt have come under the protection of different European countries.

We therefore recommend, subject to the views of the authorities in Egypt, that that country should not be included in the scheme. But as British subjects there are under ex-territorial jurisdiction, our recommendation in paragraph 9 would apply to them. In the case of sums due to enemies which are in the hands of the Custodian in Egypt, the recommendation of paragraph 21 would apply.

The case of Cyprus presents peculiar features and should be considered specially.

Occupied Territory.

18. Occupied territory which is not annexed or transferred or made independent at the end of the war, will presumably be restored to its former status. As the scheme contemplates action to be taken and responsibilities to be assumed after the restoration of peace, and not before, occupied territory should, for the purposes of the scheme, be regarded as having its proper attribution. For instance, French persons in French territory now occupied by Germany would come into the scheme as French.

Transferred Territory.

19. If at the end of the war territory is annexed or transferred from one country to another, or made independent, the problems arising are complicated, and we recommend that such territory should be excluded from the scheme altogether, individuals being left to pay and recover their debts without Government intervention.

(iii) Debts to be included in the Scheme.

20. The debts coming within the scope of the scheme will be, primarily, debts due or accruing due before the outbreak of war from a person coming within the scheme in the one country to a person coming within the scheme in the other.

The scheme will also include debts which have become due during the war as the result or sequel of transactions or contracts entered into before the war. For instance, if goods held on consignment by an enemy have been sold, a debt to the owner of the goods will have been created. Leases of real property and mortgages have not, we believe, been dissolved by the war, and instalments of rent and interest will have fallen due during the war. Payments will also have become due during the war in respect of coupons on Government and other securities, matured bonds, dividends, &c. All these would be included in the clearing scheme.

How far such debts can have arisen during the war out of pre-war contracts, depends upon the effect upon such contracts of the existing law, and of any modifications of the existing law which may be effected as the result of a settlement arrived at in the treaty of peace or otherwise. We deal with this question under the heading of Contracts (paragraphs 69-118).

Debts owing by Governments.

21. Sums are in many cases due from Governments to enemy persons in respect of pre-war debts for goods supplied, services, &c. These may conveniently be included in the scheme.

There will also be many claims against Governments in respect of matters of a quasi-contractual nature which have arisen during the war, as requisitions, sequestrations, &c. These probably cannot be included in the scheme for the purpose of determining amounts due; but when the amount has been ascertained, the clearing system should be employed for the actual settlement. The same will apply to sums which have passed into the hands of the custodians, for account of enemies, such as the proceeds of the liquidation of businesses or of vested enemy property, and interest and dividends paid to the Custodians.

Claims against Governments in respect of wrongful acts are of an entirely different character, and are outside the scope of the scheme.

Doubtful Debts.

22. We have recommended that each Government should take responsibility for collecting the sums ascertained to be due from its own nationals and from other persons, if any, resident in its territory who are included in the scheme:—that is to say that the Government should collect these sums, and, if it is unable to collect them, should make good the amount.

It is necessary to consider whether this responsibility should extend to debts which were doubtful before the war, or whether such debts should be excluded.

After careful consideration we have come to the conclusion that it is impracticable to draw a distinction, for the present purpose, between good and doubtful debts.

It has been suggested that a Committee of competent persons in each trade would be able readily to discriminate between debts which were good at the outbreak of war, and debts which were doubtful. Debts, however, are of all degrees in the scale of goodness or badness, and it would be very difficult to draw a line at a particular point.

It has also been suggested that a time limit might be imposed, and that all debts which had, at the outbreak of hostilities, been due for more than a specified period, say six months or a year, should be regarded as doubtful, and excluded from the Government's guarantee of collection. Such a fixed limit would operate very unequally, since the custom of different trades varies greatly. Moreover the reasons which have led us to recommend a system of settlement through the Governments, apply with particular force in the case of doubtful debts, since it is precisely in those cases that recourse to the enemy courts would probably be required, and that the prospect of payment would be a powerful inducement to the creditor to conform to the debtor's wishes.

The adoption of this principle may in some instances lead to anomalous results; but we believe that the cases for its application in this country will be few and unimportant.

23. We recommend, therefore, that the responsibility of the Governments should extend to all debts of the classes we have indicated, where there had not been any formal indication of insolvency* of the debtor before the war, and where the debt had not at the outbreak of war been barred by a statute of limitations or a period of prescription.

Debts which are due from a person who had given a formal indication of insolvency before the war would therefore be excluded from the Government guarantee of collection, but would nevertheless be included in the scheme for the purpose of collecting and paying to the creditor such dividend or other payment as might be recoverable from the debtor or his estate.

III.—ORGANISATION OF THE CLEARING SCHEME.

(i) OPERATIONS AFTER THE WAR.

24. We proceed now to consider the nature of the organisation required for carrying out the scheme which we propose.

In order to simplify our description we deal first with the case of the United Kingdom in relation with one of the enemy countries (say Germany).

An office would be created in London under a Controller appointed by the Government, and a similar office in Germany. We call these the Clearing Offices. It is important that the Controller and his staff should be accustomed to business methods and practices.

Debts Due by German Debtors to British Creditors.

25. A person in the United Kingdom coming within the scheme, to whom a debt is owed by a person in Germany coming within the scheme, will furnish a statement of his claim, in such form and with such particulars as may be prescribed, to the British Clearing Office. He may, if he prefers, communicate first with his German debtor, in order that, if there is agreement as to the exact amount of the debt, the debtor may certify his concurrence upon the statement of claim.

If, prima facie, the claim comes within the scheme, the British Clearing Office will communicate it to the German Office. If the debtor has not already certified his concurrence, the German Clearing Office will present the claim to him, and he will either admit it, or dispute it in whole or in part. If the debtor has disappeared, without leaving legal representatives, the German Office must decide, upon the evidence, whether to admit the claim or dispute it. The German Office must also consider at this stage whether the claim is one which falls within the scheme; and, in cases where there is any doubt as to the solvency of the debtor, whether there is ground for suspecting collusion between creditor and debtor.

A reply will then be sent to the British Clearing Office, either (a) that the claim is admitted, or (b) that it is disputed in whole or in part, and, if so, whether by the debtor or the Clearing Office, and on what grounds.

Admitted Debts.

26. In the case of debts admitted in whole or in part, the German Office will proceed to collect the amount due from the German debtor; but, as each Government takes responsibility for the debts ascertained to be due, the British Office will at once be credited by the German Office with any amount admitted to be due, whether the whole or part of the claim, with interest, regardless of any delay or failure in obtaining payment from the debtor.

* In order to avoid uncertainty in administration it would be necessary to define for each country the circumstances which would be held to constitute a "formal indication of insolvency." For instance, in England and Wales the circumstances would include (1) a receiving order in bankruptcy; (2) the execution of a deed of arrangement; (3) in the case of a company the appointment of a receiver, an order for liquidation or the adoption of a resolution for voluntary liquidation.

Disputed Debts.

27. If the whole or part of a claim is disputed by the debtor, the two Clearing Offices will endeavour to bring about a settlement by examining the merits of the question jointly, and in communication with the parties, and by recommending to the parties any decision or compromise upon which the Clearing Offices agree. For the purpose of this examination, which will usually take place in the country of the debtor, each Clearing Office will depute standing representatives to the opposite Clearing Office.

If the settlement recommended by the Clearing Offices is accepted by the parties, the amount so settled will be dealt with as an admitted debt, and will be credited at once by the German to the British Clearing Office.

28. Similarly, if a claim is disputed by the Clearing Office on the ground—

- (a) that it does not fall within the scheme;
- (b) that there is collusion between debtor and creditor;
- (c) that the debtor cannot be found, and that there is no sufficient evidence to support the claim;

or on any other ground, the question will be examined jointly by the two Clearing Offices, with the object of arriving at an agreement.

Debts due by British Debtors to German Creditors.

29. The procedure in the case of claims made by creditors in Germany will be the same as that described above, the roles of the Clearing Offices being reversed.

As soon as the amount of a debt is admitted or settled, the British Clearing Office will proceed to collect it from the debtor. For this purpose it may be necessary to take legal proceedings, and powers for enforcing payment through the Courts must be conferred on the British Clearing Office by legislation.

Appeal Tribunal.

30. We anticipate that in a large proportion of cases there will be agreement between debtor and creditor as to the amount of the debt, and that where there is a difference between them, the Clearing Offices will frequently be able to bring about a settlement. But a certain number of differences between creditor and debtor, or between the two Clearing Offices, will remain unsettled. We propose that all such cases should be referred to an Appeal Tribunal, a joint body, with a president who must be accepted by both sides as impartial, but who need not necessarily be of neutral nationality. If the pressure of business requires more than one court, the Tribunal should have power to sit in divisions. The decision of this Tribunal should be final.

31. All the documents in the possession of the Clearing Offices will be laid before the Tribunal, and debtor and creditor will be entitled to present their cases personally or by agents. In order to facilitate the choice of an agent, the British Clearing Office will designate a certain number of qualified persons amongst whom a British creditor or debtor may make a selection. If it is desired to employ an agent outside this list, the approval of the Clearing Office should be necessary, in order that unsuitable agents may be excluded, but approval should not be withheld except for good reasons. The Clearing Offices will themselves present their cases where the question to be decided is one between the Clearing Offices. They will also be represented, and will give their assistance to the Tribunal, in other cases. In order to save expense, and facilitate the proceedings, a sufficient portion of the staff of the Clearing Offices and the members of the Tribunal should, as far as possible, have a knowledge of the languages of both countries, so as to avoid the necessity for translating all documents.

When the amount due has been determined by the Appeal Tribunal, it will be dealt with by the Clearing Offices as in the case of an admitted claim.

32. If it is decided by the Clearing Offices, or by the Appeal Tribunal, that a claim is outside the scheme, the creditor would then be at liberty to prosecute the claim in the Courts, or to resort to any other remedy that may be open to him.

There may also be cases falling within the scheme which raise points requiring a judicial decision. The creditor should therefore have the option of prosecuting his claim in the Courts, instead of going before the Appeal Tribunal; and, in appropriate cases, the Clearing Offices may advise him to take that course. The sum finally decided by the Courts to be recoverable will be treated by the Clearing Offices in the same manner as an admitted debt.

In other cases, especially where questions of a technical character arise, arbitration may be the best method for deciding upon a claim, and when both parties agree upon that procedure, the Clearing Offices should accept the arbitral decision as determining the amount of the debt.

Payment to the Creditor.

33. As soon as a Clearing Office has been credited by the opposite Clearing Office with a sum due to a creditor, it will pay the creditor that sum with the interest,* after deducting the commission and any fees that may be due (see paragraph 36 below). The balance in the current account between the two Clearing Offices will bear interest at 5 per cent. per annum, and payments will be made to balance the account, either at fixed periods or whenever the balance exceeds a determined amount, as may be agreed.

Other Parts of the British Empire.

34. The machinery which we have described would only require extension in order to cover the whole of the British Empire. The Government of each part of the Empire would be responsible to the British Government for the collection of sums due from persons in the territory under its control; but, as regards the settlement with the enemy Government, the Imperial Government would alone be concerned. A Clearing Office would be created in each Dominion and in India, and in individual Colonies, or groups of Colonies, as might be found expedient. These local Clearing Offices should be at liberty to communicate direct with the enemy Clearing Offices as regards the admission or determination of the amounts due; but the central British Clearing Office should be kept informed of their proceedings and should be notified of all claims when admitted or determined. The actual settlement as between Governments would take place through the central British Clearing Office. The joint Appeal Tribunal, to which final reference takes place in disputed cases, should be common to the British Empire.

Current accounts would be kept between the central Clearing Office and the local Clearing Offices. These would carry interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum and would be balanced from time to time by remittances as in the case of a current account with an enemy Clearing Office (see paragraph 33).

Other Countries.

35. Similar machinery would be required in each of the Allied and Enemy Countries which adhered to the scheme. The same central British Clearing Office would deal with the Clearing Office in each enemy country.

The arrangements for the Appeal Tribunal or Tribunals must depend upon the number of countries participating in the scheme. Where British claims are concerned, the arrangements should be such that half the Tribunal (excluding the President) will consist of British representatives or nominees.

Expenses of the Scheme.

36. Funds will have to be provided for meeting (1) the working expenses of the scheme, (2) losses caused by failure to collect debts for which, under the scheme, the Government is responsible. It is not equitable that these charges should fall upon the taxpayer. We therefore propose that a commission should be charged on all payments made to persons claiming through the British Clearing Office, to cover the above-mentioned expenses. So far as the information available enables us to judge, we think that a commission of 2½ per cent. would probably be sufficient for these purposes.

As the proportion between receipts and payments will vary greatly in different parts of the Empire, the fund created by means of this commission should be common to the British Empire and should be allotted on agreed principles.

It has been objected that a uniform commission in respect of insurance would be inequitable, since the proportion of debts which become bad varies greatly in different businesses, and the scale of profit is adjusted accordingly. We think, however, that a varying scale of commission would present insuperable difficulties. If the rate is as moderate as we suggest, no one should object to pay it in return for the guarantee which the scheme provides for the recovery of the pre-war debts due to him.

* See paragraphs 42-53 of this Report.

Where reference is made to the Appeal Tribunal a further fee should be charged on a scale to be laid down, to be paid by the loser, or as awarded by the Tribunal. The Tribunal should also have power to award a sum in respect of expenses, to be paid by one party to the other.

Penalties for Delay.

37. It is desirable to discourage dilatory tactics on the part of the debtor, and excessive claims on the part of the creditor, and to make it to the interest of both to come to a settlement as soon as possible.

With this object we propose that any claim which has not been admitted by the debtor should carry a penalty, to be paid to the Clearing Office in the country of the successful party, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, commencing at a fixed period after the communication of the claim to the Clearing Office of the debtor's country and running to the date at which the amount of the claim is settled. If part of the claim is admitted, the penalty will run only on the unadmitted portion. The penalty will be paid by the debtor if the claim is established, and by the creditor if it is not established, and will be retained by the Clearing Office in the country of the successful party. If an intermediate amount is awarded or agreed, then the penalty would be paid proportionately by both parties.

(ii) STEPS TO BE TAKEN DURING THE WAR.

38. It has been suggested that the working of the Clearing Scheme would be facilitated if steps were taken at once in the British Empire for collecting the debts due to enemies. In order that the sums so collected might not be withdrawn from trade use, the suggestion contemplates that the funds so collected should be employed in advancing to British creditors a part of their claims on enemy debtors.

39. In our preliminary Report we recommended that such collection should be made; but on further consideration the obstacles to such a course appear to us to be insuperable:—

- (a) It is impossible in many cases to say whether a debt exists or not. For instance, the whole question of debts arising on Contracts of Insurance is full of uncertainties, which can only be determined by agreement between the countries, probably accompanied by legislation, or else by decisions of the Courts.
- (b) Even where the existence of a debt is certain, it will in many cases be impossible to ascertain its amount. The debtor's statement cannot be accepted as final without communication with the creditor, since, quite apart from any question of bad faith, the debtor may not know the true amount of the debt, even approximately. Moreover, there are many points having an important bearing on the amount of the debt, which can only be settled by agreement between the countries concerned. Such points are interest, rate of exchange, closure of current contracts, and other matters dealt with in other parts of this Report.
- (c) In collecting debts it would, we presume, be necessary to allow a set-off in cases where the British debtor has claims on persons in the enemy country. The verification of the existence of a valid claim and of its amount will be even more difficult in such cases—as, for instance, in the case of claims for the value of goods or property requisitioned or sold.
- (d) We have pointed out that the scope of the Clearing Scheme, as regards the persons and the debts to be included in it, must be a matter of agreement. Until such agreement has been reached there would be difficulty in fixing the limits, in these respects, of any preparatory collection of debts.
- (e) Legislation would be required, vesting the debts in the Custodian. Such legislation would certainly meet with objection on the part of trade interests, unless collection from debtors were accompanied by distribution to creditors. As we have pointed out, the difficulties of verification apply in this case also, and we may add that the application of A's money to satisfy B's debts is undoubtedly confiscatory, unless it forms part of an agreed system of settlement. This last objection would not apply to a system of advances; but we see many difficulties in carrying out such a proposal.

(f) Even if the above difficulties were overcome, it might be found in the end that no agreement for a Clearing Scheme could be reached, and in that case the preparatory collection of debts, made with a view to such a scheme, might lead to confusion.

40. Our conclusion is that no steps should be taken during the war for the general collection of debts due to enemies, or for a distribution to creditors, either by way of provisional payment or as advances. We have satisfied ourselves that there is little demand at present on the part of trade interests for such a scheme.

Persons owing money to enemies should be at liberty to pay their debts to the Custodians, if they so desire. The debts would, of course, be subject to revision as to amount in the manner suggested above (pars. 27, 30, and 31), and if our recommendation as to interest is adopted, there might be a claim in that respect; but the payer would not be subject to any claim for interest on the amount paid, for any period subsequent to the date of payment.

(iii) LEGISLATION.

41. If a Clearing Scheme is adopted, legislation will be necessary in order to carry it out, as well as to give effect, in the various countries, to agreements which may be concluded on the various points dealt with in the later sections of this Report. The form of this legislation will require careful consideration; but it is premature to examine this question in detail until the principle has been accepted, and the form and scope of the scheme defined.

IV.—QUESTIONS AFFECTING THE VALIDITY OR AMOUNT OF DEBTS.

(i) INTEREST.

42. There will be uncertainty as to whether debts which have remained outstanding during the war bear interest. In some cases the debt was interest-bearing by agreement or custom, but it will not necessarily be clear whether the conditions applying before the war continue during the war. It is important to remove the uncertainty and to secure uniformity, if possible, in all the countries concerned.

In this country there has been no legislation on the subject; and the only judicial decisions bearing on the point of which we are aware are those of Mr. Justice Younger in re Fried Krupp Aktien-gesellschaft.* In the earlier of these cases property of the enemy debtor had been vested under the Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act, 1914, and certain creditors claimed payment of interest in addition to the capital of their debts. The judge decided that no interest should be paid except in one instance, where by contract the debt carried interest.

43. In Germany it appears that the ordinary law is that "where a claim arises under a mercantile transaction between mercantile traders, interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum is payable from the date of maturity, even in the absence of any agreement to that effect."

The Decree of September 30th, 1914, which prohibited payment to persons in the British Empire, suspended until further order all debts due or becoming due to persons in the British Empire, as from July 31st, 1914, or from the due date, if later than that, and laid down (Art. 2) that no interest could be claimed in respect of the period of suspension. This was modified by Decree of the Bundesrat of April 19th, 1917, which gives power to the Imperial Chancellor to appoint a "Trustee for Enemy Property." In section 7 of this Decree it is provided that debts which would have been payable if they had not been suspended under the Decree of September 30th, 1914, shall bear simple interest from April 1st, 1917, at the current rate for deferred payment (in Höhe des für Verzugszinsen geltenden Satzes), subject to special decisions and exceptions made by the Imperial Chancellor. Such interest is to be paid to the Trustee for Enemy Property in all cases, including those in which the claim has not been placed under the administration of the Trustee.

We have no information as to the position regarding interest in the other Enemy Countries.

44. Where, by contract or custom, the debt was interest-bearing and the rate was determined and payment has been deferred owing to the war, we see no good reason why it should not continue to bear the same interest during the period of deferment.

Where the debt was not interest-bearing the question is open to some doubt. The debtor will contend that he was able and willing to settle his debt at the time when it fell due, and was only prevented from doing so by the prohibition of payments to enemies, and that interest cannot equitably be charged on money which he continued to hold through no desire of his own. On the other hand, the debtor has had the use of the money, and it has been particularly "good money," since it was known that the creditor would not be able to require payment till after the war, while the creditor may have had to supply the place of the resources to which he was entitled by borrowing, probably at a high rate of interest. These latter considerations are, in our view, the more convincing, since it appears to us inequitable that debtors should profit and creditors be penalised by the postponement of payment.

Recommendation.

45. We therefore recommend that it should be our policy to secure an agreement that all debts, the payment of which has been suspended owing to the war, should bear simple interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, from the beginning of the war, or from the date at which the debt fell due (if later than the beginning of the war), except in cases where by contract, or by law, or by custom having the force of law, the debt bore interest at some other rate. In these latter cases the conditions applicable by contract, law or custom should continue to have effect during the suspension of payment.

The interest to be collected from the debtor should be reckoned to the date of his payment of the debt; while the interest payable to the creditor should be reckoned to the date at which the Clearing Office of the creditor's country is credited with the amount.

46. We have considered whether this rule should apply in the case of sums due to an enemy by way of dividends, interest and share of profits, and other periodical payments of a similar character.

In the United Kingdom any company, firm or person carrying on business, has, since 27th November, 1914, been required to pay all such sums to the Custodian (Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act, 1914, section 2). A similar provision has applied to Government, Municipal and other securities since 29th July, 1915 (Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act, 1915, section 1 (i)). In the case of loans not made for the purposes of a business, the sums due have been left in the hands of the debtor. In the enemy countries, we believe that such sums have, generally speaking, remained in the hands of the debtor, at any rate in the earlier years of the war.

47. The general considerations which we have stated above apply to these sums, no less than to capital sums, and it may be regarded as illogical as well as inconvenient to discriminate between debts according to the nature of their origin.

But, on the other hand, it is the general rule in normal circumstances to allow no interest on dividends which have remained unclaimed, and in many cases the Articles of Association of Companies prohibit the payment of such interest. It will be remembered that, where interest is to be paid, we have proposed that it should be simple interest, and it is in accord with the principle of this recommendation that sums which are themselves of the nature of interest should not bear interest. We are, therefore, on the whole, of opinion that the rule regarding interest should not apply to sums payable by way of dividends, interest or share of profits, whether by a company, firm or person, or by a public authority, nor to other periodical payments of a similar character, such as rent.

A decision in this sense will have the advantage of avoiding the calculation and recovery of very small amounts of interests, in a very large number of cases, where a few days may have intervened between the due date and the date of payment of a coupon or dividend to the Custodian. It will also avoid serious practical difficulties which would arise in relation to coupons on bearer securities.

* 1916, 2 Ch. 194; 1917, 2 Ch. 188.

48. We have considered whether a middle course might be adopted by providing that the sums in question should begin to bear interest as soon as they have been paid to the Custodian, or to an agent for the enemy payee. The objection to such a rule is that it would operate unduly to the advantage of those countries which have not required these sums to be paid to a Custodian, but have allowed them to remain in the hands of the debtor, and for this reason we are unable to recommend its adoption, unless it could be brought into a form which would, in practice, be fair to both parties.

49. Our recommendations on the subject of interest do not form a vital part of our scheme; and if it is found, on discussion with our Allies, or in negotiation with the enemy, that in their present form they present insuperable difficulties, they might be varied, either generally or by special agreements with particular countries.

Special case of the Accepting Houses.

50. So far as concerns Trade Debts in general the recovery of interest is not a matter of primary importance. Several trade witnesses informed us that if they were assured of receiving the capital of their debt they would not regard it as a serious injury if they were required to relinquish their claim to interest. The matter is, however, a more serious one as affecting the Accepting Houses. Under the arrangement of August, 1914, between the Government and the Bank of England, Acceptors of Bills were provided by the Bank of England with funds for meeting them. These advances, which were rendered necessary by the absence of remittances from clients, were very large in amount, and bear interest at 2 per cent. above bank rate. Where the client is an enemy, payment cannot be enforced by the Acceptor till after the war. In the meantime the interest-charges incurred have already amounted to about a quarter of the original debt and will continue to accumulate.

51. The representatives of the Accepting Houses who appeared before us claimed that they should have the right to recover from their enemy clients the whole of the interest which they have paid to the Bank of England in respect of the advances. We do not express any opinion on the legal rights, which, we understand, are sub judice, but if the law does not recognise their full claim, and if a uniform rate of interest is fixed for debts in general, we are unable to recommend exceptional treatment in this particular case.

52. The high rate of interest paid by the Accepting Houses on the advances from the Bank of England was, we understand, intended to provide the Government (which took the responsibility for the operation) with a margin for insurance against losses. If the scheme which we recommend is carried out, the Accepting Houses would be assured of payment in full from their enemy debtors and consequently the probability of loss to the Government in respect of the advances would be very small. The Accepting Houses would, however, have paid a double insurance, first under the advances scheme, and secondly under the Clearing Scheme; and we suggest that if the law does not recognise their full claim the Government should consider the equity of making some refund to the Accepting Houses, in respect of sums paid in excess of a reasonable rate of interest.

If no general measure is adopted requiring the payment of interest on outstanding debts, then we think that the case of the acceptances should be specially dealt with, and that every effort should be made to obtain an agreement for the payment of interest on these debts at a suitable rate.

53. The Accepting Houses also made a claim to charge their clients commission on the same terms as those applying to the original acceptance of the bill, during the whole period for which the debt is outstanding. This is a matter which may be left to be settled between the Accepting House and the client, or by the ordinary law.

(ii) EXCHANGE.

54. A question arises as to the rate of exchange which should be applied in the settlement of pre-war indebtedness.

There is in most cases no doubt as to the currency in which a debt is payable; and it may be argued that there is no justification for requiring a debtor to pay or a creditor to receive anything else than that which he contracted to pay or to receive.

This argument, however, ignores essential facts. We take the case of Germany first, since the sums involved are much greater than in the case of the other enemy countries. Germany before the war had a gold standard. The silver mark was not legal tender for amounts exceeding 20 marks. The only forms of currency which were legal tender to unlimited amounts were gold coin and notes of the Reichsbank. The law of 1909, which made these notes legal tender, imposed upon the Reichsbank the obligation of converting them into gold on demand. The exchange between the United Kingdom and Germany was therefore on a gold basis, and the fluctuations were confined within the very narrow limits set by the "gold point" on either side of the gold parity (marks 20.43=£1). The war has completely changed this. By a law passed on August 4, 1914, Reichskassenscheine (Treasury Notes) were made legal tender, and both the Reichsbank and the Treasury were relieved from the obligation of redeeming their respective notes in gold. The result of this measure, combined with the conditions brought about by the war, is that for exchange purposes the mark now possesses considerably less than its former value. Strenuous attempts will no doubt be made after the war to restore the value of the mark, and to bring the exchange back to parity. Some competent observers believe that by a free use of the German gold reserves this will be possible within a short period, but others hold that it will be a task of great difficulty and may take a considerable time.

In the meantime, so long as the mark is depreciated, the British creditor who receives payment of a debt in marks will suffer loss. The mark which he contracted to receive was a gold mark, or a paper mark which was convertible into gold. Legislation passed during the war has entirely altered the character of the paper mark. It is unjust that he should be compelled to receive payment in paper marks which, through the action of the German legislature, are no longer convertible into gold, and are consequently seriously depreciated in value.

Recommendation.

55. It appears to us that the only equitable course is to lay down that pre-war debts payable in marks must be paid in gold marks, or in their equivalent for exchange purposes. This would carry with it the obligation for the British debtor who owes a debt payable in marks to pay in gold marks or their equivalent. Debts payable in sterling would similarly be payable in gold coin or its equivalent. In fact all settlement of indebtedness between the two countries should be upon a gold basis.

The same principle should be applied to settlements with the other enemy countries. We have little information as to the legislative or administrative steps which have been taken there; but there is no doubt that in Austria and Turkey they have produced an inconvertible and heavily depreciated paper currency.

The proposal to settle pre-war debts on a gold basis will probably be opposed by the enemy Governments, but we recommend that we should insist upon it, if we are in a position to do so.

56. The debtor who owes a debt expressed in a currency which is depreciated may object that he will be deprived of the advantage of paying in that currency; but he will lose only an unexpected and unearned profit, and will be no worse off, as regards the amount in gold that he will pay, than he was before the war.

It is also necessary to point out that there will be a strong tendency for a creditor who receives payment in a depreciated currency to leave his money in the country where it is due in the hope that, sooner or later, he may be able to remit it at a more favourable rate of exchange. Such action might place at the disposal of our enemies during the period of reconstruction, capital which could be employed, with more advantage to us, in the British Empire.

57. An agreement as to settlement on a gold basis should not apply retrospectively to debts which have been settled voluntarily during the war. There are, however, cases in which the assets of an enemy debtor have been vested under the Trading with the Enemy Acts, and the Court, when ordering payments to be made to creditors, has fixed provisionally a rate of exchange based on the rate prevailing at the time between the enemy country and neutral countries. In such cases an adjustment should be made so as to apply the rate agreed for post-war settlement.

(iii) NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS.

58. The war interrupted the normal course of procedure with regard to negotiable instruments, such as bills of exchange. There is in some cases uncertainty as to the legal position, and there are also differences in the law in force in the different countries concerned. The volume of the outstanding transactions effected by bills of exchange is so large that it is of special importance to secure certainty and uniformity with regard to them.

(a) Validity after the War.

59. By English law, a bill of exchange or other negotiable instrument made before the war between persons who become "enemies" is not cancelled by the outbreak of war. It is unenforceable by an alien enemy during the war, but the remedy revives on the conclusion of peace. This is probably the law in other countries too; but if there are any doubts it is desirable that they should be removed by agreement and where necessary by legislation.

(b) Non-presentment, &c.

60. In many cases the war has rendered illegal or impossible the performance of formalities required by the law in order to maintain the obligations of the various parties to a bill of exchange. Such are:—

Presentment of a bill for acceptance.

Presentment of a bill for payment.

Notice to drawer and indorsers of dishonour by non-acceptance or by non-payment.

Protest for non-acceptance or non-payment.

61. Under the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, delay in Presentment, Notice, or Protest is excused if it is caused by circumstances beyond the control of the holder and not imputable to his default, misconduct or negligence. When the cause of delay ceases to operate the omission must be supplied with reasonable diligence.

This provision was supplemented by Section (1) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1914, which provides that "delay in the presentment for payment of a bill of exchange, where the proper place of payment is outside the British Islands, is excused, if the delay is, or has been, due either directly or indirectly to circumstances arising out of the present war, or to the impracticability owing to similar circumstances of transmitting the bill to the place of payment with reasonable safety." This provision appears to interpret rather than to modify or materially to extend the provisions of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882.

62. The ordinary law on these points in the enemy countries varies, and is not identical with that of the United Kingdom; but the present war would probably be recognised in most countries as a case of force majeure excusing non-presentment. In Germany the Decree of September 30, 1914, provides that the date on which presentment or protest must be made is postponed so long as the Decree is in force, and that the subsequent time-limit for presentment or protest is to be fixed by the Imperial Chancellor. We have no information as to special legislation during the war in the other enemy countries.

63. We recommend that it should be our policy to include in the Treaty of Peace an agreement, to be enforced by legislation in each country, that delay in Presentment for Acceptance or payment, Notice of dishonour to drawers and indorsers, and Protest will be excused where such delay is caused by the war, and not by the default, misconduct or negligence of the holder; and that Presentment, Notice and Protest within a specified period after the restoration of peace (with any modification of procedure that may be advisable) shall have the same effect as Presentment, &c., at the proper date.

An agreement of this kind between belligerents would not have any effect as regards the liability of a neutral drawer or indorser. For this purpose it is desirable that the neutral countries should accept and apply the same principle. The settlements made at the time when peace is concluded will affect neutrals in many ways, and it is possible that means may be found of inducing them to adhere to the agreement which we suggest between the belligerents.

(c) Debtors for Acceptance Credits.

64. In many cases where a Drawee had accepted a bill before the war under a credit opened in favour of a client who became an enemy, the bill did not fall due, and consequently the obligation of the enemy client to place the Acceptor in funds did not mature until after the outbreak of war.

In such cases the obligation of the client became complete when the acceptance was given, though it had not to be discharged till a later date. We do not think that there can be any doubt that such an obligation is not cancelled by the war, and that though its enforcement is necessarily suspended during the war, the remedy revives after the war. If there is any doubt on this point it should be removed by agreement and legislation.

Questions arise as to the payment of interest and commission in these cases. We have dealt with them under the heading of Interest (paragraphs 50-53).

(d) Acceptances given during the war under Confirmed Credits given on behalf of Enemy Clients before the war.

65. A credit opened for a client by a Bank or Accepting House is sometimes confirmed to a third party, who thereupon draws a bill and negotiates it with the assurance that it will be duly accepted. Many cases arose, early in the war, in which a credit, opened for a client who had since become an enemy, had been confirmed, before the war, to a non-enemy, and the bill came forward for acceptance after the outbreak of war. The acceptance of such bills came under the prohibitions of the Trading with the Enemy Proclamations; but as the confirmation of the credit to the non-enemy was considered to constitute a contract with him and to be binding upon the Acceptor, licences were given for the acceptance of bills under these circumstances. Many such bills were accepted and paid in due course.

The licence removed all doubt as to the legality of the transaction; but there may be some doubt as to whether the enemy client's obligation to reimburse the Acceptor remains unaffected by the war. If there is any such doubt it should be removed, and it should be provided, by Agreement and if necessary by legislation, that for the purposes of the contract between the Acceptor and the enemy client, the confirmation of the credit before the war should be deemed equivalent to the acceptance of the bill.

(iv) PERIODS OF PRESCRIPTION.

66. The period of prescription in most foreign countries is short—in some cases (e.g., Austria) so short that the rights on a bill of exchange would be lost during the period of the war. In some countries war probably operates to suspend the period of prescription; but it is not clear that this is the case in all the belligerent countries. Where the rights on a bill are lost, a holder may still retain a right of action for the consideration which depends on the underlying contract; but, even where this is the case, it is desirable that the rights on the bill should be preserved.

We therefore recommend that there should be an express agreement that as between enemies the period of the war should be excluded in calculating any period of prescription, and that, where necessary, legislation should be passed to provide for this.

This should apply not only to bills of exchange, but to coupons and generally to all debts and pecuniary obligations which may be affected by a period of prescription, whether statutory or contractual.

(v) SALE OF SECURITY.

67. A creditor often holds property of the debtor as security for the debt. The most ordinary cases are the following:—

(a) Security held by a banker, under a mortgage, charge or lien. Such security most frequently consists of bonds, stocks or shares, but may be other kinds of property.

(b) Security held by a Bank or Accepting House to cover acceptance credits. Such security may be bonds, stocks or shares, or goods.

(c) Security held to cover liabilities on open Stock Exchange accounts. Such security would almost always be bonds, stocks or shares.

If the debt is not paid when due, the holder of the security has not, as a rule, any right to sell it without giving previous notice to the debtor and thus affording him the opportunity of paying the debt if he does not wish the security to be sold. Sometimes there is an express provision for notice before sale in a contract between the parties; in other cases the requirement depends upon custom, which probably has the force of law.

The outbreak of war caused debts to remain unpaid, and also rendered it impossible as a rule to give notice to an enemy debtor of the intention to sell the security in satisfaction of the debt. In some instances, where permission was given for communication with the enemy debtor, notice was given, but the debtor declined to consent to the sale, expressing at the same time his readiness to satisfy the debt, if permitted to do so.

The holder of security has in fact frequently realised his security without the previous consent of the owner. No case has, we believe, come before the Courts as to the legality of a sale in these circumstances.

Recommendation.

68. It appears to us that where the holder of the security has acted in good faith, and has conducted the sale with reasonable care and skill, his action should not be open to question. It should therefore be our policy to include in the Treaty of Peace a provision to the effect that the outbreak of war shall be held to have conferred on a creditor holding security, who is unable to obtain payment of his debt when due, the right, but not the obligation, to sell the security without notice to the debtor, and that there shall be no claim on the part of the debtor on the ground that the price realised was insufficient, if the sale has been effected with reasonable care and skill.

Legislation will be required to give effect to such an agreement; and it is desirable that such legislation should be passed in this country, even if no agreement on the subject is reached.

V.—CONTRACTS.

(i) GENERAL.

69. Most of the transactions which remained incomplete at the beginning of the war form the subjects of contracts. These contracts are of great variety and of every degree of complexity, from a simple contract for the sale and purchase of goods to an elaborate mass of provisions regulating for a long period the relations of great enterprises.

In order that claims by and against "enemies" may be settled with certainty, it is necessary that the effect of war on contracts should be determined.

70. In the United Kingdom and throughout the British Empire generally (with some exceptions) the question is governed by the Common Law, which, though perhaps clear in its principles, is not always clear in its application to particular cases.

By the Common Law it is illegal for persons residing or carrying on business within the King's Dominions, whether of British or foreign nationality, to have intercourse with the "King's enemies," i.e., with persons residing or carrying on business in enemy territory; and since in most cases the performance of a contract necessarily involves intercourse between the contracting parties, it follows that as a general rule the outbreak of war renders the further performance of a contract with an "enemy" illegal so long as the state of war continues. The contractual obligation in most cases is such that its postponement till after the war has ended would alter the position of the parties, and in effect substitute a different contract from that which they themselves had made. The contract is consequently in these cases regarded by the law of England as dissolved on the outbreak of war, and the parties are completely released from all the obligations which, but for the war, would have become operative after that date. The same result follows even where the contract contains a clause suspending its operation during the war, if there are parts of the contract requiring for their execution intercourse with the enemy to which the suspensory clause does not apply. Even when a contract does not involve intercourse with the enemy, it may be regarded by the law as dissolved on other grounds. For instance, where the contractual relation is of assistance to the King's enemies during the war, by increasing their resources or diminishing those of our own country, the contract is dissolved as being contrary to public policy.*

It is to be observed that the contract is dissolved as at the date of the outbreak of war. The obligations which had become operative before the war began still exist, though they may not be enforceable until peace is restored; only those obligations (and the corresponding rights) which would have become operative after the outbreak of war, are cancelled.

In some cases, as for instance in that of a simple contract to repay money lent, the fulfilment of the contractual obligation can be postponed till after the war, without altering the position of the parties. In such cases the obligation is merely suspended during the period of the war and becomes enforceable on the restoration of peace.

71. It is probable that the great majority of pre-war contracts with "enemies"—excepting contracts for the payment of money—were, according to English law, dissolved by the outbreak of war. But in this connection it must be observed that since the private property of enemies on land cannot by the law of nations be captured or forfeited, an enemy person who owns property, whether moveable or immoveable, situate within the King's Dominions, or any interest in such property, does not by reason of the outbreak of war lose his rights. It may be, as for instance, in the case of leasehold land in England, that the enemy, by reason of his ownership of or interest in the property, has various contractual rights and is subject to various contractual obligations. Since the cancellation of those rights and obligations would in effect operate as a forfeiture of property, it seems that they must remain in full force notwithstanding the existence of a state of war.

72. It is necessary for the purpose of settling claims by or against enemies which arise out of pre-war contracts, that the effect of the war on these contracts should be determined. But it is most improbable that the existing law of any two belligerent States on this point will be identical. In some cases no doubt it will be found that the contract expressly provides that it is to be construed according to the law of one country, but where, as is more commonly the case, the contract does not expressly provide by what law it should be governed, and the law of the two or more countries of which the contracting parties are nationals is not identical, there may be no possibility of adjusting their claims one against the other, since a party who was according to the law of one country a creditor might be found by the law of the other country to be a debtor, and vice versa.

The situation is further complicated by the fact that the ordinary law has been modified during the war by legislation giving special powers for the determination of contracts, not only in the United Kingdom, but in most other parts of the British Empire, and also in Germany, and possibly in other enemy countries. This special legislation has not been uniform, and in some cases it has given discretionary powers to the Executive.

73. It is desirable to remove these divergencies and uncertainties, and, so far as possible, to apply simple and uniform rules to the treatment of pre-war contracts. Moreover, as we shall see later, it will be expedient to make special provision for meeting the circumstances of particular classes of contract which are not satisfactorily dealt with by the general law. Such provision cannot be effectively made by legislative action in one of the countries concerned, unless there is similar action in the other countries. We have, therefore, come to the conclusion that it should be our policy to include in the Treaty of Peace provisions as to what should be the effect of the war on contracts, such provisions to be enforced where necessary by domestic legislation in each country.

74. If this conclusion is accepted, it is necessary to consider what should be the nature of the international agreement on this subject.

It should, in the first place, be provided that all debts of every sort and other direct pecuniary obligations arising from a pre-war contract (for instance, from a negotiable instrument) should remain in force, and should be duly discharged when peace is restored. This provision is, we believe, in accordance with the established law of nations.

* Zinc Corporation v. Hirsch, 1916, 1 K.B. 541 (Court of Appeal). Clapham Steamship Company v. Vulcan Company, Times Law Reports, 33, 546.

ii. 5962—Pro 3 &c.

75. A contract should not be dissolved merely by the fact that one of the parties to the contract becomes an enemy, if the effect of the dissolution would be to forfeit or cancel a right of property. It may be that the existence of a state of war will have prevented the enemy from discharging his obligations under such a contract. For example, an enemy lessee of land or a house may by reason of the war find it impossible to comply with the covenants contained in his lease, and failure to comply with those covenants may entitle the lessor to re-enter upon the land and forfeit the lease. In such a case we do not propose that the provisions in the Treaty of Peace should relieve the lessee from his obligations, or deprive the lessor of his rights. All that we propose is that the lessor should not be entitled to forfeit the lease merely by reason of the fact that the lessee is an enemy, since any such proposal would, in our view, violate the principle that the private property of enemies must be respected. Other instances of contracts which cannot be dissolved without affecting rights of property are contracts of mortgage, charge, pledge, or lien; contracts for the sale and purchase of land.

76. With the above exceptions, we think that every pre-war contract between persons who have become enemies should be regarded as dissolved on the outbreak of war, without prejudice to the enforcement of any rights or obligations which arise from the part performance of the contract before the war began. This would mean that the contracts most usual in commercial transactions (contracts for sale and purchase of goods where the property had not passed, contracts of agency, partnership, affreightment, &c.) would all be dissolved.

The effect of this would be, substantially, to give international effect to the law as it exists in this country. There is an obvious advantage in this. The Courts can rarely compel a party to perform his contractual obligations; as a general rule damages are the only remedy for breach of contract. In many cases the party to a pre-war contract relying, it may be, on an express decision of his own Courts that his contract had been dissolved, will have made such arrangements and entered into such obligations that it would be impossible for him to carry out the pre-war contract with the enemy even if he were minded to do so. In these cases, if the legislature were to decree that the contract should be revived, he would have to pay damages to the enemy. This would certainly be regarded as a grave hardship by our people; and, in the converse case, it would be regarded in the same way by our enemy. Even where specific performance is possible, the revival of contracts dissolved by law would cause great dislocation and hardship.

77. There will be some contracts of a mixed character, containing provisions conferring or defining rights of property, and other provisions creating obligations of the kind which, under our proposals, would be dissolved.

Where the two parts of the contract are separable, the provisions of the latter kind would be dissolved, while those of the former kind would remain valid. For instance, a contract of partnership would be dissolved, so far as concerns the mutual obligations of the partners, but each partner would retain such rights of property as belong to him under the contract.

Where the two parts of the contract are inseparable the whole would be dissolved.

78. If our recommendations regarding contracts be adopted, we think that the settlement of claims by or against enemies under the great majority of pre-war contracts would present comparatively small difficulty.

But there are certain classes of contracts for which special provisions must be made. These are contracts of Insurance and Reinsurance of all kinds; Contracts which have been closed or otherwise dealt with under the rules of a body such as the Stock Exchange, the London Metal Exchange, the Liverpool Cotton Association, &c.; Contracts relating to Patents, Designs, Trade Marks and Copyrights. We proceed to deal with these special cases.

(ii) INSURANCE AND REINSURANCE CONTRACTS.

79. We have heard witnesses representing the principal Associations of Fire, Life and Marine Insurance Companies, and Lloyd's, and also certain Companies doing special business, and have ascertained their views on the questions which arise in connection with Insurance.

A Conference on Insurance questions was held at Paris in October 1917, on the initiative of the Comité Permanent International d'Action Economique. The Conference was composed of representatives of the Allied Countries (with the exception of the United States of America), and included experts in the various categories of Insurance. The British Delegates were the Chairman of this Committee, together with Mr. Geoffrey W. Russell, on behalf of the Board of Trade, and representatives of the Fire, Life, and Marine Insurance Companies. The recommendations which follow are in agreement with the Resolutions of the Paris Conference, of which a translation is appended to this Report (Appendix).

80. Contracts relating to Insurance may be divided into four classes: (1) Fire, (2) Life (including annuities and endowment policies), (3) Marine, (4) Miscellaneous (accident, employers' liability, fidelity, &c.).

They also fall into two broad divisions: A. Direct contracts of insurance between an Insurance Company or other Insurer and an Assured. B. Contracts of reinsurance between Insurance Companies or other Insurers. Where such contracts do not relate to a particular risk, but cover a number of risks, they are often called "Treaties" of reinsurance.

81. The considerations which arise in relation to direct Insurance Contracts are different from those affecting Reinsurances. In the former case the assured may suffer heavy and possibly ruinous loss if it is decided that his insurance was cancelled at the outbreak of war. He may have refrained from covering his risk afresh because he had no knowledge that his existing insurance was cancelled, and, in some cases, especially in life insurances, he would have been unable to effect a fresh insurance on the same terms. If a loss occurs while the risk is uncovered, it falls upon the individual, who as a rule has had no means of spreading or averaging his risks except by means of insurance. It is desirable, therefore, that direct Insurances should be treated in such a way as to protect the interests of persons insured with enemy companies. In the case of reinsurance, on the other hand, the transaction takes place between insurers, as a means of further subdividing risks which were already spread or averaged by other methods. If a reinsurance or a treaty of reinsurance is cancelled, the insurer may remain responsible for larger particular risks than would ordinarily be considered prudent, but he is generally in a position to effect a fresh reinsurance, and in any case the result will be usually an increase of profit or loss, and not the destruction of the basis of the business. There is therefore not the same practical objection to the cancellation of reinsurance contracts or treaties, and there are obvious advantages in freeing British and Allied companies from engagements with enemy companies which often extend over a long period.

82. We recommend therefore, in principle, that direct Contracts of Insurance should remain intact, but that contracts and treaties of reinsurance should be cancelled as at the beginning of the war. But as will be seen from our detailed recommendations under the different heads, this principle is subject to certain modifications arising from the conditions peculiar to the different classes of Insurance.
